§ XVII. Having thus described the progress of the revolution in England, we shall now briefly explain the measures that were prosecuted in Scotland, towards the establishment of William on the throne of that kingdom. The meeting of the Scottish convention was fixed for the sixteenth of March, and was declared to have a most serious and important influence on the wisdom, observance, and prosperity of the kingdom; and the number of the persons who had affected to influence the election of members. The Duke of Hamilton, and all the presbyterians, declared for William. The Duke of Gordon maintained the castle of Edinburgh for his old master: but, as he had neglected to appear on a certain day, his party were desolate. The Duke of Gordon, who began to waver in his attachment to their sovereign; and to manage their intrigues in such a manner as to derive some advantage to their cause from the transactions of the ensuing session. When the Lords and Commons assembled at Edinburgh, the bishop of that diocese, who officiated as chaplain to the convention, prayed for the restoration of King James. The first dispute turned upon the choice of a president. The friends of the late king set up the Marquis of Atholl in opposition to the Duke of Hamilton; but this last was elected by a considerable majority; and a good number of the other party, finding their cause the weakest, deserted it from that moment. The Scots resolved that, in case of a negotiation for a peace or truce, the transactions on both sides should be communicated bona fide; and that Spain and England should be invited to accede to the treaties, and to make separate articles. The last condition was agreed to; in case of the Spanish king's dying without issue, the States-general should assist the emperor with all their forces to possess that monarchy; that they should use their friendly endeavours with the princes electors, their allies, towards elevating his son Joseph to the dignity of King of the Romans; and employ their utmost force against France, should she attempt to oppose his elevation.

§ XVIII. Next day an express arrived from London, with a letter from King William to the estates; and, at the same time, another from James was presented by one Crane, an English domestic of the abdicated queen. William observed, that he had called a meeting of their estates at the desire of the nobility and gentry of Scotland assembled at London, who requested that he would take upon himself the administration of their affairs. He expected them to concert measures for settling the kingdom upon a solid foundation; and to lay aside animosities and factions, which served only to impede that salutary settlement. He professed himself sensible of the friends that were engaged against the French and English kingdoms; and assured them he would use his best endeavours to promote such a coalition. A committee being appointed to draw up a respectful answer to these assurances, they were to be addressed to the late king James. They resolved to favour with a reading, after the members should have subscribed an act, declaring, that notwithstanding any thing that might be contained in the letter for dissolving the convention, or impeding their procedure, they were a free and lawful meeting of the states, and would continue undissolved, until they should have settled and secured the protestant religion, the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom. Having taken these resolutions, a debate ensued about the letter from the late King James. ordered into custody, and afterwards dismissed with a pass instead of an answer. James foreseeing this contempt, had, by an instrument dated in Ireland, the Authorized Version of the Bible, in the hands of Viscount Dundee, to call a convention of the estates at Stirling. These three depended on the interest of the Marquess of Athol and the Earl of Mar, who professed the warmest affection for the late king; but they hoped secretly they would embarrass the convention, so as to retard the settlement of King William. Their expectations, however, were disappointed. Athol deserted their cause; and Mar suffered himself to be intercepted in his road to Dundee. They recurred to the vigilance of the Duke of Hamilton, prevented from leaving the convention, except the Viscount Dundee, who retreated to the mountains with about fifty horse, and was pursued by order of the estates. This design being frustrated, the convention approved and recognised, by a solemn act, the conduct of the nobility and gentlemen who had entreated the King of England to take upon him the administration. They acknowledged their obligation to the Prince of Orange, who had prevented the destruction of their laws, religion, and fundamental constitution: they besought his highness to assume the reins of government for that kingdom; they issued a proclamation, requiring all persons and places to be immediate to take arms when called upon for that purpose: they conferred the command of their horse-militia upon Sir Patrick Hume, who was formerly attainted for having been concerned in an insurrection containing a receipt for one hundred men for a guard to the city of Edinburgh, and constituted the Earl of Leven their commander: they put the militia all over the kingdom into the hands of those on whom they could rely; they created the Earl of Mar governor of Stirling castle: they received a reinforcement of five regiments from England, under the command of Mackay, whom they appointed their general: and they issued orders for securing all disaffected persons. Then the commissioners reported Sir King William’s letter, professing their gratitude to their deliverer, and congratulating him upon his success. They thanked him for assuming the administration of their affairs, and assembling a convention of their estates. They declared they would take effectual and speedy measures for securing the Protestant religion, as well as for establishing the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom. They assured him that men as much as lay in their power, avoid disputes and animosities; and desired the continuance of his majesty’s care and protection.

§ XX. After the departure of Lord Ross, they appointed a committee, consisting of eight lords, eight knights of the shire, and six other officers under the Lord Justice General, to lay a new settlement: but this resolution was not taken without a vigorous opposition from some remaining adherents of the late king, headed by the Archbishop of Glasgow; all the other prelates, except he of Edinburgh, havin already deserted the convention. After warm debates, the committee agreed in the following vote: "The estates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare, That King James VII. being a profest papist, did assume the royal power, and act as a king, without ever taking the oath required by law; and had, by the advice of evil and wicked counsellors, invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, altered it from a legal and limited monarchical constitution, with a despotic power, and subjected the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government; whereby he had forfeited the right of the crown, and the throne was become vacant." When this vote was reported, the Bishop of Edinburgh argued strenuously against it, as containing a charge of which the king was innocent; and he proposed that his majesty should be summoned to the convention by his commission. All his arguments were defeated or overruled, and the House confirmed the vote, which was immediately enacted into a law by a great majority. The lord president declared the throne vacant, and proposed that it might be filled with William and Mary, the Queens of England. The committee was ordered to prepare an act for setting the crown upon their majesties, together with an instrument of government for securing the subjects from the grievances under which they laboured.

§ XXI. On the eleventh day of April, this act, with the consent of the estates, was reported, considered, unanimously approved, and solemnly proclaimed at the market-cross of Edinburgh, in presence of the lord president, assisted by the lord provost and the Duke of Queensberry, the Marquises of Athol and Douglas, together with a great number of the nobility and gentry. At the same time they published another proclamation, forbidding all persons to acknowledge, obey, assist, or correspond with the estates of the late king James, writing letters to or from them, or submitting the discussion or determination of any cause or question to the precipitation of the said estates, or to misconstrue the proceedings of the estates, or create jealousies or misapprehensions with regard to the transactions of the government, on pain of incurring the most severe penalties. Then, having settled the coronation-oath, they granted a commission to the Earl of Argyll for the lords, to Sir James Montgomery for the knights, and to Sir John Dalrymple for the burghs, empowering them to repair to London, and invest their majesties with the government. This affair being discussed, the convention appointed a committee to take care of the public peace, and adjourned to the twenty-first day of May. On the second day of that month the Scottish commissioners being introduced to their majesties at Whitehall, presented first a preparatory letter from the estates, then the instrument of government, with a paper stating the grievances and complaints of the people, and an address, desiring his majesty to convert the convention into a parliament. The king having graciously promised to concur with them in all just measures for the interest of the kingdom, the coronation-oath was tendered to their majesties by the Earl of Argyll. As it contained a clause, importing, that they should root out heresy, the king declared, that he did not mean by these words, that he should be under an obligation to act as a persecutor: the commissioners replied, that by the import of the oath, he desired them, and others present, to bear witness to the exception he had made.

§ XXII. In the mean time, Lord Dundee exerted himself with uncommon activity in behalf of his master. He had been summoned by a trumpet to return to the convention, refused to obey the citation, on pretence that the whigs had made an attempt upon his life; and that the deliberations of the estates were influenced by the neighbourhood of English troops, under the command of Mackay. He was forthwith declared a fugitive, outlaw, and rebel. He was rancorously hated by the presbytery, on whom he had exercised some cruelties, as an instrument of government: he was arraigned before the states resolved to inflict upon him exemplary punishment. Parties were detainted in pursuit of him and Balcurras. This last fell into their hands, and was committed to a common prison; but Dundee fought his way through the troops that surrounded him, and escaped to the highlands, where he determined to take arms in favour of James, though that prince had forbid him to make any attempt of this nature, until he should receive a reinforcement from Ireland. While this officer was employed in assembling the clars of his party, King William appointed the Duke of Hamilton commissioner to the convention parliament. The post of secretary for Scotland was bestowed upon Lord Melville, a weak and servile nobleman, who had taken refuge in Holland from the violence of the late regents: but the king depended chiefly for advice upon Dalrymple Lord Stair, president of the college of justice, an old crafty fanatic, who for fifty years had complied in all things with all governments. Though these were rigid presbyterians, the king, to humour the opposite party, admitted some individuals of the episcopal establishment to the councils of their king; instead of allaying animosities, served only to sow the seed of discord and confusion. The Scottish convention, in their detail of grievances, enumerated the lords of the articles; the act of parliament in the reign of Charles II. for which the king had granted a commission, was to prescribe any mode of religion according to his pleasure; and the superiority of any office in the church above that of presbyters. The king in his instructions to the lord commissioner, consented to the regulation of the legislature. This followed the same bad and, but, although he was disposed to the abolition of the privy-council. He was bent on the church government should be established in such a manner as would be most agreeable to the inclinations of the people, the question between the king and himself, was entirely shrouded when they found the commissioners so much restricted in the affairs of the lords of the articles, which they considered as their chief grievance. The king permitted that the estates should choose the lords by their own suffrages; and that they should be at liberty to reconsider any subject which the said lords might reject. He afterwards indulged the three estates with the choice of eleven delegates each, for this committee, to be elected monthly, or oftener, if they should think fit: but even these concessions proved unsatisfactory, while the institution itself remained. Their discontent was not even appeased by the passing of an act abolishing prelates. Indeed their resentment was inflamed by another consideration; namely, that of the king's having given seats in the council to some individuals attached to the hierarchy. They manifested their sentiments on this subject by bringing in a bill, excluding from any public trust or employment under the crown, all such men as had been concerned in the encroachments of the late reign, or had discovered disaffection to the late happy change, or in any way retarded or obstructed the designs of the convention. This measure was prosecuted with great warmth; and the bill passed through all the forms of the House, but proved infructuous, for want of the royal assent.

§ XXIV. Nor were they less obstinate in the affair of the judges, whom the king had ventured to appoint by virtue of his own prerogative. The malcontents brought in a bill declaring the bench vacant, as it was at the restoration; asserting their own right to examine and approve those who should be appointed to fill it; providing, that if in time to come any such total vacancy should occur, the nomination should be in the king or queen, or regent, for the time being, and the parliament retain the right of approbation: and that all the changes in the several acts relating to the admission of the ordinary lords of session, and their qualifications for that office, should be satisfied and confirmed for perpetual observation. Such was the spirit of this party, that it declined a great majority, notwithstanding the opposition of the ministers, who resolved to maintain the king's nomination, even in defiance of a parliamentary resolution. The majority, exasperated at this open violation of their privileges, resolved to demand an account of these lords of session, or hold a session, until his majesty's further pleasure should be known: and on the other hand, they were compelled to act by the measures of the privy-council. The dispute was carried on with great acrimony on both sides, and produced such a ferment, that before the session opened, the ministry thought proper to draw a great number of forces into the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, to support the judges in the exercise of their functions.

§ XXV. The lord commissioner, alarmed at this scene of tumult and confusion, adjourned the House till the eighth day of October; a step which, added to the other unpopular measures of the court, incurred the opposition of the subjects to a violent degree. They drew up a remonstrance to the king, complaining of this adjournment while the nation was yet unsettled, recapitulating the several instances in which the crown was accused of disaffection to his majesty; explaining their reasons for dissenting from the ministry in some articles; beseeching him to consider what they had represented, to give his royal assent to the acts of parliament which they had prepared, and take measures for redressing all the other grievances of the people. The king, though he consented to the abolition of the Hambcot-court. William was so touched with the representations it implied, as if he had not fulfilled the conditions on which he accepted the crown of Scotland, that he, in his own vindication, published his instructions to the commissioner; and by these it appeared, that the duke might have proceeded to greater lengths in obliterating his countrymen. Before the adjournment, however, the parliament had granted the revenue for life; and raised money for the purposes of the government by increasing the incidental expense of the government for some months; yet part of the troops in that kingdom were supplied and subsisted by the administration of England. In consequence of that act very great supers说了, which, according to the claim of rights, ought to have been repealed.

§ XXVI. The session was no sooner adjourned than Sir John Lawter converted the blockade of Edinburgh castle into a tumult. They had been advised by a gentleman of great judgment, that the city of Edinburgh, as it lay, in that little time the fortifications were runed, and the works advanced at the foot of the walls, in which the besiegers had made several large breaches. The Duke of Gordon, finding his ammunition expended, his defences destroyed, and the enemy increasing under numbers, and as had been concerned in the encroachments of the late reign, or had discovered disaffection to the late happy change, or in any way retarded or obstructed the designs of the convention. This measure was prosecuted with great warmth; and the bill passed through all the forms of the House, but proved infructuous, for want of the royal assent.

The viscount Dundee, who had assembled a body of highlanders, and resolved to attack Mackay, on an assurance he had received of intimation of this design, despatched immediately, and by long marches retired before Dundee, until he was reinforced by Ramsay's dragoons, and another regiment of English dragoons; then he faced about, and Dundee in his turn retreated into Lochaber. Lord Murray, son of the Marquis of Athol, assembled his vassals to the number of twelve hundred men for the relief of Dundee, which was done by one of his own dependants, who seized the castle of Blair for Dundee, and prevailed upon the Athol men to disperse, rather than fight against James their lawful sovereign.

§ XXVII. The viscount was by this time reduced to great difficulty and distress. His men had not for many weeks tasted bread or salt, or any drink but water; instead of five hundred infantry, three hundred horse, with a supply of arms, ammunition, and provisio, which James had promised to send from Ireland, he received a reinforcement of three hundred naked recruits; but the transports with the stores fell into the hands of the English. Though this was a mortifying disappointment to him, it would make reparation: and, far from abandoning himself to despair, began his march to the castle of Blair, which was threatened with a siege by General Mackay. When he reached this fortress, he received intelligence that the enemy had entered the pass of Killiecrankie, and he resolved to give them battle without delay. He accordingly advanced against them, and a furious engagement ensued, though it was not of long duration. The highlanders having received the support of the castle of Blair, fell in among them sword in hand with such impetuosity, that the foot were utterly broke in seven minutes. The dragoons fled at the first charge in the utmost consternation: Dundee's horb, not exceeding one hundred, broke through Mackay's own lines, and the Earl of Argyll, at the head of a few volunteers, made himself master of the artillery: twelve hundred of Mackay's forces were killed on the spot, five hundred taken prisoners, and the rest fled with great precipitation for some hours, until they were rallied by their general, and, with a superior command, conducted with expedition, and superiority. Nothing could be more complete or decisive than the victory which the Highlanders obtained; yet it was dearly purchased with the death of their beloved chief and commander. The Earl of Argyll was shot in the engagement, and his fate produced such confusion in his army as prevented all pursuit. He possessed an enterprising spirit, undaunted courage, unflagging activity, and a sedate judgment, but was too prudent to lead the people whom he fought under his banner. He was the life and soul of that cause which he espoused, and after his death it daily declined into ruin and disgrace. He was succeeded in command by Colonel Canon, who landed the reinforcement from Ireland; but all his designs miscarried: so that the clans, wearied with repeated misfortunes, had done their arms by degrees, and took the benefit of a pardon, which King William offered to those who should submit, within the time specified in his proclamation.

§ XXVIII. After this sketch of Scottish affairs, it will be necessary to take a retrospective view of James, and relate his career in England. That unlucky fortunate prince and his queen were received with the most cordial hospitality by the French monarch, who assigned the castle of St. Germain for the place of their residence, supported them household without the least inconvenience, embellished them with presents, and undertook to re-establish them on the throne of England. James, however, conducted himself in such a manner as conveyed no favourable idea of his spirit and understanding. He seems to have been quite emasculated by religion: he was deserted by that courage and magnanimity for which his youth had been distinguished. He did not discover great sensibility at the loss of his kingdom. All his faculties were swallowed up in bigotry. Instead of contriving plans for retrieving his crown, he held conferences with the Jesuits on topics of religion. The pity which his misfortunes excited in Louis was mingled with contempt. The Pope supplied him with indulgences, while the Romans laughed at him in quasipudues: "There is a pious man, (said the Archbishop of Rheims, ironically,) who has sacrificed three crowns for a mass." In a word, he was subjected himself to the ridicule and raillery of the French. His position was execrable.

§ XXIX. All the hope of reascending the British throne depended upon his friends in Scotland and Ireland. Tyrconnel, who commanded in this last kingdom, was confirmed in his attachment to James, by the persuasions of Hamilton, and was supported by his clansmen, who considered him as next in line to the Prince of Orange. Nevertheless, he disguised his sentiments, and temporized with William, until James should be able to supply him with reinforcements from France, which he earnestly solicited by private messages. In the mean time, with a view to cajole the protestants of Ireland, and amuse King William with his hope of submission, he persuaded the Lord Mountjoy, in whom the protestants chiefly confided, and Baron Keen, to go in person with a commission to James, representing the necessity of yielding to the times, and of waiting a fitter opportunity to make use of his Irish subjects. Mountjoy, on his arrival at Paris represented the situation of affairs, and assured the King, by James, to explain the reasons which Tyrconnell had suggested touching the inability of Ireland to restore his majesty, was committed prisoner to the Bastile, on account of the zeal with which he had espoused the protestant interest. Although Louis was persuaded disposed to assist James effectually, his intentions were obstructed by the disputes of his ministry. Louvois possessed the chief credit in council; but, Seyssilai enjoyed a greater share of personal favour, both with the King and Madame de Maintenon, the latter being his intimate friend and confidential counsellor. James made his chief application; and he had promised the command of the troops destined for his service to Lausun, whom Louvois hated. For these reasons this minister thwarted his measures, and retarded the assistance which Louis had promised toward his restoration.

§ XXX. Yet, notwithstanding all his opposition, the succours were prepared, and the fleet ready to put to sea by the latter end of March. The English and Dutch had offered an army of fifteen thousand natives of France to serve in this expedition; but James replied, that he would succeed by the help of his own subjects, or perish in the attempt to restore his kingdom, for he had "with about twelve hundred British subjects and a good number of French officers, who were embarked in the fleet at Brest, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, seven frigates, three fire-ships, with a good number of transports. The French king also supplied him with a considerable quantity of arms for the use of his adherents in Ireland: accommodated him with a large sum of money, superb equipages, stores of plate, and necessaries of all kinds for the camp and the household. At parting, he presented him with his own epaulet, and embracing him affectionately, "The best thing I can promise you (said he) is, that I may never see you again." On the seventh day of March, James embarked at Brest, and the English and Dutch, who were with him in quality of ambassador, and his principal officers. He was detained in the harbour by contrary winds till the seventeenth day of the month, when he set sail and landed at the most considerable port in Ireland. By this time King William, perceiving himself amused by Tyrconnel, had published a declaration, requiring the Irish to lay down their arms, and submit to the new government. On the twenty-second day of February, thirty ships of war had been put in commission, and the command of them conferred upon Admiral Herbert; but the armament was retarded in such a manner, by the disputes of the council, and the king's attention to the affairs of the continent, that the admirals did not consider it a condition to sail till the beginning of April, and then with part of his fleet only. James was received with open arms at Kinsale, and the whole country seemed to be at his deviation: for, although the protestants in the North had declared for the new government, their strength and number was deemed considerable when compared with the power of Tyrconnel. This minister had disarmed all the other protestant subjects in one day, and assembled an army of thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand cavalry, for the service of his master.

§ XXXI. In the latter end of March, James made his public entry into Dublin, amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants, and the consent of the most of the leading persons of Irish. On the second day after his arrival in Dublin, he issued five proclamations: the first recalled all the subjects of Ireland who had abandoned the kingdom, by a certain time fixed, to return to it, and to engage in the service of the king, who had assured them of advantage to use them for his advantage. By the third he invited the subjects to supply his army with provisions; and prohibited the soldiers to take any thing without payment. By the fourth he raised the value of the current coin; and in the fifth he summoned a parliament to meet on the seventh day of May at Dublin. Finally, he created Tyrconnel a duke, in consideration of his eminent services.

Walker, having reduced Londonderry, by want of provisions, pressed him to settle the affairs of Ireland immediately, and bring over his army either to the north of England, or the west of Scotland, where it might be joined by his party, and act without delay against the usurper; but his council divided. He was tempted, it is said, to hazard his chance with them; but the inhabitants,zel ingeniously found a way, when they had raised one thousand men, to block up the channel. At length, a reinforcement arrived in the Lough, under the command of General Kerke, who had deserted his master, and been employed in the service of King William. He found means to supply the partisans with corn, arms, and provisions on board for their relief, but found it impracticable to sail up the river; he promised, however, that he would land a body of forces at the Inch, and endeavour to make a diversion in their favour, when joined by the troops at Inniskillen, which amounted to five thousand men, including two thousand cavalry. He said he expected six thousand men from England, where they were embarked before he set sail. He exhorted them to present themselves, and appear as a body, to enable them to come to their relief at all hazards. These assurances enabled them to bear their miseries a little longer, though their numbers daily diminished. Major General Baker directed the partisans to resist the advance of the enemy, and dispersed at such an obstinate opposition by a handful of half-starved militia. He threatened to raise the town to its foundations, and destroy the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex, unless they would immediately submit themselves to their lawful sovereign. The governor treated his menaces with contempt, and published an order that no person, on pain of death, should talk of surrendering. They had now consumed the last remains of their provisions, and supported life by eating the flesh of horses, dogs, cats, rats, mice, tallow, starch, and salted hales, and even this loathsome food began to fail. Rosene finding them deaf to all their proposals, threatened to wreak his vengeance on all the protestants of that county, and drive them under the walls of Londonderry, where they should be suffered to perish by famine. The Bishop of Meath, being informed of this design, complained to King James of the barbarous intention, entreating his majesty to prevent it, and assured him that the governor had assured him that he had already ordered Rosene to desist from such proceedings. Nevertheless, the Frenchman executed his threats with the utmost vigour. Parties of dragoons were sent out to the west, to divert and strip the all the protestants for thirty miles round, they drove these unhappy people before them like cattle, without even sparing the enfeebled old men, nurses at their breasts, tender children, women just delivered, and some even in the pangs of labour. Above four thousand of these miserable objects were driven under the walls of Londonderry. This expedient, far from answering the purpose of Rosene, produced a quite contrary effect. The besieged were so exasperated at this act of inhumanity, that they resolved to perish rather than submit to such a barbarian. They erected a gibbet in sight of the enemy, and sent a message to the French general, importuning, that they would hang all the protestants they had taken during the siege, unless the protestants whom they had driven under the walls should be immediately dismissed. This threat produced a negotiation, in consequence of which the protestants were released, after they had been detained three days without tasting food. Some hundreds died of famine or fatigue; and those who lived to return to their own habitations found them plundered and sacked by the papists, so that the greater number were beggars. Never was a nation more cruelly treated by the partisans of the enemy; yet these very people had for the most part obtained protections from King James, to which no respect was paid by his general. On the 9th of September the garrison of Londonderry was now reduced from seven to five thousand seven hundred men, and these were driven to such extremity of distress, that they began to talk of killing the popish inhabitants, and feeding on their bodies. In this emergency, Kirke, who had hitherto lain inactive, ordered two ships laden with provisions, to which they were allowed to remove, to land the Irish on the mouth frigate. One of these, called the Mountjoy, broke the enemy's boom: and all the three, after having sustained a very hot fire from both sides of the river, arrived in English bottom, was presented to the Earl of Lucan by the inhabitants. The army of James were so dispirited by the success of this enterprise, that they abandoned the siege in the night, and retired with precipitation, after having lost about nine thousand men before the walls. Kirke now, with the English, who took possession of the town, which was never since retaken, prevailed upon to embark for England, with an address of thanks from the inhabitants to their majesties for the seasonable relief they had received.

§ XXXVI. The Irish squires were no less remarkable than the people of Londonderry for the valour and perseverance with which they opposed the papists. They raised twelve companies, which they regimented under the command of Gustavus Hamilton, whom they chose for their governor. They proclaimed William and Mary on the eleventh day of March; and resolved in a general council to maintain their title against all opposition. The Lord Gilmoy invested the castle of Crom belonging to the king, having obtained from the inhabitants of which three succours into the place, and compelled Gilmoy to retire to Bellurbet. A detachment of the garrison, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Lloyd, took the presentment. No law was enacted, and the inhabitants gained the advantage in several skirmishes with the enemy. On the day that preceded the relief of Londonderry, they defeated six thousand Irish papists at a place called New-Butchery, and took their commander, Macart, commonly called Lord Macarthy.

§ XXXVII. The Irish parliament being assembled at Dublin, according to the proclamation of King James, he, in a speech from the throne, thanked them for the zeal, courage, and loyalty they had manifested; estolled the generosity of the French king, who had enabled him to visit them in person; intituled upon executing his design of establishing liberty of conscience as a step equally agreeable to the dictates of humanity and discretion, and promised to concur with them in enacting such laws as would contribute to the peace, affluence, and security of his subjects. Sir Richard Neagle, being chosen speaker of the Commons, moved for an address of thanks to his majesty, for the gracious acts of that day, and desired to make their acknowledgments to the most christian king, for the generous assistance he had given to their sovereign. These addresses being drawn up, with the concurrence in conscience and humanity, it was resolved to use the king's title, to express the abhorrence of the usurpation by the Prince of Orange, as well as of the defection of the English. Next day James published a declaration, commanding of the calumnies which his enemies had spread against his prudence; exasperating upon his own unpartiality in preferring his protestant subjects; his care in protecting them from their enemies, in redressing their grievances, and in granting liberty of conscience; promising that he would take no steps but with the approbation of parliament; offering a free pardon to all persons who should desert his enemies, and join with him in fourteen and twenty days after his landing in Ireland, and charging all the blood that might be shed, upon those who should continue in rebellion.

§ XXXVIII. His conduct, however, very ill agreed with his declaration; nor can it be excused on any other supposition, but that of his being governed, in some cases, against his own will, by his own counsels, and the Irish catholics, on whom his whole dependence was placed. As both Houses were chiefly filled with members of that persuasion, we ought not to wonder at their behaviour. The fruits of the assessment of the Inquisition, by which the protestants of the kingdom had been secured in the possession of their estates. These were by this law divested of their lands, which reverted to the heirs of those estates to whom they belonged before their rebellion. This iniquitous bill was framed in such a manner, that no regard was paid to such protestant owners as had purchased estates for valuable considerations; no allowance was made for improvements, nor any provision for protestant widows: the possessor and tenants were not even allowed to remove the stock in trade.

§ XXXIX. Yet, in order to complete their destruction, an act of attainder against the protestants, whether male or female, whether of high or low degree, who were absent from the kingdom, as well as against all those who retired into any part of the three kingdoms, who did not own the authority of King James, or correspond with rebels, or were any ways aiding, abetting, or assisting to them from the first day of August in the preceding year. The number of protestants attainted by name in this act amounted to about three thousand, including two archbishops, one duke, seventeen earls, seven countesses, as many bishops, eighteen barons, three-and-thirty baronets, eighty-three knights, eighty-three clergy, who were declared traitors, and adjudged to suffer the pains of death and forfeiture. The individuals subjected to this act were charged with no other than the murder of the inhabitants of which three succoured the king's. This act was received with the greatest joy by the English parliament. This assembly passed another act, granting twenty thousand pounds per annum, out of the forfeited estates, to Tyconnel, in acknowledgment of his signal services; they imposed a tax of ten thousand pounds per month for the services of the king; the royal assent was given to an act for liberty of conscience; they enacted that the titles payable by papists should be delivered to priests of that communion; the maintenance of the protestant religion in every place and county was taken away; and all dissenters were exempted from ecclesiastical jurisdictions. So that the established church was deprived of all power and prerogative; notwithstanding the express promise of James, who had declared immediately after his landing, that he would maintain the clergy in their rights and privileges.

§ XL. Nor was the king less arbitrary in the executive part of his government, if we suppose that he countenanced the abuses which were daily committed upon the protestant subjects of Ireland: but the tyranny of his proceedings may be justly imputed to the temper of his minis, consisting of men abandoned to all sense of equity, of reason, and of justice. They counted the liberty and property of the king's protestants for nothing; they viewed them with the most absolute, and revenge, inflamed with all the acrimony of religious rancour. Soldiers were permitted to live upon free quarter: the people were robbed and plundered; licences and protections were abused, in order to extort money from the trading part of the nation. The king's old stores were ransacked; the shops of tradesmen, and the kitchens of burghers, were pillaged to supply the mint with a quantity of brass, which was converted into current coin for his majesty's occasions: an arbitrary value was set upon it, and all persons were required and commanded to take it in payment under the severest penalties, though the proportion between its intrinsic worth and currency was nearly as one to three hundred. A vast sum of the counterfeit coin was issued in the course of one year, and forced upon the protestants in payment of merchandise, provision, and necessaries, for the king's service. James, not content with the supply granted by parliament, imposed by his own act of parliament, eighteen thousand pounds per month on chartels, as the former was laid upon lands. This seems to have been a temporary expedient during the adjournment of the two Houses, as the king was obliged to recast the tax; but it was, however, levied by virtue of a commission under the seals: and seems to have been a stretch of prerogative, the less excusable, as he might have obtained the money in a parliamentary way. Understanding that the protestants had laid out all their brass money in purchasing great quantities of laces, tallow, wood, and corn, he assumed the despotic power of fixing the prices of these commodities, and then bought them for his own use. One may see the full extent of the utter destruction of those unhappy people.

§ XL. All vacancies in public schools were supplied with papist teachers. The pension allowed from the exchequer in the university of Dublin was cut off: the reprobates, fellows, and scholars were expelled: their furniture, plate, and public library, were seized, without the least shadow of pretence, and in direct violation of a promise made to preserve their privileges and immunities. His officers converted the college into a garrison, the chapel into a magazine, and the apartments into prisons: a papist priest was appointed provost: one Maccarty of the same persuasion was made librarian; and the whole foundation was changed into a catholic seminary. When broweracies and benefices in the gift of the crown became vacant, the king ordered the profits to be lodged in the exchequer, and suffered the cure to be totally neglected. The revenues were closely employed in the maintenance of Romish bishops and priests, who grew so insolent under this indulgence, that in several places they forcibly seized the protestant churches. When it was made the king promised to do justice to the injured; and in some places actually ordered the churches to be restored: but the pope clergy refused to comply with this order, alleging that in spirituals they owed obedience to no earthly power but to the emperor. James found himself unable to protect his protestant subjects against a powerful body which he durst not disoblige. Some ships appearing in the bay of Dublin, a proclamation was issued, forbidding the protestants to assemble in any place of worship, or elsewhere, on pain of death. By a second they were commanded to bring in their arms, on pain of being treated as rebels and traitors. Luttrell, governor of Dublin, published an ordinance by beat of drum, requiring the inhabitants to bring in their corn for his majesty's horse, within a certain day; otherwise he would order them to be hanged before their own doors. Brigadier Sarsfield commanded all protestants of a certain district to retire to the distance of ten miles from their habitations, on pain of death; and, in order to keep up the credit of the brass money, the same penalty was denounced, in a proclamation, against any person who should give more than one pound eighteen shillings for a guinea.

§ XLII. All the revenues of Ireland, and all the schemes contrived to bolster up the credit of the base coin, would have proved insufficient to support the expenses of the war which was received, occasioned by the union of the French monarch. After the return of the fleet which had conveyed him to Ireland, Louis sent another strong squadron, commanded by Chateau Reauat, as a convoy to some transports laden with arms, ammunition, and a large sum of money for the use of King James. Before they sailed from Brest, King William, being informed of their destination, detached Admiral Herbert from Spithead with twelve ships of the line, one fire-ship, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. He was driven by stress of weather into Milford-haven, from whence he steered his course to Kinsale, on the supposition that the French fleet had sailed from Brest; and that, in all probability, he should fall in with them on the coast of Ireland. On the first day of May he discovered them at anchor in Bantry Bay, and stood in to engage them, though they were greatly superior to him in number. They soon perceived him at day-break, than they weighed, stood out to windward, formed their line, bore down, and began the action, which was maintained for two hours with equal valour on both sides, though the English fleet sustained considerable damage from the superior fire of the enemy. Herbert gave up the contest in hope of gaining the weather-gage, but the French admiral kept his wind with uncommon skill and perseverance. At length the English squadron stood off to sea, and maintained a running fight till five in the morning. The ships of the line at Clontarf. Beaver, on returning into the bay, content with the honours he had gained. The loss of men was inconsiderable on both sides; and, where the odds were so great, the victor could not reap much glory. Herbert retired to the isles of Scilly, where he expected a reinforcement; but being disappointed in this expectation, he returned to Portsmouth with a very small force with which he had been so much infested by the enemy, King William, in order to apprise their discontent, made an excursion to Portsmouth, where he dined with the admiral of Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, Dover castle, and the other fortresses of the kingdom, in a posture of defence, and to disarm the populace, empowered a committee to inquire into the mutiny, a subject of great importance, and reported to the neglect of the Marquises of Caermarthen and Halifax. They presented an address to the king, desiring that the minute-book of the committee for Irish affairs might be put into their hands; but his majesty declined gratifying them in this particular: then the Commons voted, that those persons who had advised the king to delay this satisfaction were enemies to the kingdom. William, alarmed at this resolution, allowed them to inspect the book, in which they found very little for their purpose. The House resolved that an address be presented to his majesty, declaring, that the succour of Ireland had been retarded by the unnecessary delays; that the transports prepared were not sufficient to convey the forces to that kingdom; and that several ships had been taken by the enemy, for want of proper convoy. At the same time the question was put, whether or not they should address the king separately, to advise the immediate landing of troops. In this a negative vote was carried by a small majority. Before this period, How, vice-chamberlain to the queen, had moved for an address against such counsellors as had been impeached in parliament, and betrayed the liberties of the nation. This motion was levellled at Caermarthen and Halifax, the first of whom had been formerly impeached of high treason under the title of Earl of Darby; and the other was charged with all the misconduct of the present administration. Warm debates ensued, and in all probability the motion would have been carried in the affirmative, had not those who spoke warmly in behalf of it suddenly cooled in the course of the dispute. Some letters from King James to his par- liament were read; in which he declared that he was not to be deterred from the use of his full prerogative, that he had formed an intention of moving against the Dutch, organized a new army, and that the House of Commons, which was assembled in a tumultuous manner at West- minster. The Lords refused their petition, because this was an unusual manner of application. They were persuaded to return to their respective places of abode; precautions were taken against a second riot; and the bill was unanimously rejected in the upper House. This parliament passed an act, vesting in the two universities the presentations belonging to prisons; those of the southern counties being given to Oxford; and those of the northern to Cambridge, on certain specified conditions. Courts of conscience were erected at Bristol, Gloucester, and Newcastle; and that of the counties of Wales was abolished, as an intolerable oppression. The protestant clergy, who had been forced to leave their benefices in Ireland, were rendered capable of holding any living in England, without forfeiting their title to their former pre- ferment, with the proviso that they should resign their English benefices when restored to those they had been obliged to relinquish. The statute of Henry IV. against multiplying gold and silver was now repealed; the sub- jects were allowed to melt and refine metals and ores, and extract gold and silver from them, on condition that it should be brought to the Mint, and converted into money, the owner receiving its full value in current coin. These, and several other bills of small importance being passed, the two Houses adjourned to the twentieth day of September, and afterwards to the nineteenth day of October.

CHAP. II.

William and Mary.

§ I. The affairs of Ireland were extremely pressing, and the protestants of that country had made repeated application for relief, the succours were retarded either by disputes among the masters, or the neglect of those who were sent to superintend the movement of the expedition, in such a manner that King James had been six months in Ireland before the army was embarked for that kingdom. At length eighteen regiments of infantry, and five battalions, besides some artillery, arrived in a train of artillery provided, and transports prepared, the Duke of Schomberg, on whom King William had conferred the chief command of this armament, set out for Chester, after he had in person thanked thecommon regal that they had paid particular attention to him and his army. On the thirteenth day of August he landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus with 25,000 men. After some marches, he obtained possession of Belfast, from whence he retired to his approach to Carrickfergus, where they were forced to make a stand. The duke having refreshed his men, marched thither, and invested the place: the siege was carried on till the twenty-sixth day of the month, when the breaches were practicable, the besieged capitulated, on condition of marching out with their arms, and as much baggage as they could carry on their backs and of their being conducted to the next Irish garrison, which was at Newry. During this siege the duke was joined by the rest of his army from England: but he had left orders for conveying the greater part of the artillery and stores from Chester down to Carrickfergus. From this place he marched through Lushane and Hilliborough, and encamped at Drummore, where the protestants of the North had been lately routed by Hamilton: thence he proceeded to Loughbrinane, where, by which he was joined by the horse and dragoons of Inniskillen. Then the enemy abandoned Newry and Dundalk, in the neighbourhood of which Schomberg encamped on a low damp ground, having the town and river on the south, and surrounded on every other part by hills, bogs, and mountains.

§ II. His army, consisting chiefly of new raised men little instructed hardship, began to flag under the fatigue of marching, the inclemency of the weather, and scarcity of provisions. His orders were sent to Kirk, Haamer, and Stuart; and would have continued his march to Drogheda, where he understood Rosenefay with about twenty thousand men, had he not been obliged to wait for the artillery, which was not yet arrived at Car- lingford. King James, having assembled all his forces, advanced towards Schomberg, and appeared before his intrenchments in order of battle; but the duke, knowing they were general, and that his army was untrained, and that his own army was untrained, and weakened by death and sickness, restrained his men within the lines, and in a little time the enemy retreated. Immediately after their departure, a conspiracy was discovered in the English camp, hatched by French emissaries, who had insinu- ated themselves into the protestant regiments. One of these, whose name was Du Plessis, had written a letter to the Ambassador D'Avaux, promising to desert with all the papists of the French regiments in Schomberg's army. This letter being found, Du Plessis and five accomplices were found in the Maison de Coal and executed. About two hundred and fifty papists being discovered in the French regiments, they were sent over to England, from thence to Holland. While Schomberg remained in this situation, they had to execute the inhabitants of the neighbouring districts under the command of Colonel Lloyd; and on the twenty-seventh day of September they obtained a complete victory over five times their number of English. They killed or captured 700 of the spot. On July the 3rd, the same commander, with about fifty officers, and a considerable body of cattle. The duke was so pleased with their behaviour on this occasion, that they received a very honourable testimony of his approbation.

§ III. Meanwhile the enemy took possession of James- Town, and reduced Sligo, one of the forts of which was gallantly defended by St. Sauveur, a French captain, and his company of grenadiers, until he was obliged to capitulate for want of water and provision. A contiguous dis- temper still continued to rage in Schomberg's camp, and swept off a great number of officers and soldiers; so that in the beginning of next spring, not above half the number of the army came over with the remnant of the army. He was censured for his inactivity, and the king, in repeated letters, desired him to hazard an engagement, provided any opportunity should occur; but he did not think proper to risk the fate of a battle, against an enemy that was above thrice his number, well disciplined, healthy, and conducted by able officers. Nevertheless, he was certainly blamed for having chosen such an unwholesome situation. At the approach of winter he retired to the north of Ireland, in hopes of being re-inforced with seven thousand Danes, who had already arrived in Britain. These auxiliaries were stipulated in a treaty which William had just concluded with the King of Denmark. The English were not more successful at sea than they had proved in their operations by land. Admiral Herbert, now created Earl of Torrington, having sailed to Ireland with the combined squadrons of England and Holland, made a fruitless attempt upon Cork, and lost a great number of seamen by sickness, which was imputed to bad provision. The Dortsmouth ship of war fell into the hands of the enemy, who infested the channel with such a number of armed ships and privates, that the trade of England sustained incredible damage.

§ IV. The affairs of France wore but a gloomy aspect on the continent, where all the powers of Europe seemed to labour under the destruction of the Dutch, who were engaged in a new league with the States-general, in which former treaties of peace and commerce were confirmed. It was stipulated, that in case the King of Great Britain should be deposed, the Dutch should assist him with not less than two thousand infantry and twenty ships of the line; and that provided hostilities should be committed against the States- general, England should supply them with ten thousand soldiers and twenty ships of war. This treaty was no sooner ratified than King William despatched the Lord Churchill, whom he had by this time created Earl of Murlough, to Holland, in order to command the British auxiliaries in that service, to the number of eleven thousand, the greater part of which had been in the army of King James when the Prince of Orange landed in England. The earl forthwith joined the Dutch army, under the command of Major van der Wende, who fixed his rendezvous in the county of Liege, with a view to set mainspring to the French army commanded by the Mareschal D'Humières; while the Prince of Vaudemont held a little army of observation, consisting of Spaniards, Dutch, and Germans, no great part of which consisted of the Low Countries. The city of Liege was compelled to rescind the neutrality, and declare for the allies. Mareschal D'Humières attacked the foragers belonging to the army of the States of Wallon, in the month of August, an obstinate engagement ensued, and the French were obliged to retreat in confusion with the loss of two thousand men, and some pieces of artillery. The army of observation leveled part of the French lines on the side of Courtray, and raised contributions on the territories of the enemy.

§ V. The French were almost entire masters of the three ecclesiastical electorates of Germany. They possessed the bishoprics of Aachen and Mentz, and the abbey of Kulm the Prince of Nassau. They had taken Breslau and Landau. They had blown up the castle of Heidelberg, in the palatinate, and destroyed Manheim. They had reduced Worms and Spies to ashes, and demolished Frankenstein. The greater part of their conquests, the fruits of sudden invasion, were covered with a numerous army, commanded by the Mareschal de Duras; and all his inferior generals were officers of distinguished courage and ability. Nevertheless, he found it difficult to maintain his ground against the different princes of the empire. The Duke of Lorraine, who commanded the imperial troops, invested Mentz, and took it by capitulation: the Elector of Brandenburg, having reduced D'Avaux, undertook the siege of Bonne, which the garrison surrendered, after having made a long and vigorous defence. Nothing contributed more to the union of the German princes than their resentment of the shocking barbarities committed by the French, and despotic policy of the emperor. The French were repulsed by the Austrians and Turks. They were defeated by a body of Croats between Vihitz and Novi. The Prince of Baden, who commanded the imperialists on that side, having thrown a bridge over the Morava at Wurzen, and formed his army in quest of the Turkish army, amounting to fifty thousand men, headed by a Seraskier. On the thirteenth day of August he attacked the enemy in the entrenchments near Nissa, and defeated them with considerable slaughter, and took possession of their camp, baggage, and artillery. They retreated to Nissa, where, the general, finding them still more numerous than the imperialists, resolved to make a stand and encamped in a situation that was inaccessible in every part except the rear, which he left open for the convenience of a retreat. Through this avenue he was, on the twenty-fourth day of September, attacked by the Prince of Baden, who, after a desperate resistance, and another complete victory, enriched his troops with the spoils of the enemy, and entered Nissa without opposition. There he found above three thousand horses and a vast quantity of provision. Having reposed his army and the spoil, he set out on a march against the Turks, who had chosen an advantageous post at Widen, and seemed ambitious of retrieving the honour they had lost in the two former engagements. The Germans, having seen the victory of the Turks, and though the Musulmans fought with incredible fury, they were a third time defeated with great slaughter. This defeat was attended with the loss of Widen, which being surrendered to the victor, he distributed in winter-quarters, and returned to Vienna, covered with laurels.

§ VI. The French were likewise baffled in their attempt upon Catalania, where the Duke de Noulles had taken Campredon, in the month of May. Leaving a garrison in this place, he retreated to the frontiers of France, while the Duke de Ville Hermest, at the head of a Spanish division, blocked up the town. The French suffered considerable exemption. He afterwards undertook the siege in form, and Noulles marched to its relief; but he was so hard pressed by the Spaniards, that he withdrew the garrison, dismantled the place, and retreated with great precipitation. The latter had acquired a considerable advantage from the defeat of Pope Innocent XI. which happened on the twelfth day of August. That pontiff had been an inveterate enemy to Louis even since the affair of the franchises, and the seizure of August: to remove this evil, published a bull, abolishing the franchises; and almost all the noble poderes of France acquiesced in what he had done, upon being duly informed that he intended to become a territory, and that the term of time and the place of residence, which were considered as privileges of pride and insolence, refused to part with any thing that looked like a prerogative of his crown. He said the King of France was not a inferior, Calais were immediately formed at Rome by the French faction against the Spanish and imperial interest. The French Cardinals de Bouillon and Boni, accompanied by Furstemberg, repaired to Rome with a large sum of money, and, after having obtained the Pope to restore the former, and assumed the name of Alexander VII. The Duke de Chaulnes, ambassador from France, immediately signified, in the name of his master, that Avignon should be restored to the king of France, and that if he was not restored, he would then renounce the franchises, in a letter written by his own hand to the new pontiff. Alexander received these marks of respect with the warmest acknowledgments; but, when the Pope had retired, Furstemberg thought fit to examine the election of the Bishop of Cologne, which had been the source of so much calamity to the empire, he lent a deaf ear to their solicitations. He even confirmed the dispensations granted by his predecessor to the Prince of Bavaria, who was thus empowered to take possession of the electorate, though he had not yet attained the age required by the canons. Furstemberg retired in disgust to Paris, where Louis immediately gratified him with the Abbey of St. Germain.

§ VII. King William found it an easier task to unite the councils of Europe against the common enemy, than to conciliate and preserve the affections of his own subjects. The problem of a virtuous temper and popular popularity. Many were dissatisfied with his measures; and a great number even of those who exerted themselves for his elevation, had conceived a disgust from his personal deportment, which was very unsuitable to the man-name of William. Edward, when engaged in mingling his nobility in social amusements and familiar conversation, he maintained a disagreeable reserve, which had all the air of sullen pride; he seldom or never spoke to his courtiers or attendants; he spent his time chiefly in the closet, retired from all communication; or among his troops, in a camp he had formed at Hounslow; or in the exercise of hunting, to which he was immo-

re. The only exception was his former friends, as he could not breathe without difficulty in the air of London, he resided chiefly at Hampton-court, and expended consider-one to your city, and condescended so far as to change his disposition, and in some measure adopt the manners of his predecessors. In imitation of Charles II. he rethe race at Newmarket; he accepted an invitation to visit Cambridge, where he behaved himself with remarkable affability to the members of the university; he afterwards dined with the Lord Mayor of London, ac-the freedom of the city, and condescended so far as to § VIII. While William thus endeavoured to remove the prejudices which had been conceived against his per-the period arrived which the parliament had pro-money. Peter Ottokorn, a Venetian senator, and his ambassador to Rome, with a formidable train, to insult Innocent III; but the Pope was too wise to entertain the idea. The spirit of Nonpareil was very state, and as a very small proportion to that of others, who took them with such reservations and distinctions as redounded very little to the honour of their integrity. Many of those who had been the warmest advocates for non-resistance and passive obedience made no scruple of renouncing their allegiance to King James, and complying with the present necessity, that they too might be innocent of sin, and be of the same sort as the "rightful" when the form was under debate. They alleged that as prudence obliged them to conform to the letter of the oath, so conscience required them to give it their own interpretation. Not without reason; for it is less to the worse tendency, than this practice of equivocating in the most sacred of all obligations. It introduced a general disregard of oaths, which had been the source of universal perjury and corruption. Though this set of temporaries were bitterly upbraided both by the nonjurors and the the king, as a prince educated in the doc-sion of Calvin, which he plainly espoused by limiting his favour and preference to such as were Latitudinarians in religion, and by his abolishing episcopacy in Scotland. The presbyterians of that kingdom now tyrannised in their turn. They were headed by the Earl of Crawford, a hereditary enemy and strong friend of William of Orange, who was chosen president of the parliament by the interest of Melvil, and oppressed the episcopals in such a manner, that the greater part of them, from resentment, became well-wishers to King James. Every circumstance of the hardships which the dissenters were now subjected to, the resistance of the Spanish and imperial interests, the nobleman, and the Earl of Clarendon, as well as the sus-prejudices, and threatened with deprivation. Luke of Chichester, being seized with a dangerous dis-

n. The earl had professed his adherence to the doctrine of non-resistance and passive obedience, which he believed to be the distinguishing characteristic of the church of England. After his death this paper was published, industriously circu-the church, authorizing them to meet from time to time in the Jerusalem chamber, to prepare such alteration of the liturgy and the constitution of ecclesiastical courts, as might most conduce to the good order, edification, and unity of the church, and tend to reconcile all religious differences among the protestant subjects of the kingdom. A cry was immediagainst this commission, as an ecclesiastical court illegal and dangerous. At their first meeting, the author-by the party as an inspired oracle pronounced by a martyr to religious truth and sincerity.

§ IX. All the clamour that was raised against the king could not divert him from prosecuting the scheme of compre-himself to be the apostle of Nonpareil. He was ever like a brave, taking all opportunities to avert the Pope, who encourinjured him in revenge. On the other hand, the parliament of Paris ap-and his son, and mechanical and religious. Louis was too wise to entertain the idea. He felt that it was not in harmony with his character to yield to such a spirit of Nonpareil, as a very small proportion to that of others, who took them with such reservations and distinctions as redounded very which the dissenters had complained, and corrected every article that seemed liable to any just objection; but the opposite party employed all their arts and industry to return this instance to the people. The two universities declared against all alterations, and those who promoted them. The king himself was branded as an enemy to the hierarchy; and they beseeched themselves so successfully in the elections of members for the convocation, that they procured a very considerable majority. At their first meeting, the friends of the comprehension scheme proposed Dr. Tillotson, clerk of the closet to his Majesty, as president; and other persons being in favour of Dr. Jane, who was counted the most violent churchman in the whole assembly. In a Latin speech in the Bishop of London as president, he, in the name of the Inner House, asserted that the liturgy of England needed an amendment, and concluded with the old declaration of the barons, "Nobiamus leges Angliae materi. We will not suffer the laws of England to be changed." The bishop, in his reply, exhorted them to moderation, charity, and indulgence towards their brethren the dissenters, and to make such abatements in things indifferent as might serve to open a door of salvation to multitudes of straying Christians. His injunctions, however, produced no favourable effect. The Lower House seemed to be animated by a spirit of opposition. Next day the president prolonged them, in pretence that the royal commission, by which they were to act, was defective for want of being signed by the sovereign. A prolongation was proposed until that sanction should be obtained. In this interval means were used to mollify their non-compliant temper; but all endeavours proved ineffectual. When they met again, the Earl of Nottingham delivered the king's commission to both Houses, with a speech of his own, and a message from his majesty, importing, that he had summoned them out of a pious zeal to do every thing that might tend to the best establishment of the church of England, which should always enjoy his favour and protection. He exhorted them to lay aside all prejudice, and consider calmly and impartially whatever should be proposed; he assured them he would offer nothing but what should be for the honour, peace, and advantage of the protestant religion in general, and particularly of the church of England.

§ I. The bishops, adjourning to the Jerusalem chamber, prepared a zealous address of thanks to his majesty, which, being sent to the lower House for their concurrence, met with violent opposition. Amendments were proposed; a conference ensued, and after warm debates, they agreed upon a cold address, which was accordingly presented. The majority of the lower House, far from taking any notice of this composition, and contrary to all the advice of the peers, exerted all their influence in the relief of their prostrating brethren. Zealous speeches were made in behalf of the suspended bishops; and Dr. Jane proposed that something might be done to qualify them to sit in the convocation. This, however, was such a dangerous point as they were disposed to treat with great caution; yet, rather than proceed upon the business for which they had been assembled, they began to take cognizance of some pamphlets lately published, which they conceived to be of dangerous consequence to the Christian religion. The president and his party, perceiving the disposition of the House, did not think proper to communicate any proposal touching the intended reformation, and the king suffered the session to be discontinued by repeated prorogations.

§ XII. The parliament meeting on the nineteenth day of October, the king, in a speech of his own composing, explained the necessity of a present supply to carry on the war; he desired that they might be speedy in their determinations on this subject, for these would in a great measure influence the deliberations of the princes and states concerned in the war against France, as a general conclusion of the war by a peace at any convenient time was pressed for in the Hague, to settle the operations of the ensuing campaign. He concluded with recommending the despatch of a bill of indemnity, that the minds of his subjects might be at ease, as well as for the benefit of the kingdom, promoting the honour and welfare of the kingdom. As several inflammatory bills and disputes, which had produced heats and animosities in the last session, were still depending, the king, after having consulted both Houses, resolved to put an end to those disputes, by a prorogation. According to this precedent, the king prorogued the parliament till the twenty-first day of October, by the mouth of the new speaker, Sir Robert Atkins, the Marquis of Halifax having resigned that office. When they re-assembled, the king referred them to his former speech; then the Commons unanimously resolved to censure his majesty in reducing Ireland, and in joining with his allies abroad for a vigorous prosecution of the war against France; for these purposes they voted a supply of two millions.

§ XIII. In the same month, as a strong proof of their influence and intrigues in obstructing the bill of indemnity, which they knew would open a door for favour and preference to the opposite party, which began to gain ground in the king's good graces. With this view they revived the prosecution of the state prisoners. A committee was appointed to prepare a charge against Burton and Graham. The Commons resolved to impeach the Earls of Peterborough, Salisbury, and Castlemann, Sir Edward Hales, and Oldshied Walker, of high treason, for having been reconciled to the church of Rome, contrary to the laws of the realm. A bill was ordered to be brought in, to declare the estate of the late Lord Chancellor Jeffereys forfeited to the crown, provided it should be in favour of the adoption in position that the measure was dropped; the House however agreed, that the pecuniary penalties incurred by those persons who had exercised offices contrary to the laws and against public safety, should be put in form and applied to the public service. The Lord Griffin, being detected in maintaining a correspondence with King James and his partisans, was committed to the Tower; but, as no other evidence appeared against him than written letters, found in the false bottom of a pewter bottle, they could not help consenting to his being released upon bail, as they had lately resolved that Algernon Sidney was unjustly condemned in the reign of Charles II. because nothing but his writings had been put in evidence, and he had long been a member of the Commons concerned in appointing a committee to inquire who were the advisers and prosecutors in taking away the lives of Lord Russell, Colonel Sydney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Alderman Cornish, and others; and who were chiefly concerned in the arbitrary practices touching the wri of Quo Warranto, and the surrender of charters. This inquiry was levellated at the Marquis of Halifax, who had concurred with the ministry of Charles in all these severities. Though no proof against the persons so accused could be founded, that nobleman saw it was necessary for him to withdraw himself from the administration; he therefore resigned the privy-seal, which was put in compase and given to Sir John Suckley, the speaker, of the house, of whom he became the patron and protector.

§ XIV. The Commons likewise resumed the examinations of the miscarriages in Ireland, and desired the king should appoint commissioners, to go over and inquire into the condition of the army in that kingdom, and understand that he had been blamed in the House of Commons for his inactivity, transmitted to the king a satisfactory vindication of his own conduct; and it appeared that the miscarriages in Ireland were wholly owing to John Shales, purveyor-general to the army. The Commons immediately presented an address to his majesty, praying that Shales might be taken into custody; that all his papers, accounts, and stores, should be secured; and that Duke Schomberg might be empowered to fill his place with a more able purveyor. The king gave them to understand that he had already sent orders to the general for that purpose. Next day another petition requested his majesty to name those who had recommended Shales to his service, as he had exercised the same office under King James, and was suspected of treasonable practices against the government. William III. was inclined to consider the service as a message to the House, desiring them to recommend a certain number of commissioners to superintend such provs and preparations as might be necessary for that service, and that the king might in person proceed there and examine the state of the army in Ireland. The Commons were so mollified by this instance of his condensation, that they left the whole affair to his own direction, and pro-as a veteran in the arts of treason. In order to blast William's credit in the city, they circulated a report that James would grant a full indemnity, separate himself entirely from the negociërs, and make no secret connivance in favour of the Roman Catholics. Montgomery's brother assured the Bishop of Salisbury, that a treaty with King James was absolutely concluded, and an invitation subscribed by the whole cabal. He said this paper would be sent to a trusted and new commissioner was appointed. Bitter reproaches were thrown out against the ministry. Mr. Hambden expressed his surprise that the administration should consist of those very persons whom King James had employed when his affairs were desperate, to treat with the Prince of Orange, and moved that the king should be petitioned in an address to remove such persons from his presence and counsels. This was a stroke aimed at the Earl of Nottingham, whose office of secretary Hambden desired to possess; but his motion was not seconded; the court-members observing that James did not dispute those lords to the Prince of Orange because they were attached to his own interest, but for a very different reason, namely, that they were well known to disapprove of his measures, and therefore would be the more agreeable to his highness. The House, however, voted an address to the king, desiring that the authors of the miscarriages might be brought to condign punishment.

§ XV. In the sequel, the question was proposed, Whether a placeman ought to have a seat in the House? and a vote of this kind was referred to the committee, affirmative, on the supposition that by such exclusion the commonwealth would be deprived of some of the ablest senators of the kingdom. But what chiefly irritated William against the whigs was their backhandedness in promoting the public service, and their disregard of the earnest desire he expressed to see his revenue settled for life. He said his title was no more than a paper, and the worst of all governments was that of a king without treasure. Nevertheless, the surrendering of the crown in a longer term than one year. They began to think there was something arbitrary in his disposition. His sullen behaviour, in all probability, first infused this opinion, which was strengthened and confirmed by the intimations of his counsellors. The Scots, who had come up to London to give an account of the proceedings in their parliament, were infected with the same notion. One Simpson, a presbyteryman of the church, who was Earl of Bothwell's employer as a spy, had intimated himself into the confidence of Nevil Payne, an active and intelligent partisan and agent of King James; by which means he supplied the earl with such intelligence as raised him to some degree of credit with the government, and this instantly brought against the king's best friends, and inflamed jealousies which were soon kindled into mutual distrust and animosity.

§ XVI. Sir James Montgomery, who had been a warm advocate for the revolution, received advice that the court suspected him and others of disaffection, and was employed in seeking evidence by which they might be prosecuted. They were equally alarmed and incensed at this intimation, and Payne wired the opportunity of seducing them into a correspondence with the exiled king. They demanded the settlement of presbytery in Scotland, and actually engaged in a treaty for his restoration. They reconciled themselves to the return of Queenbery, and the other noblemen of the episcopacy, so that they might obtain for a supply of money, arms, and ammunition, together with a reinforcement of three thousand men from Dunkirk. Montgomery had acquired great interest among the whigs of England, and this he employed in animating them against the king and the ministry. He represented them as a set of wicked men, who employed infamous spies to inform and ruin the fast friends of the government, and found them out with the assistance of the king, and they began to think it earnest of recalling their banished prince. The Duke of Bolton, and the Earl of Monmouth, were almost persuaded into a conspiracy for this purpose; they met at the church laund, but it was called off, on fears of former errors, that they might trust him without scruple. Montgomery and Payne were the chief managers of the scheme, and they admitted Ferguson into their councils, as a veteran in the arts of treason. In order to blast William's credit in the city, they circulated a report that James would grant a full indemnity, separate himself entirely from the negociërs, and make no secret connivance in favour of the Roman Catholics. Montgomery's brother assured the Bishop of Salisbury, that a treaty with King James was absolutely concluded, and an invitation subscribed by the whole cabal. He said this paper would be sent to a trusted and new commissioner was appointed. Bitter reproaches were thrown out against the ministry. Mr. Hambden expressed his surprise that the administration should consist of those very persons whom King James had employed when his affairs were desperate, to treat with the Prince of Orange, and moved that the king should be petitioned in an address to remove such persons from his presence and counsels. This was a stroke aimed at the Earl of Nottingham, whose office of secretary Hambden desired to possess; but his motion was not seconded; the court-members observing that James did not dispute those lords to the Prince of Orange because they were attached to his own interest, but for a very different reason, namely, that they were well known to disapprove of his measures, and therefore would be the more agreeable to his highness. in the revenue bills; but he could not prevail upon them to settle the revenue for life. They granted, however, the hereditary excise for that term, but the customs for four years only. They considered this short term as the best security the kingdom could have for frequent parliaments, though this precaution was not at all agreeable to their sovereign. A poll-bill was likewise passed; other supplies were granted, and both parties seemed to count his majesty, by their course of proceedings, not only right and just, but also necessary and expedient; the former, however, had another battery in reserve. They produced, in the upper House, a bill for recognising their majesties as the rightful and lawful sovereigns of these realms, and for making the acts of parliament of the last session, and what had since been enacted, good and valid. The tores were now reduced to a very perplexed situation. They could not oppose the bill without hazarding the interest they had so lately acquired, nor assent to it without solemnly renouncing their former arguments and distinctions. They made no great objections to the first part, and even proposed to enact, that those should be deemed good laws for the time to come; but they refused to declare them valid for that which was past. After a long debate, the bill was committed; yet the whigs lost their majority on the report; nevertheless, the bill was recovered, and passed with some alteration in the words; in consequence of a nervous, spirited protest, signed by Bolton, Worsley, Trenchard, Serjeant, Suffolk, Monmouth, Delamere, and Oxford. The whole interest of the court was thrown into the scale with this bill, before it could preponderate against the tores, the chief interest was meant of Nottingham at this head, protested in their turn. The same party in the House of Commons were determined upon a vigorous opposition; and in the mean time some trifling objections were made, that it might be committed for amendment; but their design was certain disfranchisement. Sir John Chatham, who chanced to question the legality of the convention, as it was not summoned by the king's writ. This mainmation was answered by Somers, the solicitor-general, who observed, that if the convention were refused, it was then met, and who had taken the oaths enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high treason; the laws repealed by it were still in force: it was their duty, therefore, to return to King James, and all concerned in collecting and paying the money levied by the acts of that parliament were highly criminal. The tores were so struck with these arguments, that the bill passed without further opposition, and immediately received the royal assent. The 3rd of December was fixed upon for the tores who had so loudly exclaimed against it as illegal; but the whigs, with all their management, would not have gained their point, had not the court been interceded in the dispute. On the 2d of January, 1680, the bill was again published, and the King directed all the members of both parties, on the import of a bill requiring all subjects in office to abjure King James, on pain of imprisonment. Though the clergy were at first exempted from this test, the main body of the tores opposed it with great vehemence; while the whigs, under countenance of the ministry, supported it with equal vigour. It produced long and violent debates; and the two factions seemed pretty equally balanced. At length, the tores represented to the king, that a great deal of precious time would be lost in fruitless altercation; that those who declared against the bill would grow sullen and intractable, so as to oppose every other measure that might be made for the king's service; that, in case of its being defeated, he would be drawn into the hands of the whigs, who would renew their former practices against the prerogative; and many individuals, who were now either well affected to him, or at least neutral, would become Jacobites from resentment. These suggestions had such weight with King William, that he sent an intimation to the Commons, desiring them to drop the debate, and proceed to matters that were more proper, to the advantage of his crown and his interposition; and the Earl of Shrewsbury, who interested himself warmly in behalf of the bill, resented it so deeply, that he insisted on resigning his office of secretary of state. The king, who revered his talents and integrity, employed Dr. Tillotson and others, who were supposed to have credit with the Earl, to dissuade him from quitting his employment: but he continued deaf to all their remonstrances, and would not even comply with the request of his majesty, who pressed him to keep the seals until he should return from Ireland. Long debates were likewise managed in the House of Commons on the bill; but the tores, in order rather an oath of special fidelity to William, in opposition to James. The tores professed themselves willing to enter into a negative engagement against the late king and his adherents; but the whigs would not join in all their plight; and the House was so equally divided that neither side was willing to hazard a decision: so that all the fruit of their debates was a prolongation of the session. § XXV. An act was prepared for investing the queen with the administration during the king's absence; another for reversing the judgment on a Quo Warranto against the city of London, and restoring it to its ancient rights and privileges; and at length, the bill of indemnity so cordially recommended by the king passed both Houses. On the twenty-first day of May, the king closed the session with a short speech, in which he thanked them for the supplies they had granted; and recommended to them a publick discharge of their debts in better respects. It was no part of the peace of the nation might not be interrupted in his absence. The Houses were adjourned to the seventh day of July; when the parliament was prorogued and adjourned successively. At this period, it was evident that peace in the kingdom, the deputy-lieutenants were authorised to receive the militia in case of necessity. All papists were prohibited to sit above five miles from their respective places of abode: a proclamation was published for apprehending without a warrant, all suspected persons. Sir John Fenner and Sir George Grogan were actually arrested on suspicion of treasonable practices. On the fourth day of June the king set out for Ireland, attended by Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of York, Sir George Grogan, and the Duke of York, the Prince of Orange, the Earl of Ossian, and many other persons of distinction; on the fourteenth day of the month be landed at Carrickfergus, from whence he immediately proceeded to Belfast, where he was met by the Duke of Schonberg, the Prince of Wales, and the Major-General Kinky, and other officers. By this time Colonel Wolsey, at the head of a thousand men, had defeated a strong detachment of the enemy near Belfort; Sir John Lanier had taken Bedloe-castle; and that of Clarenmont, a strong post of great importance, was taken with Balimargy, near Cavann, had been reduced. King William having repossed himself for two or three days at Belfast, visited the duke's head quarters at Liscarne: then marched to Dundalk, and afterwards advanced to Anlee, where the enemy had just abandoned. § XXVI. King James trusted so much to the disputes in the English parliament, that he did not believe his son's law would be able to quit that kingdom; and William had been six days in Ireland, before he received information of his arrival. A strong post of great importance, they took Dublin under the guard of the militia commanded by Lutrell, and with a reinforcement of six thousand infantry, which he had lately received from France, joined the rest of his forces, which now almost equalled William's army in number, exclusive of about fifteen thousand men who remained in different garrisons. He occupied a very advantageous post on the bank of the Boyne, and, contrary to the general opinion, he had determined to attack them. They proposed to strengthen their garrisons, and retire to the Shannons, to wait the effect of the operations at sea.

Louis had promised to equip a powerful armament against the English fleet, and send over a great number of small frigates to destroy William's transports as soon as their crews should be returned to England. The execution of this scheme was found to be difficult; a part of the fleet landed on the north side, the other part on the south side of the river, and both were afterwards repulsed by the enemy with signal loss to the English army; for their stores and ammunition were still on board; the ships sailed along the coast as the troops advanced in their march; and there was not one secure base at which they could retire on any emergency. James, however, was bent upon hazarding an engagement; and expressed uncommon confidence and alacrity. Besides the river, which was deep, its front was secured by a small island, and a range of ground; so that the English army could not attack him, without manifest disadvantage.

§ XXVII. King William marched up to the opposite bank of the river, and, as he reconnoitred their situation, was exposed to the fire of some field-pieces, which the enemy purposely planted against his person. They killed a man and two horses close by him; and the second bullet rebounding from the earth, grazed upon his right shoulder, so as to carry off part of his clothes and skin, and produce a considerable contusion. This accident, which he bore without the least emotion, created some confusion among his attendants, which the enemy perceiving, conformed the fire to his person, and shouted a peal of the trumpet. The whole camp resounded with acclamation; and several squadrons of their horse were drawn down towards the river, as if they had intended to pass it immediately and attack the English army. The report was instantly confirmed by a volley of muskets to the alarm of the enemy; and from thence it was conveyed to Paris, where, contrary to the custom of the French court, the people were encouraged to celebrate the event with bonfires and illuminations. William rode along the line to show himself to the army after this narrow escape. At night he called a council of war, and declared his resolution to attack the enemy in the morning. Schomberg at first opposed his design, but finding the king determined, he advised that a strong detachment of horse and foot should that night pass the Boyne at Slane-bridge, and take post between the enemy and the pass of Duleck, that the action might be the more decisive. This council being rejected, the king determined, that, early in the morning, Lieutenant-General Douglas, with the right wing of infantry, and young Schomberg, with the horse, should pass at Slane-bridge, while the main body of foot should force their passage at Oldpool, and the left at certain fords between the enemy and the camp and Drogheda. The duke, perceiving his advice was not relished by the Dutch generals, retired to his tent, where the order of the battle being brought to him, he recommended the omission of a part, that had ever been sent him in that manner. The proper dispositions being made, William rode quite through the army by torch-light, and then retired to his tent, after having given orders for the soldiers to distinguish themselves from the enemy, by wearing green boughs in their hats during the action.

§ XXVIII. At six o'clock in the morning, General Douglas, with young Schomberg, the Earl of Portland, and Avenmereque, marched towards Slane-bridge, and passed the river with very little opposition. When they reached the further bank, they perceived the enemy drawn up in two lines, to a considerable number of horse and foot, with a morass in their rear; so that Douglas was obliged to wait for a reinforcement. This being arrived, the infantry was led on to the charge through the morass, while Count Schomberg rode round it with his cavalry, to attack the enemy in flank. The Irish, instead of waiting the assault, faced about and retreated towards Duleek with some precipitation; yet not so fast, but that Schomberg fell in among their rear, and did considerable execution. King James, however, soon reinforced his left wing from the center, and Count Schomberg was in his turn obliged to send for assistance. At this juncture, King William's main body, consisting of the Dutch guards, the French regiments, and some battalions of English, passed the river, which was wide and deep; and in a general discharge, James had imprudently removed his cannon from the other side; but he had posted a strong body of musqueteers along the bank, behind hedges, houses, and some works raised for the occasion. These poured in a close fire upon the English troops before they reached the shore; but it produced very little effect: this the Irish gave way; and the English took possession of the field. The Irish, before they could form, they were charged with great impetuosity by a squadron of the enemy's horse; and a considerable body of their cavalry and foot, commanded by a general in person, advanced from some little hillocks to attack those that were landed, as well as to prevent the rest from reaching the shore. His infantry turned their backs and fled immediately; but the horse charged with so much impetuosity on the Irish, that they were forced to fly back towards the town, in order to put the uniforms regiments in confusion. Then the Duke of Schomberg passed the river in person, put himself at the head of the French partisans, and pointing to the enemy; "Gentlemen," said he, "these are your persecutors;" with these words he advanced to the attack, where he himself sustained a violent onset from a party of the Irish horse, which broke through one of the regiments, and were now on their return. They were mistaken for English, and allowed to gallop up to the duke, who received two severe wounds in the head: but the French regiments being now sensible of their mistake, rashly threw in their fire upon the Irish while they were engaged with the English, and were soon overtaken on the wing, and routed. The fate of this general had well nigh proved fatal to the English army, which was immediately involved in tumult and disorder; while the infantry of King James rallied, and returned to their posts with a face of resolution. The line had retreated, as if the English were driven, and then facing about, retreated to the village of Dunmore. There they made such a vigorous stand, that the Dutch and Danish horse, though headed by the king in person, recoiled, and were driven to the sea shore, where the whole wing would have been routed, had not a detachment of dragoons, belonging to the regiments of Cunningham and Lewis, dismounted, and lined the hedges on each side of the defile through which the fugitives were driven. There they did such execution upon the pursuers, as soon checked their ardour. The horse, which were broken, had now time to rally, and, returning to the charge, drove the enemy before them in their turn. In this action General Edouard, who had been near King William during the whole engagement, was wounded and taken: an incident which discouraged them to such a degree, that they made no further efforts to retreat the advantage they had gained in the beginning of the action, and immediately recoiled towards the town, when the king, who asked him if he thought the Irish would make any further resistance; and he replied, "Upon my honour, I believe they will; for they have still a good body of horse entire." William, eyeing him with a look of disdain, repeated, "Your honour! your honour!" but took no other notice of his having acted contrary to his engagement, when he was permitted to go to Ireland, on promise of persuading Tyrconnel to submit to the new government. The Irish now abandoned the field with precipitation: but the French and Swiss troops, that acted as their auxiliaries, under Laurnz, retreated in good order, after having maintained the battle for some time with intrepidity and resolution.

§ XXIX. As King William did not think proper to pursue the enemy, the carnage was not great. The Irish lost fifteen hundred men, and the English about one-third of that number; though the latter was vastly superior in men, considering the death of the gallant Duke of Schomberg, who fell in the eighty-second year of his age, after having rivalled the best generals of the time in military reputation. He was descended of a noble family in the papal state, and was educated in the Jesuits, and was created a Peer of Ireland by King Charles I. Lord Dudley. Being obliged to leave his country, on account of the troubles by which it was agitated, he commanded a soldier of fortune, and served successively in the armies of the princes of Orange, of Tuscany, of France, of Sweden, and of Denmark. He attained to the dignities of Mareschal in France, Grandee in Portugal, Generalissimo in Prussia, and Duke in England. He professed the protestant religion; was courteous and humble in his deportment; cool, penetrating, resolute, and sagacious; nor was his probity inferior to his courage. This battle likewise proved fatal to Hely-Hutchinson, who had followed the Duke of Marlborough, and commanded one of the regimental batteries. After having received a mortal wound, he was carried back through the river by four soldiers, and though almost in the throes of death, was immediately encouraged those who were crossing to do their duty, exclaiming, "A la gloire, mes amis; a la gloire! To my lords; to glory!" The third remarkable person who lost his life on this occasion, was Walker the clergyman, who, attended by a party of Dubliners, led the whole army of King James. He had been very graciously received by King William, who gratified him with a reward of five thousand pounds, and a promise of further favour; but his military genius still predominating, he attended his royal patron in this battle, and, being shot in the belly, died in a few minutes. The persons of distinction who fell on the other side were the Lords Dongan and Curlingford; Sir Nede O'Neill, and the Marquis of Hoquingcourt. James himself stood aloof during the action, on the hill of Dunmore, surrounded with some squadrons of horse; and seeing victory declare against him, retired to Dublin, without having made the least effort to check his defeat. He had himself neither spirit or conduct, his army might have been rallied and reinforced from his garrisons, so as to be in a condition to keep the field, and even act upon the offensive; for his loss to the Duke of Marlborough was the most of the soldiers and officers of the rebels were immediately broken in their retreat—an omission which has been charged upon him as a flagrant instance of misconduct. Indeed, through the whole of this engagement, William's personal courage was much more conspicuous than his military skill.

§ XXX. King James no sooner arrived at Dublin, than he assembled the magistrates and council of the city, and in the name of M. de Turenne, to the governor of the city. He complained of the cowardice of the Irish; signed his resolution of leaving the kingdom immediately; forbade them, on their allegiance, to burn or plunder the city after his departure; and assured them, that though he was obliged to yield to force, he would never cease to labour for their deliverance. Next day he set out for Waterford, attended by the Duke of Berwick, Tyrconnel, and the Marquis of Powis. He ordered all the bridges to be broken, and the roads rendered impassable by engines, which had been prepared for his reception. At sea he fell in with the French squadron, commanded by the Sieur de Foran, who persuaded him to go on board one of his frigates, and from thence, at ten o'clock, to sail for London, and there met with a fleet of ships, which had been convoyed to France, and returned to the place of his former residence at St. Germain's. He had no sooner quitted Dublin, than it was also abandoned by all the papists. The protestants immediately took possession of the arms belonging to the militia, under the conduct of the Bishops of Meath and Limerick. A committee was formed to take charge of the administration; and an account of these transactions was transmitted to King William, together with a petition, that he would honour the city with his presence.

§ XXXI. On the morning after the battle of the Boyne, William sent a detachment of horse and foot, under the command of M. de Turenne, to Waterford. They seized the city, in which surrendered the place without opposition. The King, at the head of the army, began his march for Dublin, and halted the first night at Halfa-Bregahan, where, having received news of the enemy's retreat from the capital, he sent the Duke of Ormond, with a body of horse, to take possession. These were immediately followed by the Dutch guards, who secured the castle. In a few days the King encamped at Finglas, in the neighbourhood of Dublin, where he was visited by the Bishops of Meath and Limerick, at the head of the protestant clergy, whom he assured of his favour and protection. Then he published a declaration of pardon to all the common people who had served against the King; and ordered the houses, churches, and dwellings, and surrender their arms by the first day of August. Those that rented lands of popish proprietors, who had been concerned in the rebellion, were required to retain their rents in their own hands, until they should have notice from the commissioners of the revenue to whom they should be paid. The desperate leaders of the rebellion, who had fought for the cause of the Papist, were secured in the French, authorized depredations which had been committed upon protestants, and rejected the pardon offered to them on the King's first proclamation, were left to the event of war, unless by evident demonstrations of repentance they should deserve mercy, which would never be refused to those who were truly penitent. The next step taken by King William was to issue a proclamation, reducing the brass money to nearly its intrinsic value. In the mean time, the project of war was on foot; and after having seen him embark at Waterford, returned to their troops, determined to prosecute the war as long as they could be supplied with means to support their operations.

§ XXXII. During these transactions, the queen, as regent, found herself surrounded with numberless cares and perplexities. Her council was pretty equally divided into whigs and Tories, who did not always act with unanimity. She was distracted by her apprehensions for her father's safety and her husband's life: she was threatened with an invasion by the French from abroad, and with an insurrection by the Jacobites at home. Nevertheless, she distrusted force, and relied rather upon prudence and fortune. Advice being received that a fleet was ready to sail from Brest, Lord Torrington hoisted his flag in the Downs, and sailed round to St. Helens, in order to assemble as many ships as possible to engage him to give them battle. The enemy being discovered off Plymouth, on the twentieth day of June, the English admiral, reinforced with a Dutch squadron, stood out to sea, with a view to intercept them at the entrance of the Isle of Wight, should they presume to sail up the channel: not that he thought himself strong enough to cope with them in battle. Their fleet consisted of seventy-eight ships of war, and one hundred and twenty-four of lesser size. The combined squadrons of England and Holland did not exceed six-and-fifty; but he had received orders to hazard an engagement, if he thought it might be done with any prospect of success. After the hostile fleets had continued five days in sight of each other, Lord Torrington bore down upon the enemy off Bray-bay-head on the thirtieth day of June, at day-break. The Dutch squadron which composed the van, began the engagement about nine in the morning; and in about an hour the blue division of the English were close engaged with the rear of the French: but the red, which formed the centre, under the command of Torrington in person, did not fill the line till the afternoon. The Dutch, who were close engaged with the enemy, and though they fought with great valour, sustained considerable damage. At length, the admiral's division drove between them and the French, and in that situation the fleet anchored about five in the afternoon, when the action was interrupted by a calm. The Dutch had suffered so severely, that Torrington thought it would be imprudent to renew the battle; he, therefore, weighed anchor in the night, and with the tide of flood retired to the eastward. The next day the disabled ships were destroyed, that they might not be retarded in their retreat. They were pursued as far as Rye; an English ship of seventy guns being straddled near Winchelsea, was set on fire and deserted. In about half an hour the blue division of the English lost two ships, two sea-captains, and about four hundred men; but the Dutch were more unfortunate: six of their great ships were destroyed. Dick and Brackel, rear-admirals, were slain, together with a great number of officers and seamen. Torrington retreated without further interruption into the mouth of the Thames; and, having taken precautions against any attempts of the enemy in that quarter, he returned to London, the capitulation of which was over-whelmed with conformation.

§ XXXIII. The government was infected with the same panic. The ministry pretended to believe that the French acted in concert with the malcontents of the nation, that insurrections in the different parts of the kingdom had been projected by the Jacobites; and that there would be a general revolt in Scotland. These insurrections were circulated by the court-agents, in order to justify, in the opinion of the public, the measures that were deemed necessary and proper to prevent the desired effect. The apprehensions thus artfully raised among the people inflamed their aversion to nonjurors and Jacobites. Addressses were presented to the queen by the Court, the lieutenancy of Middlesex, and that of the mayor, aldermen, and burgomaster of London, filled with professions of loyalty, and promises of supporting their majesties, as their lawful sovereigns, against all opposition. The queen, at this crisis, exhibited remarkable proofs of courage, activity, and discretion. She issued out proper orders and directions for putting the nation in a posture of defence, as well as for reuniting and augmenting the fleet: she took measures for appeasing the resentment of the States-general, who exclaimed against the Earl of Torrington for his behaviour in the late action. He was deprived of his command and sent prisoner to the Tower; and commissioners were appointed to examine the particular circumstances of his conduct. A camp was formed in the neighbourhood of Torbay, where the French seemed to threaten a descent. Their fleet which lay at anchor in the bay, cannonaded a small village called Tingemouth. A detachment of their men attempted to set fire to the place, and burned a few coasting vessels; then they reembarked and returned to Brest, so vain of this achievement, that they printed a pompous account of their invasion. Some of the whig partisans published reports of these repulsed attempts, that the prorogued bishops were concerned in the conspiracy against the government; and these arts proved so inflammatory among the common people, that the prelates thought it necessary to print a paper, in which they asserted their nonconformity in the most solemn protestations. The court seems to have harboured no suspicion against them, otherwise they would not have escaped imprisonment. The queen issued a proclamation for apprehending the Earl of Lichfield, Aylesbury, and Castlemain; Viscount Preston; the Lords Montgomery and Bellasse; Sir Edward Hales, Sir Robert Thorold, Sir Robert Hamilton, Sir Theophilus Greville, and Colonel Edward Sackville, and some other officers. These were accused of having conspired with other disaffected persons to disturb and destroy the government, and of a design to concur with her majesty's enemies in the intended invasion. The Earl of Torrington and the other广大市民 were shut up in the Tower of London: in the next session, when he was brought into the House of Commons, and made a speech in his own defence. His case produced long debates in the Upper House, where the form of his commitment was regarded as illegal; at length he was tried by a court martial, appointed by the commissioners of the admiralty, though not before an act had passed, declaring the power of a lord high-admiral vested in those commissioners. The president of the court was Sir Ralph Delaval, who had acted as vice-admiral of the blue in the engagement. The earl was acquitted, but the king dismissed him from the service: and the Dutch exclaimed against the partiality of his judges.

§ XXXV. William is said to have intercepted all the papers of his father-in-law and Tyrconnel, and to have learned from them, not only the design projected by the French to burn the English ships, but likewise the undertaking of one Jones, who engaged to assassinate King William. No such attempt, however, was made; and, in all probability, the whole report was a fiction, calculated to throw an odium on James's character. On the ninth day of July, William detached General Douglas with a considerable body of horse and foot towards Athlone, while he himself, having left Trelawney to command at Dublin, advanced with the rest of his army to Inchiquin, and, having joined to Kilkeny, to surround, and supplied the governor of Athlone for King James, being summoned to surrender, fired a pistol at the trumpeter, saying, "These are my terms." Then Douglas resided to undertake the siege of the place, which was naturally very strong, and defended by a resolute garrison. An inconsiderable breach was made, when Douglas receiving intelligence that Sarsfield was on his march to the relief of the besieged, abandoned the enterprise, after having lost about four hundred men in the attempt. The king continued his march to the westward; and, by dint of severe examples, established such order and discipline in his army, that the prisoners and they produced the desired effect. The apprehensions thus artfully raised among the people inflamed their aversion to nonjurors and Jacobites. Addressses were presented to the queen by the Court, the lieutenancy of Middlesex, and that of the mayor, aldermen, and burgomaster of London, filled with professions of loyalty, and promises of supporting their majesties, as their lawful sovereigns, against all opposition. Then Douglas resolved to undertake the siege of the place, which was naturally very strong, and compromised by the interposition of La Melionere. The place being invested, and the batteries raised, the besieged proceeded with such rapidity that a breach was soon effected. Colonel Hackluyt, with a body of horse and dragoons, ran into the lines and took possession of the place, and the garrison were taken prisoners.

Chapter II.

A.D. 1690.]

WILLIAM AND MARY.

The Duke of Grafton, who served on this occasion as a volunteer, was mortally wounded in one of the breaches; and Major Hugh, a brave officer, was killed in action.

During these transactions, Count de Lauzan, commander of the French auxiliaries to Ireland, lay inactive in the neighbourhood of Galway, and transmitted such a lamentable account of his situation to the court of France, that transports were sent over to bring home the French forces. In these he embarked with his troops, and the command of the Irish forces devolved to the Duke of Berwick, though it was afterwards transferred to M. St. Ruth. Lauzan was disgraced at Versailles for having surrendered without resistance, and his order of service was revoked.

The Prince of Orange, being induced to return to the Netherlands, left his army in the hands of his brother-in-law, Count of Nassau, a man of great military talents, who had never been defeated in a pitched battle.

Under the command of this officer, the Duke of Berwick, who had been defeated by the Count of Nassau, was driven from the fortress of Sars, and the latter advanced with his army to conquer the town.

The Duke of Berwick, in the meantime, was engaged in the siege of Limerick, and marched thither with his forces.

The Duke of Berwick, finding himself deserted by his allies, and the enemy superior in numbers, had recourse to a desperate measure, and attempted to storm the town. The Netherlands army, however, was not to be taken by assault, and the Duke of Berwick was forced to retreat.

a body of Turks should invade it on the other; these last were totally dispersed by Prince Louis of Baden: but Prince Augustus, Duke of Brunswick, who had detached himself from the rest, was slain in a narrow defile, and his troops were obliged to retreat with precipitation. Tekeli, however, did not improve this advantage. Being apprised of the fate of his allies, and afraid of seeing his retreat cut off, he retreated up the valley of the mountains; he had left behind him some of the principal prisoners, including the representatives of the crier of state, which had remained vacant since the resignation of the Earl of Shrewsbury, was now filled with Lord Sidney; and Sir Charles Porter was appointed judge of the justices of Ireland, in the room of this nobleman.

§ XLIII. Notwithstanding the act for revising the proceedings against the city charter, the whigs had made shift to keep possession of the magistracy; Pilkington had obtained the city clerkship of the city, and Robinson retained the office of chamberlain. The tories of the city, presenting upon their late services, presented a petition to the House of Commons, complaining, That the intent of the late act of parliament, for revising the judgment on the Quo Warranto, was frustrated by some doubtful expression; so that the old aldermen elected by commission under the late king's great seal still acted by virtue of that authority; that Sir Thomas Pilkington was elected mayor by the common hall; and, that he and the aldermen had imposed Mr. Leonard Robinson upon them as chamberlain, though another person was duly elected into that office. These and other elections were illegally excluded, and others, duly elected, were refused admittance. They specified other grievances, and petitioned for relief. Pilkington and his associates undertook to prove that those allegations were either false or frivolous; and represented the petition as a contravention of the Jacobites, to disturb the peace of the city, that the supply might be retarded, and the government distressed. The late panic which overspread the nation, the whigs had appeared to be the promoters of it, and largely for the security of the settlement they had made, while the tories kept aloof with a suspicious caution. For this reason the court now interposed its influence in such a manner, that little or no regard was paid to their remonstrance.

§ XLIV. The Marquis of Carmarthen, lord president, who was at the head of the Tory interest in the ministry, and had acquired great credit with the king and queen, now fell under the displeasure of the opposite faction; and they resolved, if possible, to revive his old impeachment. The Earl of Shrewsbury, and thirteen other leading members engaged in this design. A committee of Lords was appointed to examine the precedents, whether impeachments continued in statu quo from parliament to parliament. Several such precedents were reported; and violent debates ensued: but the marquis was enabled to carry the day, and to retart the progress of the bill; for the estates had been already procured to the king's favourites: nevertheless, the bill passed the lower House, and was sent up to the Lords, among whom it was purposely delayed by the influence of the ministry. It was at this juncture that Lord Torrington was tried and acquitted, very much to the dissatisfaction of the king, who not only disapproved him from the service, but even forbade him to appear in his presence. When William came to the House of Lords, to give the royal assent to a bill for doubling the excise, he told the parliament, that the posture of affairs required his presence at the Hague; that, therefore, they ought to lose no time in perfecting such other supplies as were still necessary for the maintenance of the army and navy; and he reminded them of making some provision for the expense of the civil government. Two hills were accordingly past down for granting to their majesties the duties on gowns imported, for five years; and these, together with the minute bill, received the royal assent: upon which occasion the king observed, that if some annual provision could be made for augmenting the navy, it would greatly conduce to the honour and safety of the nation. In consequence of this hint, they voted a considerable supply for building additional ships. This, however, was thought of small benefit to commerce and expedition, as even seemed to anticipate the king's desires. This liberality and despatch were in a great measure owing to the management of Lord Godolphin, who was now placed at the head of the treasury, and Sir John Sinclair appointed one of the principal secretaries of state; which had remained vacant since the resignation of the Earl of Shrewsbury, was now filled with Lord Sidney; and Sir Charles Porter was appointed judge of the justices of Ireland, in the room of this nobleman.

pleasure, that the two Hones should adjourn themselves to the thirty-third day of March.

A.D. 1609. § X. V. William, having settled the affairs of the nation, set out for Margate on the sixth day of January; but the ship in which he proposed to embark being detained by an easterly wind and hard frost, he returned to Kensington. On the sixteenth, however, he embarked in a larger one on the Mersey, and set sail for Holland, under convoy of twelve ships of war, commanded by Admiral Rooke. Next day, being informed by a fisherman that he was within a league and a half of Goree, he quitted the yacht, and went into an armed galley, which was to accompany him in the voyage. The ports of Devonshire, Dorset, Dorset, and Monmouth, with Auruerque and Zwillenstein. Instead of landing immediately, they lay off the night of the fleet, and, rising early, in at 32 each, and found the shore in the north wind. Meaullandisles. A deputation of the States received him at Houssalryde; about six in the evening he arrived at the Hague, where he was immediately complimented by the States-General, the States-General of Holland, the States-General of Zeeland, the other colleges, and the foreign ministers. He afterwards, at the request of the magistrates, made his public entry with surprising magnificence; and the Dutch celebrated his coming with joy, and other marks of tumultuous joy. He assisted at their different assemblies; informed them of his successes in England and Ireland; and assured them of his constant zeal and affection for his native country.

A.D. 1609. § X. VI. At the court of the confederate princes, he represented, in a set speech, the dangers to which they were exposed from the power and ambition of France; and the necessity of acting with vigour and determination against their enemy. The news of his coming was speedily conveyed to Staines, where the French army was encompassed, and the forces, nor person, incurring with their measures; and that in the spring he would come at the head of his troops to fulfill his engagements. They forthwith resolved to employ two hundred and twenty-two thousand men against France in the ensuing campaign. The proportions of the different princes and states were regulated; and the King of England agreed to furnish twenty thousand. He supplied them with the necessary money; and his ambassador, soon assumed a more promising aspect. The plan of operations was settled, and they transacted their affairs with such harmony, that no dispute interrupted their deliberations. The Duke of Orleans attended by the Duke of Buckingham, and the Dauphin, the Dukes of Orleans and Chartres. The gardian consisted of about six thousand men, commanded by the Prince of Orange; but the beseechers carried on their works with such rapidity as they could not withstand. King William no sooner understood that the place was invested, than be ordered Prince Waldeck to assemble the army, determined to march against the enemy in person. Fifty thousand men were soon collected at Halie, near Brussels; but when he went thither, he found the Spaniards had neglected to provide carriages, and other necessaries for the expedition. Meanwhile, the burgesses of Mons, seeing their town in danger of being utterly destroyed by the bombs and cannon of the enemy, pressed the governor to capitulate, and even threatened to introduce the citizens of the city, and the county, and obtained very honourable conditions. William, being apprised of this event, returned to the Hague, embarked for England, and arrived at Whitehall on the thirteenth day of April.

A few days before his arrival, great part of the palace of Whitehall was consumed by fire, through the negligence of a female servant.
session is the weakest, because no man can secure himself from such danger. Ashton suffered with equal courage and resolution. He, like a paper which has been exposed to the sun, he owned his attachment to King James; he witnessed to the birth of the Prince of Wales; denied his knowledge of the contents of the papers that were committed to his custody, and that he had met them from the judges and the jury, but forgave them in the sight of heaven. This man was celebrated by the non-jurors as a martyr to loyalty; and they boldly affirmed, that his chief crime in the eyes of the governor, was that he had managed his book and his baggage an account of such evidence as would have been conclusive to all the world, concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, which by a great number of people was believed supposititious. Lord Preston obtained a pardon; Elliot was not tried, because no evidence appeared against him; the Earl of Clarendon was sent to the Tower, where he remained some months, and he was afterwards confined to his own house in the country; an indulgence, which he owed to his consanguinity with the queen, who was his first cousin. The Bishop of Ely, Graham, and Pen, absconded; and a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

§ 11. This prelate's being concerned in a conspiracy, furnished the king with a plausible pretence for filling up the vacant bishoprics. The deprived bishop had been given to understand, that an act of parliament might be ordained to that effect; and they from taking the oaths, promised that they would perform their episcopal functions: but, as they declined this expedient, the king resolved to fill up their places at his return from Holland. Accordingly, the archbishop of Canterbury was conferred upon Dr. Tilton, one of the most learned, moderate, and virtuous ecclesiastics of the age, who did not accept of this promotion without great reluctance, because he foresaw that he should be exposed to the slander and malice of men that party which had wished his elevation to the cause of the other vacant sees. He was given to divines of unblemished character; and the public in general seemed very well satisfied with this exertion of the king's supremacy. The deprived bishops had first affected all the meekness of resignation. They remembered those shouts of popular appropriation, by which they had been animated in the persecution they suffered under the aje government; and they hoped the same cordial would support them in their present affliction: but, finding the nation cold in their concern, they determined to warm it by argument and declanation. The press groaned with the efforts of their learning; and every one of them was answered by their opponents. The nonjurors affirmed, that Christianity was a doctrine of the cross; that no pretence whatever could justify an insurrection against the sovereign; that the primitive Christians thought it their indispensable duty to resist every invasion of their rights; and that non-resistance was the doctrine of the English church, confirmed by all the sanctions that could be derived from the laws of God and man. The other party not only supported the natural rights of mankind, and explained the use that might be made of the doctrine of non-resistance, in exciting fresh commotions, but they also argued, that if passive obedience was right in any instance, it was conclusively so with regard to the present government; for obedience required by Scripture was indiscriminate, " the powers that be, are ordained of God—let every soul be subject to the higher powers." From these texts they inferred, that the new oaths ought to be taken without scruple; and that those who refused them, concealed party under the cloak of conscience. On the other hand, the fallacy and treachery of this argument were demonstrated. They said, it levelled all distinctions of justice and duty; that those who taught such doctrines, attached themselves solely to possession, however unjustly acquired; that, if twenty different usurpers should succeed one another, they would recognise the last, notwithstanding the allegiance they had so solemnly sworn to their predecessor, like the fawning spaniel that followed the chief who mounted his master's horse in the morning, and returned to the same horse, when the king mounted it in the evening. They also denied the justice of a lay-deprivation, and with respect to church-government started the same distinctions. " De jure et De facto," which they had formerly made in the civil world, they now laid against the bishopric, and the bitterness of invective against Tillotson and the new bishops, whom they reviled as intruders and usurpers: their sacristy was chiefly directed against Dr. Sherlock, who had been one of the most active promoters against the revolution, but thought proper to take the character of the retreat of King James from Ireland. They branded him as an apostate, who had betrayed his cause, and published a review of his whole conduct, which proved a severe satire upon his character. Their attacks upon individuals were mingled with their vengeance against the government; and indeed the great aim of their divine, as well as of their politicians, was to sap the foundation of the new settlement. In order to alienate the minds of the people from the interest of the reigning prince, they ridiculed his character: inveighed against his measures: they accused him of sacrificing the concerns of England to the advantage of his native country; and drew invidious comparisons between the wealth, the trade, the taxes, of the last king of the present reign. To frustrate these efforts of the malcontents, the court employed their engines to answer and re-criminate; all sorts of informers were encouraged and excited; and while the king himself, was exposed to the odious character of an usurer, every disaffected person, was pointed out as an enemy. The courtiers and disaffected persons, were enjoined to make search, and apprehend those who should, by seditious discourses and libels, presume to defame the governmental. Thus the revolutionists commenced the profession of enemies to all those very arts and practices which had enabled them to bring their scheme to perfection.

§ III. The presbyterians in Scotland acted with such fury, violence, and intemperance, that they were equally odious and contemptible. The transactions in their general assembly were carried on with such peevishness, partiality, and injustice, that the king dissovered it by an act of state, and convoked another from the month of November in the following year. The episcopal party promised to enter heartily into the interests of the new government, to keep the highlanders quiet, and induce the clergy to acknowledge and serve King William, provided he would balance the power of Melvil and his partizans, in such a manner, as would secure them from violence and oppression; provided the episcopal ministers should be permitted to perform their functions among those people by whom they were beloved. They were answered by the king, who to be au-mix with the presbyterian leaders, should be admitted without any severe imposition in point of opinion. The king, who was extremely disgusted at the presbyterians, relished the proposal; and young Dalrymple, son of Lord Stair, was admitted to share the government with Melvil. He undertook to bring over the majority of the Jacobites, and a great number of them took the oaths; but at the same time they maintained their correspondence with the court of St. Germain, by the conjuncture of which they submitted to William, that they might be in a condition to serve James the more effectually. The Scottish parliament was adjourned by proclamation to the sixteenth day of September. The proceedings were taken against the dangerous communication with the continent: a committee was appointed to put the kingdom in a posture of defence; to exercise the powers of the regency, in securing the enemies of the government; and the Earl of Home with Sir Peter Fraser and Sir John Macpherson, were apprehended and imprisoned.

§ IV. The king, having settled the operations of the ensuing campaign in Ireland, where General Ginkel exceeded the supreme council, and a Parliament was about to meet, the king determined to end the bloodshed among the pressing sailors, to the incredible anannce of commerce: then leaving the queen as before at the helm of government in England, he returned to Holland, accompanied by Lord of convenienc. The best answer that could be made to this summons was Locke's book upon government, which appeared at this period.—Ralph. 2 To one of the pamphlets published on this occasion, is annexed a petition to the general government, in the name of King James's adherents, propounding several grievances against the nation, and the king, and ending with the grounds of William's title; and the declaration, that in case the general government should proceed with war along with or in opposition to the king, it would submit to that title, as they had before opposed it from a principle of conscience. The best answer that could be made to this summons was Locke's book upon government, which appeared at this period.—Ralph.

Sydney, secretary of state, the Earl of Marlborough and Portugal, having been detained there, was taking the field in person. On the thirtieth day of May, the Duke of Luxembourg having passed the Scheldt at the head of a large army, took possession of Hale, and gave it up to plunder in sight of the confederates, who were obliged to throw up entrenchments for their defence. At this same time the Marquis de Boufflers, with a considerable body of forces, entrenched himself before Liers, with a view to bombard that city. In the beginning of June, King William had made his appearance in the allied army, by this time reinforced in such a manner as to be superior to the enemy. He forthwith detached the Count de Tilly, with ten thousand men, to the relief of Luxembourg, which was about to be taken by the French and devoured by the bombs, bullets, and repeated attacks of Boufflers, who now thought proper to retreat to Dinant. Tilly, having thus raised the siege, and thrown a body of troops into Huy, rejoined the confederate army, which had been augmented ever since his departure with six thousand men from Brandenburg, and ten thousand Hessians, commanded by the landgrave in person. Such was the vigilance of Luxembourg, that William could not avoid bivouacking without ordnance, and encamped on the hill of Muntcallier, with his infantry in straights, in march of their vanguard and rear, so as to insist on such an engagement with the French. The French marshal avoided it with such dexterity, as baffled all his endeavours. In the course of his military campaign, the French were convinced of each other: but the most mischievous manner to which neither could begin the attack without a manifest disadvantage. While the king lay encamped at Court-sur-sure, a soldier, corrupted by the enemy, set fire to the fuses of several bombs, the explosion of which might have blown up the whole magazine, and produced infinite confusion in the army, had not the mischief been prevented by the courage of the men who guarded the artillery; even while the fuses were burning he disguised the wagons from the line, and overturned them down the side of a hill, so that the communication of the fire was intercepted. The person who made this treacherous attempt being discovered, owned he had been employed for this purpose by the Duke of Luxembourg. He was tried by a court-martial, and suffered the death of a traitor. Such perfidious practices not only fix an indelible share of infamy on the French general, but prove how much the capacity of William was dreaded by his enemies. King William, quitting Court-sur-sure, encamped upon the plain of St. Girard, where he remained till the fourth day of September, consuming the forage, and exhausting the country. Then he passed the Sambre near Jemeppe, while the French crossed it at Lainey, from Piedmont before the English. The enemy, perceiving the confederates were at their heels, proceeded to Gramont, passed the Dender, and took possession of a strong camp between Aeth and Oudersarde: while his colour of infantry, produced the effect of his arrival on the river Aeth and Leuse. While he continued in his post, the Hessian forces and those of Liege, amounting to about eighteen thousand men, separated from the army, and passed the Meuse at Namur; then the king returned to the Hague, leaving the command to Prince Waldeck, who forthwith removed to Leuze, and on the twentieth day of the month began his march to Cambrai. Luxembourg, who watched his motion with a curious eye, found means to attack him in his retreat so suddenly, that he was surprised and defeated, though the French were at last obliged to retire; the prince continued his route to Cambrai, and in a little time both armies retired into winter quarters. In the mean time, the Duke of Noailles besieged and took Urgel in Catalonia, while a French squadron, commanded by the Count D'Etrées, bombarded Barcelona and Alicant.

§ VI. The confederates had proposed to act vigorously in Italy against the French, but the season was far advanced before they were in a condition to take the field. The emperor and Spain had undertaken to furnish troops to join the Duke of Savoy; and the maritime powers contributed their proffered assistance. The States-General was nominated to the supreme command of the imperial forces in that country; the Marquis de Legan — the governor of the Milanese — acted as trustee for the Spanish monarchy: Duke Schomberg, son of that great general who lost his life at the Bosque, began his operations in the interests of William, as King of England and stadtholder, and commanded a body of the Vaudos paid by Great Britain. Before the German auxiliaries arrived, the French, in the strength of a garrison, besieged and took Ville-France, Nice, and some other fortifications; then he reduced Villana and Carmagnola, and detached the Marquis de Feuquers to invest Comi, a strong fortress garrisoned by the Vaudes and French refugees. The Duke of Savoy was now reduced to the brink of ruin. He saw almost all his places of strength in the possession of the enemy: Comi was besieged; and La Hoguette, another French general, had forced the passes of the valley of Aoste, so that he had free admission into the Verceillos, and the frontiers of the Milanese. Turin was threatened with a bombardment; the people were dispirited and clamorous, and their sovereign lay with his little army in the rear of his garrison. He then put his troops in the field, and bade his townsmen, and his palaces of Rivoli destroyed. Duke Schomberg exhorted him to act on the offensive, and give battle to Catignat, while his officer's army was weakened by detachment, and Prince Eugene supported his remonstrance but the proposal was vetoed by the Marquis de Legan, who foresaw that, if the duke should be defeated, the French would penetrate into the territories of Milan. The relief of Comi, however, was undertaken by detachment by Prince Eugene, who began his march for that place with a convoy guarded by two-and-twenty hundred horse, at Maghiano, he was reinforced by five thousand militia: Bulonde, who commanded at the siege, no sooner heard of his approach than he retired with the utmost precipitation, leaving behind some pieces of cannon, mortars, bombs, arms, ammunition, tents, provisions, utensils, with all his sick and wounded. When he joined Catignat, he was immediately put under arrest, and afterwards cashiered with disgrace. Hugueset abandoned the valley of Aoste: Feuquers was sent with a detachment to change the garrison of Casii: and Catignat retired with his army towards Villa Nova D'Aste.

§ VII. The muscovy of the French before Comi affected Louvois, the minister of Louis, so deeply, that he could not help shedding tears when he communicated the event to his master, who told him, with great composure, that he was spoiled by good fortune. But the retreat of the French brought his intrigue on the seven orders of the conclave at Rome, then sitting for the election of a new Pope, in the room of Alexander VIII, who died in the beginning of February. Notwithstanding the power and intrigues of the French, they were baffled by the French of D'Etrées, the affairs of Piedmont had no sooner taken this turn, than the Italians joined the Spanish and imperial interest, and Cardinal Fuggnelli, a Neapolitan, was elected pontiff. He assumed the name of Innocent, in honour of the late Pope known by that appellation, and adopted all his maxims against the French monarch. When the German auxiliaries arrived, under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, the confederates resolved to give battle to Catignat, but he repelled the French, and sent couriers to Versailles, to solicit a reconciliation. Then Prince Eugene invested Carmagnola, and carried on the siege with such vigour, that in eleven days the garrison capitulated. Meanwhile the Marquis de Hoigncourt undertook the conquest of Montmelian, and reduced the town without much resistance. The Castle, however, made such a vigorous defence, that Catignat marched thither in person; and, notwithstanding all his efforts, the place held out till the second day of December, when it surrendered on honourable conditions. the Rhine. The French endeavoured to surprise Mentz, by maintaining a correspondence with one of the emperor's commissioners; but this being discovered, their design was frustrated. The imperial army, under the Elector of Saxony, passed the Rhine in the neighborhood of Heiligenstadt; and the French crossing the same river at Philpsburgh, reduced the town of Portzheim in the marquisate of Baden-Dourlach. The execution of the scheme, projected by the French court for preventing the death of his general, the Elector of Saxony, which happened on the second day of September. His affairs wore a more favourable aspect in Hungary, where the Turks were totally defeated by Prince Louis of Baden on the banks of the Mohacs, and afterwards Prince Eugene took the siege of Great Waradin in Transylvania; but this was turned into a blockade, and the place was not surrendered till the following spring. The Turks were so disquieted by the defeat by which they had lost the grand visit, that the emperor might have made peace upon very advantageous terms; but his pride and ambition overshot his success. He was weak, vain, and superstitious; he unmounted the throne of Ireland, where he was almost extinguished, King William, with the rest of his allies, would be able to humble the French power, though he himself should not co-operate with heretics, whom he abhorred; and that in the mean time he should not only make an entire conquest of Hungary, but also carry his arms to the gates of Constantinople, according to some ridiculous prophecy by which his vanity had been flattered. The Spanish government was become so feeble, that the latter might be at the mercy of the enemy, had the Netherlands, offered to deliver the whole country to King William, either as monarch of Ireland, or statholder of the United Provinces. He declined this offer, because he knew the people would never be reconciled to a Protestant government; but he proposed that the Spaniards should confer the administration of Flanders upon the Elector of Bavaria, who was ambitious of securing his courage, and able to defend the country with his own troops and treasure. This proposal was refused by the court of Spain; the emperor imparted it to the elector, who accepted the office without hesitation; and he was immediately deputed governor of the Low Countries by the council of state at Madrid. King William, after his return from the army, continued some time at the Hague, settling the operations of the ensuing campaign. That affair being discussed, he embarked in the Masset, and landed in England on the nineteenth day of October. On the 1st of November we explain the proceedings in parliament, it will be necessary to give a detail of the late transactions in Ireland. In the beginning of the season, the French king had sent a large supply of provisions, chief of all, corn, to the army of the late vice-king, under the command of Monsieur St. Rue, accompanied by a great number of French officers furnished with commissions from King James, though St. Rue issued all his orders in the name of Louis. Tyrconnell had arrived in January, with three frigates and nine vessels, laden with succours of the same nature: otherwise the Irish could not have been so long kept together. Nor, indeed, could these supplies prevent them from forming separate and independent bands of Hapareeza, who plundered the country, and committed the most shocking barbarities. The French, in conjunction with General Ginkel, took a step to exhaust the enemy; they promised to protect all papists who should live quietly with a certain frontier line; and Ginkel gave the catholic rebels to understand, that he was authorized to treat with them, if they were not first to inform the government of their design. They took the field, several skirmishes had been fought between parties; and these had always turned out so unfortunate to the enemy, that their spirits were quite depressed, with the confidence of the English rose in the same proportion.

§ IX. St. Ruth and Tyrconnell were joined by the Rapparees, and General Ginkel was reinforced by Mackay, with those troops which had reduced the highlanders in Scotland. Thus strengthened, be, in the beginning of June, marched through the district of the Lake of Ballea, was garrisoned by a thousand men under Colonel Bourke, who, when summoned to surrender, returned an evasive answer. But when a breach was made in the place, and the besiegers began to advance, several hundred highlanders were slain, but men laid down their arms, and submitted at discretion. The fortifications of this place being repaired and augmented, the general left a garrison for its defence, and advanced to Athlone, situated on the other side of the Shannon, to which place he afterwards returned, and almost under its walls. The English town, on the bither side of the river, was taken sword in hand, and the enemy broke down an arch of the bridge in their retreat. Batteries were raised against the Irish town, and several unsuccessful attempts were made to force the passage of the bridge, which was defended with great vigour. At length, it was resolved, in the council of war, that a detachment should pass at a ford a little to the left of the bridge, though the river was deep and rapid, the bottom soft and stony, and the pass guarded by a ravelin, erected for that purpose. The forlorn hope consisted of sixty grenadiers in armour, headed by Captain Sands and two lieutenants. They were well supported by two squadrons of cavalry, and by six battles of infantry. Never was a more desperate service, nor was ever exploit performed with more valour and intrepidity. They passed twenty abreast, each man of their band bearing two three-pounder guns, balls, bullets, and grenades. Those who followed them took possession of the bridge, and laid planks over the broken arch. Pontoon were fixed at the same time, that the troops might pass in different places; the ground was scaled, and abandoned the town in the utmost consternation; so that, in half an hour, it was wholly secured by the English, who did not lose above fifty men in the attack. Mackay, Tetteau, and Foulsham, executed the orders of the imperialists, and were successful in passing the river; and General Ginkel, for his conduct, intrepidity, and success, on this occasion, was created Earl of Athlone. When St. Ruth was informed by express, that the English had entered the river, he said it was impossible they should pretend to take a town which he covered with his army, and that he would give a thousand pistols they would attempt to force a passage. Sarphild was actuated by the truth of the intelligence, and pressed the order to send succours to the town, which the officer's fears, and some warm expostulation passed between them. Being at length convinced that the English were in possession of the place, he ordered some detachments to be sent against them, but they were not strong enough to prevent their passage. Their own works being turned against them, they found the task impracticable, and that very night their army decamped. St. Ruth, after a march of ten miles, took post at Aghrim, and having, by dragoons from garrisons, augmented his army to five-and-twenty thousand men, resolved to hazard a decisive engagement.

§ X. Ginkel having put Athlone in a posture of defence, passed the Shannon, and marched up to the enemy, determined to give them battle; but his forces did not exceed eighteen thousand, and the Irish were posted in a very advantageous situation. St. Ruth had made an admirable disposition, and taken every precaution that military skill could suggest. His centre extended along a rising ground, uneven in many places, intersected with banks and ditches, joined by lines of communication, and fronted by a large bog almost impassable. His right was fortified with entrenchments, and his left secured by the castle of Athlone. He promised the whole of the pathetic strain, conjuring them to exert their courage in defence of their holy religion, in the extremity of heresy, in recovering their ancient honours and estates, and in restoring the Saxon name that was restored before the nation was descended. This appeal had been expellled by an unnatural usurper. He employed the priests to enforce his exhortations; to assure the men that they might depend upon the prayers of the church: and that in case they should fall in battle, their souls and angels would convey their souls to heaven. They are said to have sworn upon the sacrament that they would not desert their colours, and to have received an order that no quarter should be given to the French heretics in the army of the Prince of Orange. Ginkel had encamped on the Roscommon side of the river Suck, within three miles of the enemy; after having consulted with the officers, he resolved, with the advice of a council of war, to attack them on Sunday the twelfth day of July. The necessary orders being given, the army passed the river at two fords and a slip, above the town of Sallaghy, on the great bog, began about twelve o'clock to force the two passages, in order to possess the ground on the other side. The enemy fought with surprising fury, and the horse were severely engaged. The English right carried their point by means of some field pieces. The day was now so far advanced, that the general determined to postpone the battle till next morning; but perceiving some disorder among the enemy, and fearing they would decamp in the night, he altered his resolution, and ordered the attack to be renewed. At six o'clock in the evening the left wing of the English advanced to the right of the Irish, from whom they met with such a warm and obstinate resistance as to force the enemy to sus- pending efforts of courage and perseverance that they at length obliged them to give ground; and even then they lost it by inches. St. Ruth, seeing them in danger of being enveloped by the French cavalry, determined to retire to the centre and left wing. Mackay no sooner per- ceived them weakened by these detachments, than he ordered three battalions to skirt the bog, and attack them on the left, while the centre advanced through the middle of the moors, the men wading up to the waist in mud and water. After they had reached the other side, they found themselves obliged to ascend a rugged hill, fenced with hedges and ditches; and these were lined with musque- teers, supported at proper intervals with squadrons of cavalry. They made such a desperate resistance, and fought with such impetuosity, that the assailants were repulsed into the middle of the bog with great loss, and Sir St. Ruth exclaimed, "Now I will drive the English to the gates of Dublin." In this critical conjuncture Ptolemache came up with a fresh body to sustain them, rallied the broken troops, and renewed the charge with such vigour, that the Irish gave way in their turn, and the English recovered the ground they had lost; though they found it impossible to improve the advantage. Mackay brought a body of horse and dragoons to the assistance of the left wing, and first turned the tide of battle in favour of the English. After a most brilliant action, the army, with great gallantry during the whole action, advanced with five regiments of cavalry to support the centre, when St. Ruth, perceiving his design, resolved to fall upon him in a body. Mackay had been ordered to take the field with all possible speed; for this purpose, he began to descend Kirkcommod-hill with his whole reserve of horse; but in his way was killed by a cannon-ball. His troops immediately halted, and his guards retreated with his body. His fate dispirited the troops, and produced such confusion as Sarphied could not remedy; for though he was next in command, he had been at variance with St. Ruth since the affair at Athlone, and was ignorant of the plan he had concerted. Roumeyny, having passed the hollow way without opposition, charged the enemy in flank, and broke down all before him with surprising impetuosity; the centre redoubled their efforts and pushed the Irish to the top of the hill; and then the whole line giving way at once from right to left, threw down their arms. The foot fled towards a bog in their rear, and their horse took the route by the highway to Loughrea; both were pursued by the English cavalry, who, in four miles made a terrible slaughter. In the battle, which lasted two hours, and in the pursuit, above four thousand of the enemy were slain, and six hundred taken, together with all their baggage, tents, provi- sion, ammunition, and artillery, nine-and-twenty pair of carriages, and almost all the arms of their infantry. In a word, the victory was decisive, and not above eight hundred of the English were killed upon the field of battle. The vanquished retreated in great con- fusion; and from their actions in the day before, it became a matter of necessity, in hope of receiving such succours from France, as would either enable them to retrieve their affairs, or obtain good terms from the court of England. There Tyrconnel died of a broken heart, after having survived his authority and reputation. He had incurred the censure of the French, as well as the hatred of the Irish, whom he had advised to submit to their government, rather than to totally ruin themselves and their families.

§ XI. Immediately after the battle, detachments were sent to reduce Portumna, Bonnachar, and Moorcastle, and a considerable number of the enemy on the Shannon, which were accord- ingly secured. Then Ginkel advanced to Galway, which he summoned to surrender; but he received a defiance from Lord Dillon and General D'Ussone, who com- manded the garrison. Mackay was despatched upon the east side of the town to open a fort which commanded the approaches to the town; he was taken by assault; six regiments of foot, and four squadrons of horse, passed the river on pontoons; and the place being wholly invested, the governor thought proper to capitulate. The garrison marched out with the honours of war, and was allowed safe conduct to Limerick. Ginkel directed his march to the same town, which was the only post of consequence that now held field for King James. Within four miles of the place he halted, until the French cannon could be brought from Athlone. Hearing that Lutrel had been seized by the French general D'Ussone, and sentenced to be shot for having proposed to surrender, he sent a trumpeter with the same name to the garrison, to say that it should be put to death for such a proposal, he would make retaliation on the Irish prisoners. On the twenty- fifth day of August the enemy were driven from all their advanced posts; Captain Cole, with a squadron of ships, sailed up the Shannon, and sent two regiments of horse to the post of the town. On the twenty-sixth day of the month the batteries were opened, and a line of contravallation was formed; the Irish army lay encompassed on the other side of the river, on the road to Killowen and Loughrea, surrounded with four regiments of their dragoons. On the fifth day of September, after the town had been almost in ruins by the bombs, and large breaches made in the walls by the battering cannon, the guns were dismounted, the out-forts evacuated, and such other motions made as indicated a resolution to abandon the seige. The enemy expressed their joy in loud acclamations; but this was of short continuance. In the night the besiegers began to throw a bridge of pontoons over the river, about one mile higher up than the camp; and this work was finished before morning. A considerable body of horse and foot had passed when the alarm was given to the enemy, who were seized with a horrible panic. Men, women, and children, were seen in the streets carrying on their arms, and betook themselves to flight, leaving behind them their tents, baggage, two pieces of cannon, and one standard. The bridge was immediately removed nearer to the town, and all the pontoons left in place. For this purpose, he began to descend Kirkcommod-hill with his whole reserve of horse; but in his way was killed by a cannon-ball. His troops immediately halted, and his guards retreated with his body. His fate dispirited the troops, and produced such confusion as Sarphied could not remedy; for though he was next in command, he had been at variance with St. Ruth since the affair at Athlone, and was ignorant of the plan he had concerted. Roumeyny, having passed the hollow way without opposition, charged the enemy in flank, and broke down all before him with surprising impetuosity; the centre redoubled their efforts and pushed the Irish to the top of the hill; and then the whole line giving way at once from right to left, threw down their arms. The foot fled towards a bog in their rear, and their horse took the route by the highway to Loughrea; both were pursued by the English cavalry, who, in four miles made a terrible slaughter. In the battle, which lasted two hours, and in the pursuit, above four thousand of the enemy were slain, and six hundred taken, together with all their baggage, tents, provi- sion, ammunition, and artillery, nine-and-twenty pair of carriages, and almost all the arms of their infantry. In a word, the victory was decisive, and not above eight hundred of the English were killed upon the field of battle. The vanquished retreated in great con- fusion; and from their actions in the day before, it became a matter of necessity, in hope of receiving such succours from France, as would either enable them to retrieve their affairs, or obtain good terms from the court of England. There Tyrconnel died of a broken heart, after having survived his authority and reputation. He had incurred the censure of the French, as well as the hatred of the Irish, whom he had advised to submit to their government, rather than to totally ruin themselves and their families.

§ XII. Then the English made a lodgement within ten paces of the bridge-foot; and the Irish, seeing themselves surrounded on two sides, and the new government with all the laws of Ireland, and conformable with that which they possessed in the reign of Charles II. All persons whatever were entitled to the protection of these laws, and restored to the possession of their estates, privileges, and immunities, upon their submitting to the present government, and taking the oath of allegiance to their majesties. These were transmitted to their successors; and, however, certain persons who were forfeited or exiled. This article even extended to all merchants of Limerick, or any other garrison possessed by the Irish, who happened to be in the sanctuary, and not having been the declaimers, in the first year of the present reign, provided they should return within the term of eight months. All the persons comprised in this and the foregoing article were indulged with a general pardon of all attainders, outlawries, treasons, misdemeanors, and other crimes and misdemeanors whatsoever, committed since the beginning of the reign of James II. and the hostilities promised to use their best endeavours towards the reversal of such attainders and outlawries as had passed against any of them in parliament. In order to alloy the violence of party, and extinguish private animosities, it was agreed, that no person should be sued or imprisoned on either side for any trespass, or made countable for the rents, tenements, lands, or houses he had received or enjoyed since the beginning of the war. Every nobleman and gentleman comprised in these articles was authorized to keep a sword, a rate of pistols, and a gun for his personal defence. The inhabitants of Limerick, and other garrisons were permitted to remove their goods and chattels, without search, visitation, or payment of duty. The lords justices promised to use their best endeavours, that all persons comprised in this capitulation should for eight months be protected from all arrests and executions for debt or damage: they undertook, that their majesties should ratify these articles within the space of eight months, and use all endeavours that they might be ratified and confirmed in parliament. The subsequent article was calculated to indemnify Colonel John Brown, whose estate and effects had been seized for the use of the Irish army by Tyrconnel and Sarsfield, which last had been created Lord Lecan by King James, and was now mentioned by that title. All persons were indulged with free leave to remove with their families and effects to any other country except England and Scotland. All officers and soldiers in the service of King James, comprehending even the Haparcies, willing to go beyond sea, were at liberty to march in bodies to the place of embarkation, to be conveyed to the continent with the French officers and troops, disarmed and distinguished with tokens, conveyances, and carriages by land and water; and General Ginkel engaged to provide seventy ships if necessary for their transportation, with two men of war for the accommodation of their officers, and to serve as a convoy to the fleet. It was stated, that the expenses incurred in this embarkation, and henceforth, should be paid for on their arrival in France: that hostages should be given for this indemnification, as well as for the return of the ships: that all the garrisons should march out of their respective towns and fortresses with the honours of war: that the Irish should have liberty to transport nine hundred horses: that those who should choose to stay behind, might dispose of themselves according to their own fancy, after having surrendered their arms to such commissioners as the general should appoint: that all prisoners of war should be set at liberty on both sides: that the general should provide two vessels to carry over two different persons to France, with intimation of this treaty; and that none of those who were willing to quit the kingdom should be detained on account of debt, or any other pretence.—This is the substance of the famous treaty of Limerick, which the Irish Roman catholics considered as the great charter of their civil and religious interests. The town of Limerick was surrendered to Ginkel; but both sides agreed, that the two armies should entranch themselves till the Irish could embark, that no disorders might arise from a premature transfer of the garrisons.

§ XIIII. The protestant subjects of Ireland were extremely disgust at these concessions made in favour of vanquished rebels, who had exercised such acts of cruelty and rapine. They complained, that they themselves, who had suffered for their loyalty to King William, were neglected, and obliged to sit down with their losses, while their enemies, who had shed so much blood in opposing his government, were indemnified by the articles of the capitulation, and even favoured with particular indulgences. They were dismissed with the honours of war; they were transported after a Turkish reception. The war against the English in foreign countries; an honourable provision was made for the Haparcies, who were professed banditti; the Roman catholic interest in Ireland obtained the most advantageous apologies. Theforfeitures annulled, pardons extended, and laws set aside, in order to effect a pacification. Ginkel had received orders to put an end to the war at any rate, that William might be quit of convulsions near a whole industrious and industrious affairs of the continent. When the articles of capitulation were ratified, and hostages exchanged for being duly executed, about two thousand Irish foot, and three hundred horse, began their march for Cork, where they proposed to take shipping for France, under the conduct of Sarsfield: but three regiments, refusing to quit the kingdom, delivered up their arms, and dispersed to their former habitation. Those who remained at Limerick embarked on the seventh day of November; King William immediately sent a force to Ireland, in order to be at command; and that the King of France had already given orders for their being new clothed, and put into quarters of refreshment.

§ XIV. The reduction of Ireland being thus completed, Baron Ginkel returned to England, and was immediately thanked by the House of Commons for his great services, after he had been created Earl of Athlone by his majesty. When the parliament met on the twenty-second day of October, the king, in his speech, insisted upon the necessity of sending a strong fleet to sea early in the season, and of maintaining a considerable army, to annoy the enemy abroad, as well as to protect the kingdom from insult and invasion; for which purposes, he said, sixty-five thousand men would be barely sufficient. Each House presented an address of congratulation upon his majesty's safe return to England, and on the reduction of Ireland: they promised to assist him, to the utmost of their power, in prosecuting the war and the new treaty. The king made an address to the queen, acknowledging her prudent administration during his majesty's absence. Notwithstanding this appearance of cordiality and complaisance, a spirit of discontent had insinuated itself into both Houses of parliament, and a petition was entered in the House of Commons, for a strict account of expenses incurred in the reduction of Ireland, and for proper economy in future warlike undertakings.

§ XV. A great number of individuals, who wished well to their country, could not, without anxiety and resentment, behold the interest of the nation sacrificed to foreign connexions, and the king's favour so partially bestowed upon Dutchmen, in prejudice to his English subjects. They observed that the number of forces he demanded was considerably greater than that of any army which had ever been paid by the public, even when the nation was in the most imminent danger; that, instead of contributing as allies to the maintenance of the war upon the continent, they had embarked as principals, and bore the greatest part of the burden, though they had the least share of the profit. They even insinuated, that such a standing army was more calculated to make the king absolute at home, than to render him formidable abroad; and the secret friends of the late king did not fail to enforce these insinuations. They removed their objections, however, from the disagreeable part of his character; they dwelt upon his proud reserve, his sullen silence, his imperious disposition, and his base ingratitude, particularly to the Earl of Marlborough, whom he had dismissed from all his employments, and immediately after the treaty of Ryswick, performed in Ireland. The disgrace of this nobleman was partly ascribed to the freedom with which he had complained of the king's undervaluing his services, and partly to the intrigués of his wife, who had gained an ascendancy over the Princess Anne of Denmark, and is said to have employed her influence in fomenting a jealousy between the two sisters. The malcontents of the whig faction, enraged at the duchess's decline in power, to which the Jacobites had raised against the government. They scrupled not to say, that the arts of corruption were shamefully practised, to secure a majority in parliament; that the king was as tender of the prerogatives as his Prestees should ever been; and that he even ventured to admit Jacobites into his council, because they were the known tools of arbitrary power. These reflections alluded to the Earl of Rochester and to the Commons, 'till he was censured in the House of Commons, and the boldest orator that ever filled the speaker's chair. He was intimately acquainted with the business of the House, and knew every individual member so exactly, that with one glance of his eye he could prognosticate the future. Having landed at sea, he had beheld great acrimony, questioned the king's title, censured his conduct, and reflected upon his character. Nevertheless, he now became a proselyte, and was brought into the train.

XVI. The Commons voted three millions, four hundred and eleven thousand, six hundred and seventy-five pounds, for the use of the ensuing year; but the establishment of funds for raising these supplies was retarded, partly by the ill-humoured petitions voted certain regulations with respect to the stock and the traffic; and resolved to petition his majesty, that, according to the said regulations, the East India company should be incorporated by charter. The committee was ordered to bring in a bill for this establishment, and to report against it, and the company's answers proving unsatisfactory, the House addressed the king to dissolve it, and grant a charter to a new company. He said it was an affair of great importance to the trade of the kingdom; therefore, he would consider the subject, and in a little time return a positive answer. The parliament was likewise abused by a pretended conspiracy of the papists in Lancashire, to raise a rebellion, and restore James to the throne. Several persons were seized, and some witnesses examined: but nothing appeared to justify the information. At length one Fuller, a prisoner in the king's bench, offered his evidence, and was brought to the bar of the House of Commons, where he produced some papers. He obtained a blank pass from the king for two persons, who, he said, would come from the continent to give evidence. He was afterwards examined at his own lodgings, where he affirmed, that Colonel Thomas Delaval, and James Hayes, were the witnesses for whom he had procured the pass and the protection. Search was made for them, according to his direction; but no such persons were found. The committee was not satisfied that those persons were an cheat, and false accusers. He was, at the request of the Commons, prosecuted by the attorney general, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; a disgrace which he accordingly underwent.

XVII. A bill for regulating trials in cases of high treason, having been laid aside by the Lords in the preceding session, was now again brought upon the carpet, and passed the House declining all alteration. The design of this bill was to secure the subject from the rigor of the laws which had been exposed in the late reigns: it provided, that the prisoner should be furnished with a copy of his indictment, as also of the panel, ten days before his trial: and, that the prisoner should be examined upon oath as well as the witnesses of the crown. The Lords in their own behalf, added a clause, enacting, that upon the trial of any peer or peeress, for treason or misprision of treason, all the peers and peers of the realm would have a right of vote in the question, and should be duly summoned to assist at the trial: that this notice should be given twenty days before the trial: and, that every peer so summoned, and appearing, should vote upon the occasion. The Commons rejected this amendment: and a free conference ensued. The point was argued with great vivacity on both sides, which served only to inflame the dispute, and render each party the more tenacious of their own opinion. After three conferences that produced nothing but animosity, the bill was dropped: for the Commons resolved to bear the hardships of which they complained, rather than be relieved at the expense of purchasing a new privilege to the Lords; and without advantage the Peers would not contribute to their relief.

XVIII. The next object that engrossed the attention of the lower House, was the miscarriage of the fleet during the summer's expedition. Admiral Russell, who commanded it, having sailed in quest of the enemy; but as the French king had received undoubted intelligence, that the combined squadrons were superior to his navy in number of ships and force of metal, he ordered the fleet to retire. This officer acted with such vivacity, caution, and dexterity, as baffled all the endeavours of Russell, who was, moreover, perplexed with obscure and contradictory orders. Nevertheless, he cruised all summer, either in the channel or in sounds; the latter in particular, secured the homeward-bound Smyrna fleet, in which the English and Dutch had a joint concern, amounting to four millions sterling. Having secured the channel, and sailed along great part of the French coast, he returned to Torbay in the beginning of August, and received fresh orders to put to sea again, notwithstanding his repeated remonstrances against exposing large ships to the storms and gales that always blow about the time of the equinox. He therefore sailed back to soundings, where he continued cruising till the second day of September, when he was overtaken by a violent tempest, which drove him into the channel, and obliged him to make for the port of Plymouth. The weather being bad, he was necessarily more particular in his conduct; the Coronation, a second-rate, foundered at anchor off the Ham-head: the Harwich, a third-rate, bulged upon the rocks and perished; two others ran ashore, but were got off with little damage: but the whole fleet was scattered and distressed. The nation murmured at the supposed misconduct of the admiral, and the Commons subjected him to an inquiry: but, when they examined his papers, orders, and instructions, they perceived he had adhered to them with great punctuality, and thought proper to drop the prosecution out of tenderness to the ministry. Then the House took into consideration some letters which had been intercepted in a French ship taken by Sir Ralph Delaval. Three of these were said to have been written by King James, and the rest sealed with his seal. They related to the plan of an inscription in Scotland, and in the northern parts of England: Legge, Lord Dartmouth, with one Crew, being mentioned as among the agents and abettors in the design, warrants were immediately issued against them; Crew absconded, but Lord Dartmouth was committed to the Tower. Lord Preston was examined; his impudence, his attempt to outwit, the whole House, and his attempt to dupe his own countrymen, were not explain, and pretending ignorance, was imprisoned in Newgate, from whence, however, he soon obtained his release. The funds for the supplies for the ensuing year being established, and several acts passed relating to dismestic regulations, the king, on the twenty-fourth day of February, closed the session with a short speech, thanking the parliament for their demonstrations of affection in the time of his necessity, and pointing out the importance of their intention of repairing speedily to the continent. Then the two Houses, at his desire, adjourned themselves to the twelfth day of April, and the parliament was afterwards prorogued to the twenty-ninth day of May, and proclamation was made.

§ XIX. The king had suffered so much in his reputation by his compliance to the presbyterians of Scotland, and was so displeased with the conduct of that stubborn sect of religious fanatics, that he thought proper to admit some persons to present him to the administration. Johnston, who had been sent envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg, was recalled, and with the Master of Stair, made joint secretary of Scotland; Melville, who had declined in his importance, was made lord pror-geal of that kingdom; Tweedale was constituted lord chancellor; Crawford retained the office of president of the council; and Lothian was appointed high commissioner to the general assembly. The parliament was adjourned to the fifteenth day of April, because it was not yet compliant enough to be assembled with safety; and the episcopal clergy were admitted to a share of the church-government. These measures, instead of healing the divisions, served only to inflame the incipient disputes of the two sects. The episcopal party triumphed in the king's favour, and began to treat their antagonists with insolence and scorn: the presbyterians were incensed to see their friends disgraced, and their enemies distinguished by the king; and they insisted on the authority of the law, which happened to be upon their side: they became more than ever surer, surly, and implacable; they refused to concur with the prelats, or abate in the least circumstance of discipline, and the assembly was dissolved, without any time or place assigned for the next meeting. The presbyterians pretended an independent right of assembling annually, even without a call from his majesty; they therefore adjourned themselves, after having pronounced their declaration, and decreed that their measure, as an insolent invasion of the prerogative, and conceived an aversion to the whole sect, who, in their turn, began to lose all respect for his person and government.

§ XX. As the highlanders were not yet totally reduced, the Earl of Breadalbane undertook to bring them over, by distributing sums of money among their chiefs; and fifteen thousand pounds were remitted from England for this purpose. The clans being informed of this remittance, suspected that the earl's design was to appropriate to himself the best part of the money, and when he began to treat with them, made such extravagant demands, that he found his scheme impracticable. He was therefore obliged to refer the matter to the king, and received from him the sanction of his vengeance with the first opportunity, on those who had frustrated his intention. He who chiefly thwarted his negotiation, was Macdonald of Glencoo, whose opposition rose from a private circumstance, which ought to have had no effect upon a treaty that regarded the public weal. Macdonald had plundered the lands of Breadalbane during the course of hostilities; and this nobleman insisted upon being indemnified for his losses, from the other's share of the money which he employed to distribute. The highlander not only refused to acquiesce in these terms, but, by his influence among the clans, defeated the whole scheme, and the earl in revenge devoted him to destruction. King and tenant had by proclamation resolved this measure, as an insolent invasion of the prerogative, and conceived an aversion to the whole sect, who, in their turn, began to lose all respect for his person and government.

Hill, governor of that fortress. As this officer was not vested with the power of a civil magistrate, he refused to administer them; and Macdonald set out immediately for the assistance of his friend. The weather was covered with snow, and the weather intensely cold, he travelled with such diligence, that the term prescribed by the proclamation was but one day elapsed when he reached the place. He addressed himself to Sir John Campbell, sheriff of the county, who, in consideration of his disappointment at Fort-Williams, was prevailed upon to administer the oaths to him and his adherents. Then they returned back, and the followers of Macdonald of Glencoo, in full confidence of being protected by the government, to which they had so solemnly submitted.

§ XXI. Breadalbane had represented Macdonald at court as an incorrigible rebel, a ruffian inured to bloodshed and rapine, who would never be obedient to the laws of his country; nor live peaceably under any sovereign. He observed that he had paid no regard to the proclamation, and proposed that the government should sacrifice him to the quiet of the kingdom, in extirpating him, with his family and dependents, by military execution. His advice was supported by the suggestions of the other Scottish ministers; and the king, whose chief virtue was not affection, for he was no tender of the happiness of unhappy people, though it does not appear that he knew of Macdonald's submission. An order for this barbarous execution, signed and counter-signed by his majesty's own hand, being transmitted to the Master of Stair, secretary for Scotland, and in the month of February, Captain Campbell, of Glenlyon, by virtue of an order from Major Dunscaochie, marched into the valley of Glencoo, with a company of soldiers belonging to Argyle's regiment, on pretense of affording the inhabitants of the valley the means of an indemnity.

For William, the king, had died, and his men were received with the most cordial hospitality, and lived fifteen days with the men of the valley, in all the appearance of the most unreserved friendship. At length the fatal period approached. Macdonald and Campbell having passed the days together, parted about seven in the evening, with mutual professions of the warmest affection. The younger Macdonald, perceiving the guards doubled, began to suspect some treachery, and communicated his suspicion to his brother; neither he nor the Earl of Breadalbane hazarded to wait for the further time and means with which the prince had intended to work his vengeance with the first opportunity, on those who had frustrated his intention. He who chiefly thwarted his negotiation, was Macdonald of Glencoo, whose opposition rose from a private circumstance, which ought to have had no effect upon a treaty that regarded the public weal. a subordinate officer. Eight-and-thirty persons suffered in this manner, the greater part of whom were surprised in their beds, and hurried into eternity before they had time to improve the divine design; and thus all the males under seventy that lived in the valley, the number of whom amounted to two hundred; but some of the detachments did not arrive soon enough to secure the passes, so that one hundred and sixty escaped. Campbell, having passed the mountains, cut into the valley, and burnt all the houses to be burned, made a prey of all the cattle and effects that were found in the valley, and left the helpless women and children, whose fathers and husbands he had murdered. He afterwards set up a fortified shelter, in the midst of the snow that covered the whole face of the country, at the distance of six long miles from any inhabited place. Distracted with grief and horror, surrounded with the shades of night, shivering with cold, and appalled with the apprehension of immediate death from the swords of those who had sacrificed their friends and kinsmen, they could not endure such a complication of calamities, but generally perished in the waste before they could receive the least comfort or assistance. This barbarous massacre, performed under the sanction of King William's authority, answered the immediate purpose of the court, by striking terror into the hearts of the Jacobite householders, and making them view those who had not renounced every sentiment of humanity, and produced such an aversion to the government as all the arts of a ministry could never totally surmount. A deliberate and protracted system of specious exaginations, and the Jacobites did not fail to expiate upon every circumstance, in domestic libels and private conversation. The king, alarmed at the outrageous cry which was raised upon this occasion, ordered an inquiry to be set on foot, and directed

Ralph, Voltaire. missed the Master of Stair from his employment of secretary; he likewise pretended that he had subscribed the order amiss a heap of other papers, full out knowing the purport of it; but as he did not severely punish those who had made his authority subservient to their own cruel reparation, the imputation stuck fast to his character, and the highlanders, though terrified into silence and submission, were inspired with the most implacable resentment against his person and administration.

§ XXII. A great number in both kingdoms waited impatiently for an opportunity to declare in behalf of their exiled monarch, who was punctually informed of all these transactions, and endeavored to make his advantage of the growing discontent. King William having settled the domestic affairs of the nation, and provided for the necessary supplications of a formidable fleet, embarked for Holland on the fifth day of March, and was received by the States-general with expressions of the most cordial regard. While he was here employed in promy was in mention of their influence in the society, the French king resolved to invade England in his absence, and seemed heartily engaged in the interest of James, whose emissaries in Britain began to bestir themselves with uncommon assiduity, in preparing the nation for his return. One Lant, who was imprisoned on suspicion of distributing his commissions, had the good fortune to be released, and the papists of Lancashire despatched him to the court of St. Germain's, with an assurance that he would be in condition to receive their old sovereign. He returned with advice that King James would certainly land in the spring; and that Colonel Parker and other officers should be sent over with full instructions to receive the king, and be ready to assist his arrival. Parker accordingly repaired to England, and made the Jacobites acquainted with the whole scheme of a descent, which Louis had actually concerted with the late king. He assured them that their lawful sovereign would once more visit his British dominions, at the head of thirty thousand effective men, to be embarked at La Hogue; that the transports were already prepared, and a strong squadron of ships of war, under the direction of the admiral, exerted them to be speedy and secret in their preparations, that they might be in readiness to take arms, and co-operate in effecting his restoration. This officer, and one Johnson, a priest, are said to have undertaken the assassination of the king of France, in the expectation of delivering the country, and establishing the legality of the king, and his majesty set sail for Holland.

§ XXIII. Meanwhile, James addressed a letter to several lords who had been formerly members of his council, as well as to other friends, informing them of his intentions, and desiring the pregnancy of his queen, and requiring them to attend as witnesses at the labour. He took notice of the injury his family and honour had sustained, from the cruel aspersions of his enemies concerning the birth of his son, and as Providence had now favoured him with an opportunity of rectifying the calumny of those who affirmed that the queen was incapable of child-bearing, he assured them, in the name of his brother, the French king, as well as upon his own royal word, that they should have free leave to visit his court, and return after the labour. This invitation, however, no person would venture to accept. He afterwards employed his emissaries in circulating a printed declaration, that he had ordered the Lord Protector to make another effort to retrieve his crown; and that, although he was furnished with a number of troops sufficient to unite the hands of his subjects, he did not intend to disturb the peace of the nation by means of restoring their lawful king and their ancient government. He exhorted the people to join his standard. He assured them that the foreign auxiliaries should behave with the most regular discipline, and be not back immediately after his re-establishment. He observed, that when such a number of his subjects were so inattentive as to concur with the unnatural design of the Prince of Orange, he had chosen to rest upon the fidelity of his English subjects, and refused considerable succours that were offered to him by his most christian majesty; that when he was ready to oppose force with force, he nevertheless offered to give all reasonable satisfaction to his subjects who had been misled, and endeavored to open their eyes, with respect to the vain pretences of his adversary, whose arm was not the reformation but the subversion of the government: that when he saw himself deserted by his army, betrayed by his ministers, abandoned by his favourites, and even his own children, and at last driven from his own palace by a guard of insolent foreigners, he had, for his personal safety, taken refuge in France: that his retreat from the mainland was attended with such instances of submission to the power and authority of his adversaries, that the French king was induced to make the most formidable effort to invade his country, and was received by the States-general with expressions of the most cordial respect. While he was there employed in promy was in mention of their influence in the society, the French king resolved to invade England in his absence, and seemed heartily engaged in the interest of James, whose emissaries in Britain began to bestir themselves with uncommon assiduity, in preparing the nation for his return. He assured them that their lawful sovereign... now enumerated. He declared that all soldiers who should quitt the service of the usurper, and enlist under his highness, should be sums for the use of the public; and, if their arms; and that the foreign troops, upon laying down their arms, should be paid and transported to their respective countries. He solemnly protested that he would prosecute the cause with all his might, as by the laws established, in all her rights, privileges, and possessions: he signified his resolution to use influence with the parliament for allowing liberty of conscience to all his subjects, as an indulgence agreeable to the spirit of the Christian religion, and to his intention to diffuse and promote that liberty. He said his principal care should be to heal the wounds of the late distractions; to restore trade by observing the act of navigation, which had been lately so much violated in favour of strangers; to put the navy in a flourishing condition: and to take every step that might contribute to the greatness of the monarchy and the happiness of the people. He concluded with professions of resignation to the divine will, declaring that all who should reject his orders of mercy and appear in arms against him, would be as answerable to Almighty God for all the blood that should be spilt, and all the miseries in which these kingdoms might be involved by their desperate and unreasonable course.

§ XXIV. While this declaration operated variously on the minds of the people, Colonel Parker, with some other officers, enlisted two privately for the service of James in the Isle of Man, at the instance of the bishop of Durham: at the same time, Fountaine and Holman were employed in raising two regiments of horse at London, that they might join their master immediately after his landing. His partisans sent Captain Lloyd with an express to Lord Melfort, containing a detail of these particulars, with an assurance that they had brought over Rear-Admiral Carter to the interest of his majesty. They likewise transmitted a list of the ships that composed the English fleet, and exhibited James to his influence with the French king, that the Count de Toulouse might be ordered to attack them before they should be joined by the Dutch squadron. It was in consequence of this advice, that Louis commanded Toulouse to fall upon the English fleet, even without waiting for the Toulon squadron, commanded by the Marquis D'Etres. By this time James had repaired to La Hogue, and was ready to embark with his army, consisting of a body of French troops, together with some English and Scotch refugees, and the regiments which had been transported from Ireland by Virtue of the capitulation of Limerick.

§ XXV. The ministry of England was informed of all these proceedings, partly by some agents of James, who betrayed his cause, and partly by Admiral Carter, who gave the queen to understand he had been tampered with; and was instructed to use the Jacobites with a negociating spirit. The French, having pursued the English, hastened the naval preparations of the Dutch, so that their fleet was ready for sea sooner than was expected: and when he received the first intimation of the projected descent, he detached General Polievre with three of the English regiments from Holland. These, reinforced with other troops remaining in England, were ordered to encamp in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth. The queen issued a proclamation, commanding all papists to depart from London and Westminster: the members of both Houses of parliament were required to meet on the twenty-fourth day of May, that she might avail herself of their advice in such a perilous conjuncture. Warrants were expedited for apprehending divers disaffected persons; and they withdrawing themselves from their respective places of abode, a proclamation was published for discovering and bringing them to justice. The Earls of Scarsdale, Litchfield, and Northington; the Lords Gifford, Forster, Sir John Fenwick, Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, and others; found means to elude the search. The Earls of Huntington and Marlborough were sent to the Tower; Edward Dudley, Kewen, Hastings, and Robert Ferguson, were imprisoned in the Tower, with their domestics.

Sir Andrew Forrester, discovered in a quaker's house, and committed to prison, with several other persons of distinction. The trammels of London and Westminster were armed, and all the gates were posted with pardoners of arms; and that the foreign troops, upon laying down their arms, should be paid and transported to their respective countries. He solemnly protested that he would prosecute the cause with all his might, as by the laws established, in all her rights, privileges, and possessions: he signified his resolution to use influence with the parliament for allowing liberty of conscience to all his subjects, as an indulgence agreeable to the spirit of the Christian religion, and to his intention to diffuse and promote that liberty. He concluded with professions of resignation to the divine will, declaring that all who should reject his orders of mercy and appear in arms against him, would be as answerable to Almighty God for all the blood that should be spilt, and all the miseries in which these kingdoms might be involved by their desperate and unreasonable course.

§ XXVI. On the eleventh day of May, Russell sailed from Rye to St. Helen's, where he was joined by the squadrons under Delaval and Carter. There he received a letter from the Earl of Nottingham, intimating that a report had arrived from the French coast, concerning the fidelity of the sea officers, her majesty had ordered him to declare in her name, that she repose the most entire confidence in their attachment; and believed the report was raised by the enemies of the government. The flag officers and captains forthwith drew up a very loyal and dutiful address, which was graciously received by the queen, and published for the satisfaction of the nation. Russell, being reinforced by the Dutch squadrons, commanded by Alle- moode, Callenbergh, and Vandergoes, set sail for the coast of France on the eighteenth day of May, with a fleet of ninety-nine ships of the line, besides frigates and fire-ships. Next day, about three o'clock in the morning, he discovered a French squadron, under the flag of Tourville, and threw out the signal for the line of battle, which by eight o'clock was formed in good order, the Dutch in the van, the blue division in the rear, and the red in the centre. The French fleet consisted of two squadrons, one under the line, and, as they were to windward, Tourville might have avoided an engagement: but he had received a positive order to fight, on the supposition that the Dutch and English squadrons had not joined. Louis, indeed, was apprised of their junction before they were desired by his admiral, to whom he despatched a countermarching order by two several vessels: but one of them was taken by the English, and the other did not arrive till the day after the engagement.

§ XXVII. Toulouse, therefore, in obedience to the first mandate, bore down along side of Russell's own ship, which he engaged at a very small distance. He fought with great fury till one o'clock, when his rigging and sails being considerably damaged, his ship, the Rising Sun, which carried one hundred and four cannon, was towed out of the line in great disorder. Nevertheless the engagement continued till three, when the fleets were parted by a thick fog. When this abated, the enemy were desirous of flying to the northward; and Russell made the signal for chasing. Part of the blue squadron came up with the enemy about eight in the evening, and engaged them half an hour, in which the Dutch were driven to the eastward, and wounded. Finding himself in extremity, he exhorted his captain to fight as long as the ship could swim; and expired with great composure. At length the French bore away for the westward, the rising time, to avoid the other day's action. Next day, about eight in the morning, they were discovered crowding away to the westward, and the combined fleets chased with all the sail they could carry, until Russell's fore-topmast came by the board. Though he was retarded by this accident, the fleet still continued the pursuit, and anchored near Cape La Hogue. On the twenty-second of the month, about seven in the morning, part of the French fleet was perceived near the Race of Aldeveny, some at anchor, and some driven to the eastward with the tide of flood. Russell, and the ships nearest him, immediately slipped their cables and chased. The Rising Sun, having lost her masts, ran ashore near Cher- bourg, where she was burnt by Sir Ralph Delaval, together with the Admiral, another first-rate, and the Conquerant of eighty guns. Eighteen other ships of their fleet ran into La Hogue, where they were attacked by Sir George Rooke, who destroyed them, and a great number of trans- ports laden with ammunition, in the midst of a terrible fire from the enemy, and in sight of the Irish camp. Sir John Ashby, with his own squadron and some Dutch ships, pursued the rest of the French fleet, which escaped through the Sound of Tofvoll, and, as he has before observed, as the English could not attempt, without exposing them: ships to the most imminent hazard. This was a very mortifying defeat to the French king, who had been so long flattered with an uninterrupted series of victories: it reduced James to the lowest ebb of despondency, as it frustrated the whole scheme of his embarkation, and overwhelmed his friends in England with grief and despair. Some days after, the fleet carried this victory with all the advantages that might have been obtained, before the enemy recovered of their consternation. They say his affection to the service was in a good measure cooled by the deficiency of his pay and provisioning at Harwich: that he hated the Earl of Nottingham, by whose channel he received his orders; and, that he adhered to the latter rather than to the spirit of his instructions. But the purest success could never be a sufficient return for his manifold services to the nation. He acted in this whole expedition with the genuine spirit of a British admiral. He fled from the Nore to the Downs with a very scanty wind, through the dangerous sands, contrary to the advice of all his pilots; and by this bold passage effected a junction of the different squadrons, which otherwise the French would have attacked angrily, and perhaps defeated. He behaved with great gallantry during the engagement; and destroyed about fifteen of the enemy's capital ships; in a word, he obtained such a decisive victory, that during the remaining part of the war the French would not hazard another battle by sea with the English. Notwithstanding this, his pay and ammenities were so small, his principal motive was, to take on board a number of troops provided for a descent upon France, which had been projected by England and Holland, with a view to alarm and distract the enemy in their own dominions. The queen was so pleased with the victory, that she ordered thirty thousand pounds to be distributed among the sailors. She caused medals to be struck in honour of the action; and the pay and pensions of all the seamen, who had been killed in the battle, to be interred with great funeral pomp. In the latter end of July, seven thousand men, commanded by the Duke of Leinster, embarked on board transports, to be landed at St. Maloes, Brest, or Rochefort; and the nation conceived the most sanguine hopes of this expedition. A council of war, consisting of land and sea officers, being held on board the Breda, to deliberate upon the scheme of the ministry, the members unanimously advised the campaign to be terminated, and to put it in execution. Nevertheless, the admiral having detached Sir John Ashby with a squadron, to intercept the remains of the French fleet, in their passage from St. Malo to Rochefort; and in the meantime, the fleet and transports: but a few days the wind shifting, he was obliged to return to St. Helen's.

§ XXIX. The queen immediately dispatched the Marquis of Caermershan, the Earl of Devonshire, Dorset, Nottingham, and Rochester, together with the Lords Sidney and Cornwallis, to consult with the admiral, who demonstrated the impracticability of making an effectual descent upon the coast of France at that season of the year. The design was therefore laid aside; and the forces were transported to Flanders. The higher the hopes of the nation had been raised by this armament, the deeper they felt their disappointment. A loud clamour was raised against the ministry in the country at this miscarriage. The people complained that they were plundered and abused; that immense sums were extorted from them by the most grievous impositions: that, by the infamous expedi- ment of borrowing upon established funds, their taxes were perpetuated; that their burdens would daily increase; that their treasure was either squandered away in chimerical projects, or expended in foreign connexions, of which England was naturally independent. They were the more affected with this miscarriage, as the trade had suffered grievously by the French privateers, which swarmed in the channel. In vain the merchants had recourse to the admiralty, which could not spare port- money for their exactions. They were obliged to require the defence of the nation. The French king was clothing further to apprehend from the English armament, with whom he drew his troops from the coast of Normandy; and James returned in despair to St. Germain's, where his queen had been in his absence delivered of a daughter, who was born in the presence of the Archbishop of Paris, the keeper of the seals, and other members of the administration.

§ XXX. Louis had taken the field in the latter end of May. On the twentieth day of that month he arrived at his camp in Flanders, with all the effeminate pomp of an Asiatic emperor, accompanied by his women and parasites, his land of music, his dancers, his opera, and in a word, by all the ministers of luxury and sensual pleasure. Having reviewed his army, which amounted to about one hundred and thirty thousand men, he undertook the siege of Namur, which he invested on both sides of the Scheld, with about one half of his army, while the other covered the siege under the command of Luxembourg. Namur is situated on the confines of the Meuse and the Scheld. The citadel was deemed one of the strongest forts in Flanders, strengthened with a new work contrived by the famous engineer Coehorn, who now defended it in person. The Prince de Harsason commanded the garrison, consisting of nine thousand men. The place was well supplied; and the governor knew that King William would make strong efforts for its relief; so that the besiegers were animated with many concurring considerations. By this time also, the French were resolved to attack the French lines without great disadvantage. The besiegers, encouraged by the presence of their monarch, and assisted by the superior abilities of Vauban their engineer, renewed their efforts with vigour, that the fort of Coehorn was surrendered after a very obstinate defence, in which he himself had been dangerously wounded. The citadel being thus left exposed to the approaches of the enemy, could not long withstand the violence of their operations. The two covered ways were taken by assault: on the twentieth of May the governor capitulated, to the unspeakable mortification of King William, who saw himself obliged to retreat at the head of a powerful army, and he an eye-witness of the surrender of the most important fortress in the Netherlands. Louis having taken possession of the place, returned in triumph to Versailles, where he was flattered with all the arts of seduction; while the nation reflected on his advantage, from his miscarriage, and the Prince of Barbersac inured the suspicion of treachery or misconduct.

§ XXXI. Luxembourg having placed a strong garrison in Namur, detached Boufflers with a body of troops to La Bassoure; and with the rest of his army encamped at Soignies. The King of England sent off detachments towards Liege and Ghent; and on the sixth day of July posted himself at Genap, resolved to seize the first opportunity of retrieving his honour by attacking the enemy. Having received intelligence that the French general was in motion, and intended to take post between Steenkirk and Enghien, he passed the river Sene, in order to anticipate his purpose, but the approach of the enemy. Luxembourg gained his point; and William encamped at Lembek, within six miles of the French army. Here he resolved, in a council of war, to attack the enemy; and every dispositions was made for that purpose. The heavy baggage he ordered to be conveyed to the other side of the river Sene; and one Millevaux, a detected spy, was compelled by menaces to mislead Luxembourg with false intelligence, importing that he need not be alarmed at the moatsof the allies, who intended the next day to make the field forage. On the twenty-fourth day of July the army began to move from the left, in two columns, as the ground would not admit of their marching in an extended front. The Prince of Orange formed the head of the allies, at the head of ten battalions of English, Danish, and Dutch infantry: he was supported by a considerable body of British horse and foot, commanded by Lieutenant-General Mackay. Though the ground was intersected by hedgerows and marshes, but despite this prone marched with such diligence, that he was in a condition to begin the battle about two in the afternoon, when he charged the French with such impetuosity that they were driven from their posts, and their whole camp became the scene of tumult and confusion. Luxembourg, trusting to the intelligence he had received, allowed himself to be surprised; and it required the full exertions of his superior talents, to remedy the consequences of his neglect. He forthwith gave a signal indisposition under which he left his lines unprovided; he rallied his broken battalions: he drew up his forces in order of battle, and led them to the charge in person. The Duke de Chartres, who was then in the fifteenth year of his age, the Dukes of Bourbon and Vendome, the Prince of Conti, and a great number of volunteers of the first quality, put themselves at the head of the household troops, and fell with great fury upon the English, who were very ill supported by Count Solmes, the officer who commanded the centre of the allies. The Prince of Wirttemberg had taken one of the enemy's batteries, and actually penetrated into their lines; but finding himself in danger of being overpowered by numbers, he sent a aide-de-camp with a note to Charles, written on the back of a letter for the receipt of which he learned, saying, "Let us see what sort these English bull-dogs will make." At length when the king sent an express order, commanding him to sustain the left wing, he made a change of front, which could not be met by the enemy's fantry kept their ground; and the British troops, with a few Dutch and Danes, bore the whole brunt of the engagement. They fought with surprising courage and perseverance against dreadful odds; and the event of the battle continued doubtful, until Boufflers joined the French army with a great body of dragoons. The allies could not sustain the additional weight of this reinforcement, before which they gave way, though the retreat was made in tolerable order, and the enemy did not think proper to prosecute the advantage they had gained. In this action the confederates lost the Earl of Angus, General Mackay, Sir John Finister, Sir Robert Douglas, and many other gallant officers, together with about three thousand men left dead on the spot, the same number wounded or taken, a great many colours and standards, and several pieces of cannon.

§ XXXII. The French, however, reaped no solid advantage from this victory, which cost them about three thousand men, including the Prince of Turenne, the Marquis de Bellefonde, Tallatde, and Feresacon, with many officers of distinction: as for Mlleveaux the spy, he was hanged; and on the right wing, King William retired un molested to his own camp; and notwithstanding all his overthrows, continued a respectable enemy, by dint of invincible fortitude, and a genius fruitful in subterfuges. He was formed at the French notion: even in the midst of his ill success, appears from divers undeniable testimonies, and from none more than from the extravagance of joy expressed by the people of France, on occasion of this unimportant victory. When the princes who served in the battle returned to Paris, the roads through which they passed were almost blocked up with multitudes; and the whole air resounded with acclamation. All the ornaments of the fashion peculiar to both sexes adopted the name of Steenkerke: every individual who had been personally engaged in the action was revered as a being of a superior species; and the transports of the women rose almost to a degree of frenzy.

§ XXXIII. The French ministry did not entirely depend upon the fortune of the war for the execution of their revenge against King William. They likewise employed assassins to deprive him of life, in the most treacherous manner. When Louvois died, his son, the Marquis de Bellefonde, succeeded him. The minister had been seen in the court, among his papers, the draft of a scheme for this purpose, and immediately revived the design, by means of the Chevalier de Grandval, a captain of dragoons in the service of the Prince de Condé, to murder him. This project was undertook by none other than Madame de Maistelon, and Paparel, paymaster to the French army, who undertook to assassinate King William. Madame de Maistelon, and Paparel, paymaster to the French army, were privy to the scheme, which they encouraged: the conspirators are said to have obtained an audience of King James, who approved of their undertaking, and assured them of his assistance; but this unfruitful research was not unjustly charged with the guilt of countenancing the intended murder, as they communicated nothimg to him but an attempt to seize the person of the Prince of Orange.

Dumout actually exerted himself with a view at the moment that he might have the better opportunity to shoot the King of England when he should ride out to visit the lines, while Grandval and Parker repaired to the French camp, with orders from Luxembourg to furnish them with a party of horse for use against Dumout for his treachery, but they disguised their purpose. Whether this man's heart failed him, or he could not find the opportunity he desired, after having resided some weeks in the camp of the allies, he retired to Hanover; but still corresponded with Grandval and Berkenexx. This last admitted one Leefdale, a Dutch baron, into the secret, and likewise imparted it to Monsieur Chanas, quarter-master-general of the French army, who nominated Grandval and Leefdale with the promise of a considerable reward, and promised to co-operate with Parker for bringing off Dumout, for this assassin still persisted in his undertaking. Leefdale had been sent from Holland, on purpose to dive to the bottom of this conspiracy, to con secure the Council of War, which was given by the King of England, where Dumout had dropped some hints that alarmed his suspicion. The Dutchman not only insinuated himself into the confidence of the conspirators, but likewise reported their movements to Dumout, who immediately ordered them arrested. Understanding that Dumout had already discovered the design to the Duke of Zell, and that he himself had been betrayed by Leefdale, he freely confessed all the particulars without enduring the torture; and, being found guilty by a court-martial, was executed as a traitor.

§ XXXIV. About this period the Duke of Leinster arrived at Ostend, with the troops which had been embarked at St. Helen's. He was furnished with cannon sent down to the enemy from Maastricht, and reinforced by a large detachment from the king's camp at Gramont, under the command of General Pinelomache. He took possession of Furnes, was joined by the Earl of Portland and M. d'Auverguens, and a disposition was made for investing Dunkirk; but, on further deliberation, the enterprise was thought too dangerous, and therefore laid aside. Furnes and D Dixmuyde, lately captured by Bridgadier Ramsay, were strengthened with new works, and secured by strong garrisons. The cannon were sent back, and the troops returned to Ostend, re-embarked for England. This fruitless expedition, added to the inglorious issue of the campaign, increased the ill-humour of the British nation. They taxed the minister, with his Philip-William alliance, with an army of one hundred thousand men, while Luxembourg was posted at Courtwar with half that number. They said, if he had found the French lines too strong to be forced, he might have joined with the Spaniards who had laid the enemy's conquests under contribution, but even marched into the bowels of France; and they complained that Furnes and Dixmuyde were not worth the sums expended in maintaining their garrisons. On the twenty-sixth day of September, King William left the armists under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, and repaired to his house at Lou: in two days after his departure the camp at Gramont was broke up; the infantry marched to Mar-enrave, and the horse to Caestre. On the sixteenth day of October, the king receiving intelligence that Boufflers had invested Charleroy, and Luxembourg taken post in the neighbourhood of Condé, ordered the troops to be instantly re-assembled between the village of Iselt and Hallé, with design to raise the siege, and repaired to Brussels, where he held a council of war, in which the proper measures were concerted. He then returned to Holland, leaving the command with the Elector of Bavaria, who forthwith repaired to Brussels. Notwithstanding this, Boufflers abandoned the siege, and moved towards Philipsville. The elector having reinforced the place and thrown up new forts, and distributed his forces into winter-quarters, had a general council at Condé, and sent one Dumont, who undertook the siege of Condé, Leuze, and Tourmai, returned to Paris, leaving Boufflers to command in his absence.

§ XXXV. The allies had been unsuccessful in Flanders, and they were not fortunate in Germany. The Landgrave of Hesse Cassel undertook the siege of Ebersberg, which, however, he was obliged to abandon. The Duke de Longres, who commanded the French forces on the Rhine, died of sickness, on the 20th of September, the 2nd of Württemberg, who had posted himself with four thousand horse near Emden, to check the progress of the enemy. Count Tallard having invested Blenheim, the landgrave made a sort of truce, and the French, who were obliged to desist, and retreat with considerable damage. The Elector of Saxony had engaged to bring an army into the field; but he complained that the emperor left the burden of the war with France upon the prince, and that he had no authority to raise the force of the campaign in Hungary. A jealousy and misunderstanding ensued: Schoening, the Saxon general, in his way to the hot-baths at Dablitz in Bohemia, was seized by the emperor's order on suspicion of having maintained a private correspondence with the enemy, and very warm expostulations on this subject passed between the courts of Vienna and Dresden. Schoening was detained two years in custody; and at length released, on condition that he should never be employed again in the empire. The war in Hungary produced no event of importance. The ministry of the Ottoman Pore was distracted by factions, and the seraglio threatened with tumults. The people were turned to desertions; and the empire was left almost desolate; and in the midst of this confusion, the garrison of Great Waradin, which had been blockaded by the imperialists during the whole winter, surrendered on condition that the province of the country should be returned to the empire. Vienna, was sent to Constantinople, with powers to mediate a peace: but the terms offered by the emperor were rejected at the Porte: the Turkish army lay upon the defensive, and the season was spent in a fruitless negotiation.

§ XXXVI. The prospect of affairs in Piedmont was favourable for the allies; but the court of France had brought the Pope to an accommodation, and began to tamper with the Duke of Savoy. M. Chanlais was sent to Turin; and theama of conquests, which, however, the duke would not accept, because he thought himself entitled to better terms, considering that the allied army in Piedmont amounted to fifty thousand effective men, while Catinat's forces were not sufficient to defend his conquests in that country. In the month of July the duke marched into Dauphiné, where he plundered a number of villages, and reduced the fortress of Guillestre; then passing the river Rhone, he invested Ambrun, which, after a siege of ninety days, surrendered, on capitulation; he afterwards took all the neighbouring towns under contribution. Here Duke Schomberg, who commanded the auxiliaries in the English pay, published a declaration, in the name of King William II, of Orange, inviting the rebellious to join him in his designs; and he promised them that his master had no other design in ordering his troops to invade France, but that of restoring the noblesea to their ancient splendour, their parliaments to their former authority, and the people to their just privileges. He even offered his protection to the clergy, and promised to use his endeavours for reviving the edict of Nantes, which had been guaranteed by the King of England. These offers, however, produced little effect; and the Germans ravaged the whole country, in revenge for the cruelties which the French had committed in the Palatinate. The allied army advanced from Ambrun to Gap, on the frontier of Provence, and this place submitted without opposition. The inhabitants of Grenoble, the capital of Dauphiné, and even of Lyons, were overwhelmed with consternation; and a fairer opportunity of humbling France could never occur, as that part of the kingdom had been left almost quite defenceless; but this was falsely negated, either from the spirit of dissension which began to prevail in the allied army, or from the indisposition of the Duke of Savoy, who was sised with the small-pox in the midst of this expedition; or, lastly, from his want of sincerity, which was not expected on the part of a prince, who from the beginning of September the shock of an earthquake was felt in complaisance to which he retarded the operations of the confederates. Certain it is, he evacuated all his conquests, and about the middle of September quitted the French territories, after having pillaged and laid waste the country through which he had penetrated. In Catalonia the French attempted nothing of importance during this campaign, and the Spaniards were wholly inactive in that province.

§ XXVII. The protestant interest in Germany acquired an accession of strength, by the creation of a ninth electorate in favour of Ernest Augustus, Duke of Hanover. He had, by this time, renounced all his connections with France, and engaged to enter heartily into the interest of the allies, to contribute the forces of his province to the enemies of religion. King William exerted himself so vigorously in his behalf at the court of Viennas, that the emperor agreed to the proposal in case the consent of the other electors could be procured. This assent, however, was extorted by the importunities of the King of England, whom he durst not disoblige. Leopold was blindly beguiled to the religion of Rome, and consequently averse to any new creation that would weaken the catholic interest in the electoral college. He, therefore, employed his emissaries to thwart the duke's measures. Some protestant princes opposed him from motives of jealousy, and promised the French king all his allies and influence, to prevent the elevation of the House of Hanover in this manner. The duke had surrounded all this opposition, so far as to gain over a majority of the electors, new objections were started. The emperor suggested that another papish electorate should be created to balance the Lutheran power. He therefore supported the application from that of Hanover; and he proposed that Austra should be raised to the same dignity: but violent opposition was made to this expedient, which would have vested the emperor with a double vote in the imperial council. At length, after a tedious negotiation, the Duke of Hanover, on the nineteenth day of December, was honoured with the investiture, as Elector of Brunswick; created Great Marshal of the empire, and duke homage to the emperor; and, notwithstanding all the objections, because he had not been able to procure the unanimous consent of all the electors.

Public virtue was the object of ridicule, and the whole kingdom was overspread with immorality and corruption; towards the increase of which, many concerning circumstances were contributed. The court was divided into three parties, namely, the Whigs, the Jacobites, and the discontented revolutionists; these factions took all opportunities to thwart, to expose, and to ridicule the measures and principles of each other: so that patronage was exchanged for ridicule, and public character for personal pretexts. This contention established a belief that every man consulted his own private interest at the expense of the public; a belief that soon grew into a maxim almost universal. The conduct of the king, the haughty and insolent speeches which he made in parliament had a pernicious influence upon the morals of all ranks of people, from the candidate to the lowest borough-elector. The expedient of establishing funds for raising supplies to defray the expenses of government threw large premiums and sums of money into the hands of low, sordid usurers, brokers, and jobbers, who distinguished themselves by the name of the Monied-Interest. Intoxicated by this flow of wealth, they affected to rival the luxury and magnificence of their superiors; but being destitute of sentiment and taste, to conduct them in their new career, they ran into the most absurd and illiberal extravagances. They laid aside all decorum; became conceited of their capital; and the nothing example was caught by the vulgar. All principle, and even decency, was gradually banished; talent lay uncultivated, and the state was deluged with a tide of ignorance and debauchery.

§ 11. So many persons of character and distinction had been imprisoned during this reign, upon the slightest suspicion of disloyalty, that every nation had some reason to insinuate, they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. They affirmed, that the habeas-corpus act was either insufficient to protect the subject from false imprisonment, or had been shamefully misused. They expatiated upon the loss of ships, which had lately fallen a prey to the enemy; the consumption of seamen; the neglect of the fisheries; the interruption of commerce, in which the nation was supplanted by her allies, as well as invaded by her enemies. They complained of the kingdom's treasure, exhausted in hiring foreign bottoms, and paying foreign troops to fight foreign quarrels; and the slaughter of the best and bravest of their countrymen, who had been levied with levities upon peacemaking with which they ought to have had no concern. They demonstrated the mischief that necessarily arose from the unsettled state of the nation. They observed that the government could not be duly established, until a solemn declaration should confirm the legality of that tenure by which their majesties possessed the throne; that the structure of parliament was deficient in point of solidity, as they existed entirely at the pleasure of the crown, which would use them no longer than they should be found necessary in raising supplies for the use of the government. They exclaimed against the practice of quartering soldiers in private houses, contrary to the ancient laws of the land, the prevailing and spreading ignorance, and neglect of public education, and lastly, asked what was the authority of the senate of the nobility, and to whose titles and privileges the nation was accustomed, and how the public had lost by it?

As for the Jacobites, they gladly contributed their assistance to promote any scheme that had a tendency to embarrass the administration.

§ IV. The king, in his speech to parliament, thanked them for their last supplies, congratulated them upon the victory obtained at sea,condoned them upon the bad success of the campaign by land, magnified the power of France, represented the necessity of sending a force to oppose it, and demanded subsidies equal to the occasion. He expressed his reluctance to load them with additional burdens, which, he said, could not be avoided, without exposing his kingdom to inevitable destruction. He desired their advice towards lessening the inconvenience of exporting money for the payment of the forces. He intimated a design of making a descent upon France; declared he had heard that it was expected by the people; and that he would again cheerfully expose his life for the welfare of the nation. The Lords, after an adjournment of three days, began with great warmth to assure the king that he had never been heard to speak so much about the alteration of the Constitution in the cases of the Earl of Marlborough, and the other noblemen, who had been apprehended, committed to prison, and afterwards admitted to bail by the court of quarter sessions. The king, observing that during a violent debate, the House ordered Lord Lucas, constable of the Tower, to produce the warrants of commitment, and the clerk of the king’s bench to deliver the affidavit of Aaron Smith, the court solicitor, upon which the lords had been remanded to prison. At the same time the whole affair was referred to a committee, empowered to send for persons, papers, and records. The judges were ordered to attend: Aaron Smith was examined, and desired to advise his majesty to prevent such mischiefs for the future by employing men of knowledge, ability, and integrity. Individual members inveighed bitterly against cabinet councils, as a novelty in the British system of government, and against the practice by which the government had been conducted. They complained that all the grievances of the nation proceeded from the vicious principles of the ministry; they observed that he who opposed the establishment could not be expected to support it with zeal. The Earl of Nottingham was mentioned by name, and the House resolved that his majesty should be advised to employ in his councils such persons only whose principles obliged them to support his rights against the late king, and all other pretendors. Marlborough’s interest still predominated in the Commons. His friend Russell acquitted himself to the satisfaction of the House, and shifted the blame of the miscarriage upon his enemy the Earl of Nottingham, by declaring that twenty years before he had been asked by the House, and by his majesty’s advice.

The Commons having voted an address of thanks, and another praying that his majesty’s foreign alliances should be laid before them, determined on a bill for regulating trials in cases of high treason. They passed a vote of thanks to Admiral Russell, his officers, and seamen, for the victory they had obtained, and then proceeded to an inquiry, why that victory had not been pursued; why the descent had not been made; and why the trade had not been better protected from the enemy’s cruisers. The admirals having justified his own conduct, they commanded the lords of the admiralty to produce copies of all the letters and orders which had been sent to the admirals; they ordered Russell to lay before them his answers, and the commissioners of the transports, victuallers, and office of ordnance to deliver in an account of their proceedings. Then they presented addresses to the king and queen, acknowledging the favor of God in restoring him to his people; congratulating him upon his deliverance from the snare of his open and secret enemies; and assuring him they would, according to his majesty’s desire in his most gracious speech, he always ready to advise and assist his people in the support of his government. The queen was thanked for her gracious and prudent administration during his majesty’s absence; they congratulated her on their signal deliverance from a bold and cruel design formed for their destruction, as well as on the glorious victory which her fleet had gained; and they assured her that the grateful sense they had of their happiness under her government, should always be manifested in constant returns of duty and obedience.

The Commons no longer insisted upon their points of advice. Their whole attention was now centred in the article of assistance. They granted about two millions for the maintenance of three-and-thirty thousand seamen, the building of some additional ships of war, and the finishing of Plymouth dock, and seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds to supply the deficiency of the quarterly poll. The estimates of the land-service were not discussed without tedious debates, and warm disputes. The ministry demanded fifty-four thousand men, twenty thousand of whom should be sent at once to defend the nation, while the rest should serve abroad in the allied army. Many members declared their aversion to a foreign war, in which the nation had no immediate concern, and so little prospect of success. Others agreed that the allies should be mustered on the continent with a proportion of British forces; but that the nation should act as an auxiliary, not as a principal, and pay no more than what the people would cheerfully contribute to the general expense. They also declared, that by running the expense of that of prolonging the debate, Ministerial influence had surmounted all opposition. The House voted the number of men demanded. Such was their servile compliance, that when they examined the treaties by which the English and Dutch contracted, the German princes, and found that, notwithstanding these treaties, they bore twothirds of the expense, they overlooked this flagrant instance of partiality, and enabled the king to say, Nay, their maxims were so much altered, that instead of prosecuting their resentment against foreign encroachments, they assented to a motion that the Prince of Wirttemberg, the Major-Generals Tettau and Laforest, who commanded the Danish troops in the pay of the States-general, should be indulged with such an addition to their appointments as would make up the difference between the pay of England and that of Holland.

Finally, they voted above two millions for the subsistence of the land forces, and for defraying extraordinary expenses attending the war upon the continent, including subsidies to the Electors of Saxony and Hanover.

§ VIII. The House of Lords meanwhile was not free from numerous concerns. The thorough fiction exerted themselves with great vivacity. They affirmed, it was the province of their House to advise the sovereign; like the Commons they insisted upon the king's having a voice in the war, because he had declared that words in his speech, though he never dreamed that they would catch at it with such eagerness. They moved that the task of digesting the articles of advice should be undertaken by a joint committee of both Houses; but all the dependents of the court, including the whole bench of bishops, except Watson of St. David's, were marshalled to oppose this motion, which was rejected by a majority of twelve; and this victory was followed with a protest of the other House, to which the king's consent was required, they proceeded with their scheme of giving advice; and after much wrangling and declamation, the House agreed in an address or remonstrance, advising and beseeching his majesty that the commanding officer of the British forces should be an Englishman; that English officers might take rank of those in the confederate armies who did not belong to crowned heads: that the twenty thousand men to be left for the defence of the kingdom should be all English, and commanded by an English general; that the practices of pressing men for the fleet should be remedied; that such officers as were guilty of this practice should be cashiered and punished; and, lastly, that no foreigners should sit at the council board.

This motion the king, who received it coldly, and said he would take it into consideration.

§ IX. Then the Lords resolved to inquire into the miscarriage of the purposed descent, and called for all the papers relating to that affair: but the aim of the majority was not so much to rectify the errors of the government as to screen Nottingham, and censure Russell. That nobleman produced his own book of entries, together with the whole correspondence between him and the admiral, whom he verbally charged with having contributed to the miscarriage of the expedition. This affair was referred to a committee. Sir John Ashby was examined. The House directed him having discharged his duty, that these papers were afterwards delivered to a committee of the Commons, at a conference by the lord-president, and the rest of the committee above. They were offered for the inspection of the Commons, as they concurred some members of that House, by whom they might be informed more fully of the particulars they contained. At another conference, which the Commons demanded, their committee declared, in the name of the House, that they had heard nothing, and considered the papers their committee had sent them, and which they now returned: that, finding Mr. Russell, one of their members, often mentioned in the said papers, they had unanimously resolved, that Admiral Russell, in his command of the fleets, during the last summer's expedition, had behaved with fidelity, courage, and conduct. The lords, iritated at this declaration, and disappointed in their resentment against Russell, desired a copy of the said papers from the House. The Earl of Rochester told the Commons, he was commanded by the House of Lords to inform them, that their lordships looked upon the late vote and proceedings of the lower House, in returning their papers, to be irregular and unpatriotic, as they did not communicate to their lordships the lights they had received, and the reasons upon which their vote was founded. A paper to the same purport was delivered to Colonel Granville, to whom, who put it into the form of a faithful report of what his lordship had said. Thus the conference ended, and the inquiry was discontinued.

§ X. The lower House seemed to be as much exasperated against the Earl of Nottingham as the Lords were incensed at Russell. A motion was made that his majesty should be advised to appoint such commissioners of the board of admiralty, as were of known experience in maritime affairs. Although this was overruled, they voted an address to the king, praying, that for the future, all orders for the management of the fleet might pass through the hands of the said commissioners; a protest by implication against the conduct of the secretary. The consideration of the national debt was not neglected; the House complained of the state of the national debt, and expressed their anxiety to it. They resolved that a rate of four shillings in the pound, for one year, should be charged upon all lands, according to their yearly value: this rate was exceeded by the income and expenses and employments of profit, other than military officers in the army or navy. The act founded on this resolution empowered the king to borrow money on the credit of it, at seven per cent. They further enabled him to raise one million on the general credit of the exchequer for the purchase of the national annuities. They laid several new duties on a variety of imports. They renewed the last quarterly poll, providing, that in case it should not produce three hundred thousand pounds, they might add to it, by reducing the rate of duties; and rates of duties, and taxes upon the general credit of the exchequer. They continued the impositions on wine, vinegar, tobacco, and sugar, for five years; and those on East India goods for four years. They had a new imposition of eight per cent. on the capital stock of the East India company, estimated at seven hundred and forty-four thousand pounds; of one per cent. on the African; of five pounds on every share of the stock belonging to the Hudson's Bay company; and they empowered the major to borrow one million five hundred thousand pounds on these funds, which were expressly established for maintaining the war with vigour.

§ XI. The money bills were retarded in the upper House, because they were against the usual presents that were demanded. They grafter a clause on the land-tax bill, importing, that the Lords should tax themselves. It was adopted by the majority, and the bill sent with this amendment to the Commons, by whom it was unanimously rejected as a flagrant attempt upon their privileges. They demanded a conference, in which they declared that the clause in question was a notorious encroachment upon the right the Commons possessed, of regulating all matters relating to supplies granted by parliament. When this report was debated in the House of Lords, the Earl of Mulgrave displayed uncommon powers of eloquence and argument, in persuading the House, that by yielding to this claim of the Commons, they would divest themselves of their true greatness, and nothing would remain but the name and shadow of a peer, which was but a pageant. Notwithstanding all his oratory, the Lords relinquished their clause, declaring, at the same time, that they had agreed to pass the bill without the clause, "in regard to the present urgent state of affairs, as being otherwise of opinion, that they had a right to insist upon their clause. A formal complaint being made in the House of Commons, which their lordships disregarded, the Commons, "concerning accessory of dangerous consequence to their majesties, to the liberty of the subject, and the peace of the kingdom, the licensor and printer were taken into custody. The book fixed in the saddle—but, no matter, the last Lords of or mayarchy it." being examined, they resolved that it should be burned by the hands of the common hangman; and, that the king should be moved to dismiss the licenser from his employment. The same sentence they pronounced upon a pastoral letter of Bishop Burnet, in which this notion of civil and spiritual proceedings in the church was openly manifest their sentiments on the same subject, resolved, That such an assertion was highly injurious to their majesties, inconsistent with the principles on which the government was established, and unwarrantable; and that it was a violation of the rights of the people. Bohun, the licenser, was brought to the bar of the House, and discharged upon his own petition, after having been reprimanded on his knees by the speaker.

§ XII. Several members having complained that their servants had been kidnapped, and sent to serve as soldiers in Flanders, the House appointed a committee to inquire into the abuses committed by press-masters; and a suitable remonstrance was presented to the king, who expressed his indignation at this practice, and assured the House that the delinquents should be brought to exemplary punishment. Understanding, however, in the sequel, that the committee had been principally prevented this abuse had not proved effectual, they resumed their inquiry and proceeded with uncommon vigour on the information they received. A great number of persons who had been pressed were discharged by order of the House: and Captain Stone, Sir Francis Browster, Sir William Gore, Sir John Macgill, Lieutenant's lord, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Kerne. They were examined at the bar of the House, and delivered an account of their grievances in writing. Both Houses concurred in this inquiry, which being finished, they severally presented addresses to the king. The Lords observed, That there had been great abuses in disposing of the forfeited estates: that protections had been granted to the Irish not included in the articles of Limerick; so that protestants were deprived of the benefit of the law against them; that the quarters of the army had not been paid according to the provision made by parliament; that a mayor had been imposed upon the city of Dublin for two years successively, contrary to the ancient privileges of the town; that a number of murkels had been executed without proof: and one Sweetman, the most guilty, discharged without prosecution. The Commons spoke more freely in their address: they inveighed against the many defects and corruptions of the government, by exposing the protestant subjects to the free quarter and violence of a heinous army: by recruiting the troops with Irish papists, who had been in open rebellion against his majesty; by granting protections to Irish Roman Catholics, whereby the course of the law was stopped: by reversing outlawries for high treason, not comprehended in the articles of Limerick; by letting the forfeited estates at under value, to the prejudice of his majesty's revenue; by embroiling the streets; and the towns and garrisons by the late King James, as well as the effects belonging to the forfeited estate, which might have been employed for the better preservation of the kingdom; and, finally, by making additions to the articles of Limerick, after the capitulation was signed, and the place surrendered. They most humbly besought his majesty to redress these abuses, which had greatly encouraged the papists, and weakened the protestant interest in Ireland. The king graciously received both addresses, and promised to pay particular regard to all remonstrances that should come from either House of parliament; but no maternal step was taken against the Lords Sidney, Athlone, and Coningsby. By grants from the crown; and even Commissioner Colliford, who had been guilty of the most grievous acts of oppression, escaped with impunity.

§ XIV. The old whig principle was not yet wholly expelled from the lower House. The undue influence of the court was exerted in such an open, scandalous manner, as gave offence to the majority of the Commons. In the midst of all their condensations, Sir Edward Hussey, member for Lincoln, brought in a bill touching free and independent parliament. A motion was made to disable all members of parliament from enjoying places of trust and profit, and particularly levelling against the officers of the army and navy, who had insuaded themselves into the House in such confusion of the minutes of the meeting, that they were commonly called the Officers' Parliament. The bill proved the business of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords, by whom it was read a second time, and committed: but the ministry employing their whole strength against it, on the report it was thrown out by a majority of two votes. Sir Mulgrave again distinguished himself by his eloquence, in a speech that was held in great veneration by the people; and among those who entered a protest in the journals of the House, when the majority rejected the bill, was Prince George of Denmark, Duke of Cumberland. The court had not recollected themselves from the consternation produced by such a vigorous opposition, when the Earl of Shrewsbury produced another bill for triennial parliaments, providing that there should be an annual deliberation. At the expiration of three years, the crown should not order the writs to be issued, the lord chancellor, or keeper, or commissioner of the great seal, should issue them ex officio, and by authority of the crown, under which authority recruiting the army, was carried by the serjeant before the lord chief justice, that he might be prosecuted according to law.

§ XIII. Before the heats occasioned by this unpopularity expedited were allay, the discontent of the nation was further inflamed by complaints from Ireland, where Lord Sidney was said to rule with despotic authority. These complaints were exhibited by Sir Francis Browster, Sir William Gore, Sir John Macgill, Lieutenant's lord, Mr. Stone, and Mr. Kerne. They were examined at the bar of the House, and delivered an account of their grievances in writing. Both Houses concurred in this inquiry, which being finished, they severally presented addresses to the king. The Lords observed, That there had been great abuses in disposing of the forfeited estates: that protections had been granted to the Irish not included in the articles of Limerick; so that protestants were deprived of the benefit of the law against them: that the quarters of the army had not been paid according to the provision made by parliament: that a mayor had been imposed upon the city of Dublin for two years successively, contrary to the ancient privileges of the town; that a number of murkels had been executed without proof: and one Sweetman, the most guilty, discharged without prosecution. The Commons spoke more freely in their address: they inveighed against the many defects and corruptions of the government, by exposing the protestant subjects to the free quarter and violence of a heinous army: by recruiting the troops with Irish papists, who had been in open rebellion against his majesty: by granting protections to Irish Roman Catholics, whereby the course of the law was stopped: by reversing outlawries for high treason, not comprehended in the articles of Limerick: by letting the forfeited estates at under value, to the prejudice of his majesty's revenue: by embroiling the streets: and the towns and garrisons by the late King James, as well as the effects belonging to the forfeited estate, which might have been employed for the better preservation of the kingdom: and, finally, by making additions to the articles of Limerick, after the capitulation was signed, and the place surrendered. They most humbly besought his majesty to redress these abuses, which had greatly encouraged the papists, and weakened the protestant interest in Ireland. The king graciously received both addresses, and promised to pay particular regard to all remonstrances that should come from either House of parliament; but no maternal step was taken against the Lords Sidney, Athlone, and Coningsby. They were carefully examined in the House: the several feitures by grants from the crown; and even Commissioner Colliford, who had been guilty of the most grievous acts of oppression, escaped with impunity.

§ XV. It was at the instigation of the ministry, that the Commons brought in a bill for continuing and explaining certain temporary laws then expiring or expired. Among these was an act for restraining the pretended government, which owed its original to the reign of Charles II. and had been revived in the first year of the succeeding reign. The bill passed the House without difficulty, but met with warm opposition in the House of Lords; a good number of whom protested against it, as a law that subjected all learning and true information to the arbitrary will of a mercenary, and, perhaps, ignorant licensor, destroyed the properties of authors, and extended the evil of monopolies. The bill for regulating trials was dropped, and, in lieu of it, another produced for the preservation of their majesties' sacred persons and government: but this bill too was rejected by the majority, in consequence of the ministry's secret management. The East India company narrowly escaped dissolution. Petitions and counter-petitions were delivered into the House of Commons: the pretensions on both sides were carefully examined: a bill to the extent of one hundred thousand pounds, to continue for one-and-twenty years. The report was made and received, and the public expected to see the affair brought to a satisfactory issue. The Commons had recourse to the same expedients which had lately proved so successful in the hands of the ministry. Those who had been the most war in detecting their abuses suddenly cooled; and the prosecution of the affair began. to languish. But not that the House presented an address to his majesty, praying that he would dissolve the company upon three years' warning, according to the condition of their charter. He told them he would consider their address, but did not further their requests in their present shape.

The bill for ascertaining the commissions and salaries of the judges, to which the king had refused the royal assent in the last session, was revived, twice read, and rejected; and another, for preventing the exportation and melting of the coin, passed on the twelfth day of March. The king put an end to the session, after having thanked the parliament for so great testimonies of their affection, and promised the supplies shall be given in time of need. He declared, that the proposed measures called him abroad; but that he would leave a sufficient number of troops for the security of the kingdom: he assured them he would expose his person upon all occasions for the advantage of these kingdoms; and use his utmost endeavours to make them a flourishing nation.

§ XVI. During the course of this session, Lord Mohun was indicted and tried by his peers in Westminster hall, as an accomplice in the murder of one Montiford, a celebrated comedian, the Marquis of Caermarthen acting as lord-steward upon this occasion. The judges having been consulted, the peers proceeded to give their judgments several. The bill was acquiesced in a great majority.

The king, who, from his first accession to the throne, had endeavoured to trim the balance between the whigs and Tories, by mingling them together in his ministry, made something of the same kind: he fixed, that the principal of affairs called him abroad; but that he would leave a sufficient number of troops to the security of the kingdom: he assured them he would expose his person upon all occasions for the advantage of these kingdoms, and use his utmost endeavours to make them a flourishing nation.

§ XVII. This king having visited the fleet and fortification at Plymouth, on the twentieth day of April, the enemy by sea, and left the administration in the hands of the queen, embarked on the last day of March, near Gravesend, and arrived in Holland on the third of April. The troops of the confederates were forthwith ordered to assemble; and on the twenty-first day of March, the king's troops were in the French ships, and the French ships in the English; and the French army was encouraged to the field, attended by Madame de Maintenon, and all the court ladies. His design was supposed to be upon some attacks in the English; he had sent two thousand men, completely armed, and abundantly supplied with all necessaries for every sort of military operation.

King William immediately took possession of the strong camp at Parke near Louvain, a situation which enabled him to cover the places that were most exposed.

Understanding that the French emissaries had sworn the seeds of disunion between the bishop and Chapter of Liege, he sent the Duke of Wurttemberg thither, to reconcile the different parties, and to concert measures for the further security of the place. He reinforced the garrison with nine battalions; and the elector palatine lay with his troops in readiness to march to its relief. William likewise threw reinforcements to those of the confederates; and he himself resolved to remain on the offensive, at the head of sixty thousand men, with a numerous train of artillery.

§ XVIII. Louis having reviewed his army at Cambrai, and entered into camp; his design was to conciliate the diligence of his antagonist, detached Boufflers with twenty thousand men to the Upper Rhine, to join the dauphin, who commanded in that quarter: then leaving the conduct of his forces in the Netherlands to the Duke of Luxem- bourgh, he returned with his court to Versailles. Immediately after his departure, Luxembourg fixed his head-quarters at Mildert; and King William strengthened his camp on that side with ten battalions, and eight-and-twenty pieces of cannon. The enemy's convoys were frequently surprised by detachments from the garrison of Charleroy; and a large body of horse, foot, and dragoons, being drafted out of Liege and Münstrech, took post at Huy, under the command of the Count de Tilly, so as to straiten the French in their quarters.

These, however, were dislodged by Luxembourg in person, who obliged the count to pass the Jaar with precipitation, leaving behind three squadrons in the town; where all the effects of the enemies were kept.

This check, however, was balanced by the success of the Duke of Wurttemberg, who, at the head of thirteen battalions of infantry, and twenty squadrons of horse, forced the French lines between the Scheldt and the Lys; and obliged the enemy to retire to the lines of the Nuisy.

On that very day, which was the eighteenth of July, Luxembourg marched towards Huy, which was next morning invested by M. de Villeroi. The other covered the siege, and secured himself from the allies by lines of contravala-tion. Before the batteries began to play the town capitulated. On the twenty-third day of the month, the garrison mutinied; the castles were surrendered; the governor removed a prisoner; and his men were conducted to Liege.

The confederate army advanced in order to relieve the town: but the king being apprized of its fate, detached ten battalions to reinforce the garrison of Liege, and next day returned to Neer-Hespen.

§ XIX. Luxembourg made a motion towards Liege, as if he had intended to besiege the place; and encamped at Hellecoet, about seven leagues from the confederates. Knowing how much they were weakened by the different detachments which had been made to their army, he resolved to attack them in their camp, or at least fall upon their rear, should they retreat at his approach. On the twenty-eighth day of July he began his march in four columns of cavalry and infantry. De Horst, De Marke, De Eerendal, and De Velde, had joined him.
superior to the allies by five-and-thirty thousand men. The King of England, at first, looked upon this motion as a feint to cover the design upon Liége; but receiving intelligence that the whole army was in full march to attack him, he immediately brought off the operation; and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle. His general officers advised him to repass the Geete: but he chose to risk a battle, rather than expose the rear of his army to that river. He was enabled to push it as far as Neer-Winden, along the Geete, covered with hedges, hollow ways, and a small rivulet; the left reached to Neer-Landen; and these two villages were joined by a slight entrenchment, which the English lost upon the evening. Brigadier Ramsey, with the regiments of O'Farrel, Mackay, Lauder, Leven, and Monroe, were ordered to the right of the whole army, to line some badges and hollow ways on the further side of the village of Laee. Six battalions of Brandenburg were posted to the left of this village; and General Dumont, with the Hanoverian infantry, possessed the village of Neer-Winden, which covered part of the camp, between the main body and the right wing of the cavalry. Neer-Landen on the left, was secured by six battalions of English, Danes, and Dutch. The remaining infantry was drawn up in one line behind the entrenchment. The dragoons upon the left guarded the King of Beck; and from thence the left wing of horse extended to Neer-Landen, where it was covered by this rivulet. § XX. The king having visited all the posts on horseback, and given the necessary orders, reposed himself about two hours in a small tent near the chapel, whom he joined in prayer with great devotion. At sun-rising the enemy appeared drawn up in order of battle; and the allies began to play their cannon with good success. About eight in the morning they attempted the villages of Laee and Neer-Winden with great fury; and twice made themselves masters of these posts, from whence they were as often repulsed. The allies still kept these posts every day, and were often beaten by uncj Brigadier Churchill. Then the French made an attack upon the left wing of the confederates at Neer-Landen; and after a very obstinate dispute were obliged to give way, though they still kept possession of the avenues. The Prince of Conti, however, renewed the charge with the flower of the French infantry; and the confederates being overpowered, retreated from the village, leaving the camp in that part exposed. Villeroi marching this way with every thing of consequence encountered, and particularly the Count D'Arco, general of the Bavarian cuirassiers; and the Duke de Chartres narrowly escaped being taken. Meanwhile, Luxembourg, the Prince of Conti, the Count of Marne, and the Marquis de Jones, charged on the right wing of the confederates, and were by the nature of his situation immediately before the engagement, is said to have exclaimed, "Now, I believe, Wall-deck is really dead!" alluding to that general's known sagacity in choosing ground for an encampment. That as it will, he paid dear for his victory. His loss in officers and men exceeds that of the allies; and he reaped go solid advantage from the battle. He remained fifteen days inactive at Waren, while King William, recalling the Duke of Wirtemberg, and sending troops from Lieser and other garrisons, was in a few days able to hazard another engagement. § XXI. Nothing remarkable happened during the remaining part of the campaign, except it was re-joined by Bouflers with a strong reinforcement for the Rhine, invested Charleroi. He had taken his measures with such caution and dexterity, that the allies could not frustrate his operations, without attacking his lines at a great disadvantage. The king detached the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Wirtemberg, with thirty battalions and forty squadrons, to make a diversion in Flanders; but they returned in a few days, without having attempted anything of consequence. The garrison of Charleroi was invested by the forces of the allies, and with great difficulty broke the siege. Their success was so surprising that the army of the allies was now greatly increased, and the Redoubt was placed with surprising valour, from the tenth of September to the eleventh of October, during which period they had repulsed the assailants in several attacks; but, in length, despairing of relief, the government of the most honourable city of Charleroi, the reduction of the place was celebrated with a Te Deum, and other rejoicings, at Paris. Louis, however, in the midst of all this glory, was extremely mortified when he reflected upon the little advantage he had reaped from all his late victories. The army of the allies had been defeated successively at Fleurus, Stenkerke, and Laaen; yet in a fortnight after each of those battles, William was always in a condition to risk another engagement. Formerly, Louis had cooped half of Holland, Flanders, and Franche-Comté, without a battle; whereas, now he could not with his utmost efforts, and after the most signal victories, pass the borders of the United Provinces. The conquest of Charleroi concluded the campaign in the Netherlands, and both armies went into winter quarters.

§ XXII. The French army on the Rhine, under De Loges, passed that river in the month of May at Philip- shurgh, and invested the city of Heidelberg, which they took, plundered, and reduced to ashes. This general committed numberless barbarities in the palatinate, which he ravaged without even sparing the tombs of the dead. The French army, under the command of General de Guise, was occasioned by the most brutal inhumanity. They butchered the inhabitants, violated the women, plundered the houses, rifled the churches, and murdered the priests at the altar. They broke open the electoral vault, and scattered the ashes

* The Duke of Luxembourg sent with a number of standards and ensigns to Paris, during the course of the war, that the Prince of Conti called himself the Prince of Notre Dame, a church in which those trophies were displayed. of that illustrious family about the streets. They set fire to different quarters of the city; they stripped about fifteen thousand of the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex, and drove them naked into the castle, that the garrison might be the sooner induced to capitulate. There they remained like cattle in the open air, without food or covering, tortured between the horrors of their fate and the terrors of a bombardment. When they were about to die, in consequence of the not being supplied, a great number of them died along the banks of the Neckar, from cold, hunger, anguish, and despair. These enormous cruelties, which would have disgraced a nation famous for humanity, were committed by the express command of Louis XIV. of France, who had been celebrated by so many versals, not only as the greatest monarch, but also as the most polished prince of Christendom. De Lorges advanced towards the Neckar against the Prince of Baden, who lay encamped on the other side of the river; but in attempting to pass, he was twice repulsed with considerable damage. The dauphin joining the army, which now amounted to seventy thousand men, crossed without opposition; but found the Germans advantageously posted, that he would not hazard an attack: having, therefore, repassed the river, he secured Stuttgart with a garrison, sent detachments into Flanders and Piedmont, and turned in August to Verona. In Piedmont, the allies were still more unfortunate. The Duke of Savoy and his confederates seemed bent upon driving the French from Casal and Pignerol. The first of these places was blocked by the allies and without assault. The fort of St. Bridget, that covered the place, was taken, and the town bombarded. Meanwhile Catani being reinforced, descended into the plains. The duke was so apprehensive of Turin, that he abandoned the siege of Pinerolo, and hastened to join his force, and marched in quest of the enemy to the plain of Marsaglia, in the neighbourhood of his capital. On the fourth day of October, the French advanced upon them from the hills, between Obisans and Frejus, and turned their heads to the rear. The enemy charged the left wing of the confederates sword in hand with incredible fury: though they were once repulsed, they renewed the attack with such impetuosity, that the Neapolitan and MIlanese horse were obliged to give way, and disordered the German cavalry. These falling upon the foot, threw the whole wing into confusion. Meanwhil, the main body and the other wing sustained the charge without flinching, until they were exposed in flank by the defeat of the cavalry; then the front gave way. In vain the second side was brought up to sustain them: the horse turned their backs, and the infantry was totally routed. The enemy pursued them in the rear to return with precipitation, leaving their cannon, and about eight thousand men killed or wounded on the field of battle. The Duke of Schomberg having been denied the post which he was to receive, insisted upon fighting at the head of the troops maintained by the King of Great Britain, who were posted in the centre, and behaved with great gallantry under the eye of their commander. When the left wing was defeated, the Count de los Torres desired he would take upon him the command, and retreat with the infantry and the right wing; but he refused to act without the order of his highness, and said, things were come to such a pass, that they must either conquer or die. He continued to animate his men with his voice and example, until he received a shot in the thigh. His valet seeing him fall, ran to his assistance, and called for quarter, but was killed by the enemy before he could be understood. The Duke was taken prisoner, and the ammunition, which had been damaged upon his parole, and in a few days died at Turin, universally lamented on account of his great and amiable qualities. The Earl of Warwick and Holland, who accompanied him as a volunteer, shared his fate in being taken prisoner. The Duke was taken possession of his health and liberty. This victory was as unsubstantial as that of Landen, and almost as dear in the purchase; for the confederates made an obstinate defence, and yielded solely to the surprise. The Duke proceeded to Moncalier, and threw a reinforcement into Coni, which Catani would not venture to besiege, so severely had he been handled in the battle. He therefore contented him-Denmark, Sweden, Hamburg, and Flanders. On the sixteenth, his scouts discovered part of the French fleet under Cape St. Vincent: next day their whole navy appeared, to the amount of eighty sail. Sixteen of these ships formed the line of battle: the two vice-admirals of the white stood off to receive the ships of the French convoy. Sir George Rooke, by the advice of the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes, resolved, if possible, to avoid an engagement, which could only tend to their absolute ruin. The rest, some thirty ships, that were near the land, to put into the neighbouring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, and Cadiz, while he himself stood off with an easy sail for the protection of the rest. About six in the evening, the French struck two Dutch ships of war, commanded by the Captains Schriijer, and Vander-Poch, who seeing no possibility of escaping, tacked in shore: and, thus drawing the French after them, helped to retain the rest of the fleet. When attacked they made a most desperate defense, but at last were overpowered by numbers and taken. An English ship of war and a rich pinnace were burned; nine-and-twenty merchant vessels were taken, and about fifty destroyed by the Counts de Tournon, and De Roreau, term of the largest Smyrna ships fell into the hands of M. de Coetogen, and four he sunk in the bay of Gibraltar. The value of the loss sustained on this occasion amounted to one million sterling. Meanwhile Rooke set sail off and on the twenty-first sent home the dark ship of war with the news of his misfortune; then he bore away for the Madeiras, where having taken in wood and water, he set sail for Ireland, highly satisfied with the success of his attempt, and with fifty sail, including ships of war and trading vessels. He detached Captain Fairhone to Kinsale, with all his squadron, except six ships of the line, with which, in pursuance of orders, he joined the fleet then cruising in the channel. On the twenty-fifth day of August, they returned to St. Helen's, and the four regiments were landed. On the nineteenth day of September, fifteen Dutch ships of the line, and two frigates, set sail for Holland; and, twenty-six new ships, with seven fire-ships, were assigned as guard-ships during the winter.

§ XXVI. The French admirals, instead of pursuing Rooke to Madeira, made an unsuccessful attempt upon Cadiz, and bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants sunk their ships, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. Then they sailed along the coasts of Spain, destroyed some English and Dutch vessels at Malaga, Algeciras, and other places; and were off Cadiz.

Abundant capital. About this period, Sir Francis Wheeler returned to England with his squadron, from an unfortunate expedition in the West Indies. In conjunction with Colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward Islands, he made unsuccessful attempts on St. Christopher and Dominique. Then he sailed to Boston in New England, with a view to concert an expedition against Quebec, which was judged impracticable. He afterwards steered for Placentia in Newfoundland, which he would have attacked without hesitation, but the design was rejected by a majority of voices in the council of war. Thus disappointed, he set sail for England, and arrived at Portsmouth in a very shattered condition, the greater part of his men having died in the course of his voyage.

§ XXVII. In November another effort was made to annoy the enemy. Commodore Benbow sailed with a squadron of twelve capital ships, four bomb-ketches, and ten barges, to the coast of St. Maloes, and anchoring within half a mile of the town, cannonaded and bombarded it for three days successively. Then his men landed on an island, where they burned a convent. On the nineteenth they took the advantage of a dark night, a fresh gale, and a strong tide, to send in a fire-ship of a particular contrivance, styled the Infernal, in order to burn the town: but she struck upon a rock before she arrived at the quay, the jury set her on fire at her anchorage, and she was burned. She continued burning for some time, and at last blew up, with such an explosion as shook the whole town like an earthquake, unroofed three hundred houses, cut down all the trees, and left eighty men dead and twenty wounded. A captain that weighed two hundred pounds was transported into the place, and falling upon a house, levelled it to the ground: the greatest part of the wall towards the sea tumbled down; and the inhabitants were overwhelmed with consternation: so that a small number of troops might have taken possession without resistance; but there was not a soldier in the town. Nevertheless, the sailors took and demolished Quen-Turin, and did considerable damage to the town of St. Maloes, which had been a nest of privateers that infested the English commerce. Though this attempt was executed with great discourse, and expense, the consequences were not so great as the motions of the nation, and they took their measures accordingly for their destruction. They collected and compared a good number of particulars, that seemed to justify their suspicion of treachery. But the misfortunes of the nation, in all probability, arose from a motley ministry, divided among themselves, who, instead of acting in concert for the public good, employed all their influence to thwart the views and blacken the reputations of each other. The people in general exclaimed against the Marquis of Carvemont, the Earls of Nottingham and Rochester, who had acquired great credit with the queen, and from their hatred to the whigs, betrayed the interests of the nation.

§ XXVIII. But if the English were discontented, the French were miserable in spite of all their victories. That kingdom laboured under a dreadful famine, occasioned by the scarcity of corn, and by the return of industry, which had not left hands sufficient to cultivate the ground. Notwithstanding all the diligence and providence of their ministry, in bringing supplies of corn from Sweden and Denmark, their efforts in regulating the prices of corn in the markets, their liberal contributions for the relief of the indigent; multitudes perished, and the whole kingdom was reduced to poverty and distress. Louis pined in the midst of his success. He saw his subjects exhausted by a ruinous war, in which they had been involved by his ambition. He tampered with the allies apart, in hopes of dividing and detaching them from the grand confederacy: he solicited the northern nations to engage as mediators for a general peace. A memorial was actually presented by the Danish minister to King William, by which it appears, that the French king would have been contented to purchase a peace with some considerable cessions; but the French ministry, rejected by the King of England, whose ambition and revenge were not yet satisfied; and whose subjects, though heavily laden, could still bear additional burthens.

§ XXIX. The Jacobites had been very attentive to the progress of events in England, which they foretold with their usual assiduity. The late declaration of King James had been conciled in such impenurious terms, as gave offence even to some of those who favoured his interest. The Earl of Middleton, therefore, in the beginning of the year repaired to St. Germain, and obtained another, which contained the promise of a general pardon without exception, and every other concession that a British subject could demand of his sovereign. About the latter end of May, two men, named Canning and Dormer, were apprehended for dispersing copies of this paper, tried at the Old Bailey, found guilty of not only dispersing, but also of composing, a false and seditious libel, sentenced to be hanged, and afterwards reprieved. The house of lords were for his high treason: he made a vigorous defence, in spite of the insults and discouragement he sustained from a partial bench. As nothing but presumptions appeared against him, the jury set him at liberty, and was concerned only to affect his life, until they were reviled and reprimanded by Judge Treby; then they found him guilty. In vain request was made to the queen's mercy: he suffered with the utmost rigour, and was hanged against the proceedings of the court, which he affected was appointed, ot to try, but to convict him; and petitioning Heaven to forgive his penitent jury. The severity of the government was likewise exemplified in the case of some adventurers, who, having equipped privateers to cruise upon the English, under joint commissions from the last king of England and Lord Lovat, were levied in the ships of war. Dr. Oldys, the king's advocate, being commanded to proceed against them as guilty of treason and piracy, refused to commence the prosecution because they gave him no sign of writing, that they were neither traitors nor pirates. He supported this opinion by arguments before the council; these were answered by Dr. Littleton, who succeeded him in the office, from whom immediate assistance; and the Jacobites were declared as traitors. The Jacobites did not fail to retort those arts upon the government, which their adversaries had so successfully practised in the late reign. They inveigled against the vindictive spirit of the administration, and taxed it with encouraging informers and false witnesses: a charge for which there was too much foundation.

§ XXX. The friends of James in Scotland still continued to concert designs in his favour: but their correspondence was detected, and their arms defeated, by the vigilance of the ministry in that kingdom. Secretary Johnston not only kept a watchful eye over all their transactions, but by a dexterous management of court liberality and the detail of the discontents of the presbytery made so effectually, that the king no risk in assembling the parliament. Some offices were bestowed upon the leaders of the kirk party: and the Duke of Hamilton being reconciled to the government, was appointed commissioner. On the eighteenth of April President John Adair, by the king's letter, replete with the most exigacious expressions, being read, the parliament proceeded to exhibit undeniable specimens of their good humour. They drew up a very affectionate answer to the majesty's letter: they voted an addition of six new regiments to the standing forces of the kingdom; they granted a supply of above one hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling to his majesty; they enacted a law for the encouragement of informers; they appointed six new informers, supposed to be written by James by Neville Payne, whom they committed to prison, and threatened with a trial for high treason; but he eluded the danger, by threatening to resign his office to impeach those persons who had made peace with the government: they passed an act for the comprehension of such of the episcopal clergy as should condescend to take the oaths by the tenth day of April next; they passed an act, that the government gave them was an offer to subscribe the confession of faith, and to acknowledge presbytery as the only government of the Scottish church; but they neither submitted to these terms, nor took the oaths within the limited time; so that they forfeited all legal right to their benefices. Nevertheless, they continued in possession, and even received private assurances of the king's protection. It was one of William's political maxims, to court his domestic enemies; but it was never attended with any good effect. This indulgence gave offence to the presbyterians, and former distractions began to revive.

§ XXXI. The king having prevailed upon the States-general for a loan of the current year, and the service of the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at Kensington on the thirtieth day of October. Finding the people clamorous and discontented, the trade of the city, the Jacobites, and high whigs were managed upon the ministers recapitulating upon one another, he perceived the necessity of changing hands, and resolved to take his measures accordingly. Sunderland, his chief counsellor, received letters with the news of the continuance of a war, which had been productive of nothing but damage and disgrace; whereas the whigs were much more tractable, and would bleed freely, partly from the terrors of invasion and popery, partly from the ambition of being conquerors, partly from the fear of not being in the prospect of being benefited in advancing money to the government on the funds established by parliament: that for such traffic which obtained the appellation of the monied interest, was altogether a whiggish institution. The king resolved these observations in his own mind; and, in the mean time, the parliament met on the seventh day of November, pursuant to the last act of April, and the last order of the last king of England, and the last act of Parliament against those who were the authors of the miscarriages at sea: represented the necessity of increasing the land forces and the navy; and demanded a suitable supply for their purpose. After the discoursing upon their condescension, he had already dismissed from his council the Earl of Nottingham, who, of all his ministers, was the most odious to the people. His place would have been taken by Dr. Littleton; but his last speech to the king; that nobleman suspecting this was a change of men rather than of measures, stood aloof for some time, until he received such assurances from the king as quelled his scruples, and then he accepted the office of secretary. The lieutenant for the city of London, and all other commissions over England, were altered with a view to favour the whig interest; and the individuals of that party were indulged with many places of trust and profit: but the tons were too powerful in the House of Commons to be expatriated, and therefore a good number of them were retained in office.

§ XXXII. On the sixth day of the session, the Commons unanimously resolved that the king should have his government; to inquire into miscarriages; and to consider of means for preserving the trade of the nation. The Turkey company were summoned to produce the petition to which they had delivered to the commissioners of the admiralty for the extraordinary, to which the king's order against it was directed; that board, gave in copies of all the orders and directions sent to Sir George Rooke concerning the Stratts fleet, together with a list of all the ships at that time in commission. It appeared, in the course of this inquiry, that the miscarriage of Rooke's fleet was in a great measure owing to the misconduct of the admirals, and neglect of the requisition-office; but they were screened, by a majority. Mr. Robert Harley, on the third day, brought in the public accounts, delivered a report, which contained a charge of peculation against Lord Falkland. Ramsford, receiver of the rights and purses of the navy, confessed that he had received and paid more money than that which was charged in the account; and, in particular, that he had paid four thousand pounds to Lord Falkland, by his majesty's order. This lord had acknowledged before the commissioners, that he had paid one half of the sum, by the king's order, to a person who was not a member of either House; and that the remainder was still in his hands. Ramsford owned he had originally letter which he received from Falkland, demanding the money; and this was the evidence of a commission necessary to the charge of the misconduct of the admirals. The moment that incensed the Commons to such a degree, that a motion was made for committing him to the Tower, and debated with great warmth, but at last overruled by the majority. Nevertheless, they agreed to make him liable for his disbursements, and he was reprimanded in his place.

The House of Lords having also inquired into the causes of the miscarriage at sea, very violent debates arose, and at length the majority resolved, that the admirals had done well in the execution of the orders they had received. This was a triumph over the whig lords, who had so eagerly prosecuted the affair, and now protested against the resolution, not without great appearance of reason. The next step was of the severance of the friendship with the Earl of Nottingham, as the blame seemed to be with him, on the supposition that the admirals were innocent. With a view, therefore, to transfer this blame to Trenchard, the majority resolved, that this order was revoked, that he had received intelligence from Paris in the beginning of June, containing a list of the enemy's fleet, and the time of their sailing; that this was communicated to a committee of the council, and particularly imported to Secretary Trenchard, who produced it to the Commons to transact with the admirals. Two conferences passed on this subject between the Lords and Commons. Trenchard delivered his defense in writing; and was in his turn examined by the Commons, and then proceeded to the prospect of the advantage to be derived to the nation by the raise of the whig influence now predominated. Thus an inquiry of such national consequence, which took its rise from the king's own expression of resentment against the defini-tants, was stilled by the arts of the court, because it was likely to affect one of its creatures: for, though there was no premeditated treachery in the case, the interest of the public seemed to combine for the same purpose, and to the ministers. The charge of Lord Falkland being resumed in the House of Commons, he appeared to have begged and received of the king the remaining two thousand pounds, which he subscribed by Baron Sheffield:
he was therefore declared guilty of an high misdemeannon, and breach of trust, and committed to the Tower; from whence, however, he was in two days discharged upward his personal liberty.

XXXIII. Harley, Foley, and Harcourt, presented to the House a state of the receipts and issues of the revenue, together with two reports from the commissioners of accounts concerning sums issued for secret services, and to members of parliament. Thus was a discovery of the most scandalous practices in the mystery of corruption, equally exercised on the individuals of both parties, in occasional bounties, grants, places, pensions, equivalents, and additional salaries. The malcontents, therefore, justly observed, the House of Commons was so managed that the king could balance any bill, quash all grievances, stulte accounts, and rectify the articles of Limerick. When the Commons took into consideration the funds of the extraordinary revenue, the king demanded forty thousand men for the navy, and above one hundred thousand for the purposes of the land-service. Before the House considered these enormous demands, they granted for the present a short subscription. One public question, by the silence and absence of the malcontents, whilst the clamours of the seamen who became mutinous and desperate for want of pay, upwards of one million being due to them for wages. Then the Commons voted the number of men required for the navy: but they were so ashamed of that for the army, that they thought it necessary to act in such a manner as should imply that they still retained some regard for their country. They called for a list of ready money for the king and his allies: they examined the different proportions of the troops furnished by the respective powers: they considered the intended augmentations, and fixed the establishment of the year at fourscore and three thousand one hundred and twenty-one men, including officers. For the maintenance of these they allotted the sum of two millions five hundred and thirty thousand five hundred and ninety pounds. They granted two millions for the navy, and allowed three millions for the purposes of land-service indefeasible, making good the balance of the annuity and poll bills; so that the supplies of the year amounted to about five millions and a half, raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, by the taxation of spirits, and by an impost on beer, a new duty on salt, and a lottery.

XXXIV. Though the malcontents in parliament could not withstand this torrent of profusion, they endeavoured to discuss the court interest, by reviving the popular bills of the preceding session; such as that for regulating trials in cases of high treason, the other for the more frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, and that concerning free and impartial proceedings in parliament. The first was negatived in the House of Lords; the second was rejected; the third was passed by the Commons, on the supposition that it would be defeated in the other House.
The Lords returned it with certain amendments, to which the Commons would not agree; a conference ensued; the peers receded from their corrections, and passed the bill, to which the king, however, refused his assent. Nothing could be more unpopular and dangerous than such a step at that time and season, the people being yet in an extraordinary credit with the people, determined to disapprove of his majesty's conduct. The House formed itself into a committee, to take the state of the kingdom into consideration.
They resolved that whoever advised the king to refuse the royal assent to that bill, was a enemy to their majesties and the kingdom. They likewise presented an address, expressing their concern that he had not given his consent to the bill, and beseeching his majesty to hearken for the future, on whatsoever project was agreed to, mutual animosity between the councils of particular persons, who might have private interests of their own, separate from those of his majesty and his people. The king thanked them for their zeal, proferred a warm regard for their constitution, and assured them he would look upon all parties as enemies, who should endeavour to lessen the confidence subsisting between the state, and the independence of the ministers. The charge of Lord Falkland being resumed in the House of Commons, he appeared to have begged and received of the king the remaining two thousand pounds, which he subscribed by Baron Sheffield:
he was therefore declared guilty of a high misdemeannon, and breach of trust, and committed to the Tower;
ward his personal liberty.

XXXV. The city of London petitioned that a paramountary provision might be made for the orphans, whose fortunes they feared would be seriously affected, if an application had been made in the preceding session, and rejected with disdain, as an imposition on the public: but now those scruples were removed, and the House passed a bill for this purpose, consisting of many clauses, extending to different charges on the city lands, aqueducts, and personal estates; imposing duties on hindering apprentices, constituting freemen, as also upon wines and coals imported into London. On the twenty-third day of March these bills received the royal assent: and the king took that opportunity of recommending despatch, as the season of the year was far advanced, and the enemy diligently employed in making preparations for another invasion.

The scheme of the new ship was so old, like those of Amsterdam and Genoa, had been recommended to the ministry, as an excellent institution, as well for the credit and security of the government, as for the increase of trade and circulation. This bill carried by the house, was accordingly brought in, proposing the circulation of tickets on land security; but William Paterson was author of that which was carried into execution by the interest of Michael Godfrey, and other active projectors. The scheme was founded on the notion of a transferable fund, and a circulation by bill on the credit of a large capital. Forty merchants subscribed to the amount of five hundred thousand pounds, as a fund, for the circulation of tickets for twenty years; to be sold to the government; and even this fund of ready money bore the same interest.

When it was properly digested in the cabinet, and a majority in parliament secured for its reception, the undertakers for the court introduced it into the House of Commons, and expounded upon the national advantages that would accrue from such a measure. They said it would rescue the nation out of the hands of extortioners and usurers, lower interest, raise the value of land, and give more trade to merchants. The circulation, consequently improve commerce, facilitate the annual supplies, and connect the people more closely with the government. The project was violently opposed by a party in the House, who wished further excuse on beer, a new duty on salt, and a lottery.

between man and man; and they crowned the oppressions of the year with another grievous tax upon carriages, under the name of a bill for licensing and regulating hackney and stage-coach traffic.

§ XXXVI. The Commons, in a clause of the bill for taxing several joint-stocks, provided, that in case of a default in the payment of that tax, within the time limited by the act, the charter of the company so failing should be declared void; and the bill would actually neglect their payment, and the public imagined the ministry would seize this opportunity of dissolving a monopoly against which so many complaints had been made, but the directors undertook their own strength; and instead of being broken, obtained the promise of a new charter. This was no sooner known, than the controversy between them and their adversaries was revived with such animosity, that the council thought proper to indulge both parties with a hearing. As this produced no resolution, the merchant who opposed the company petitioned, that, in the mean while, the new charter might be suspended. Addresses of the same kind were presented by a great number of clothiers, linen-drapers, and other dealers. To these a written answer was published by the company; the merchants printed a reply, in which they undertook to prove, that the company had been guilty of unwarrantable actions, and sought by the means of religion, the dishonour of the nation, the reproach of our laws, the oppression of the people, and the ruin of trade. They observed, that two private ships had exported in the previous season as much as the coasters had exported in three years. They offered to send more cloth and English merchandise to the Indies in one year, than the company had exported in five; to furnish the government with five hundred tons of salt-petre for less than half the price; and, as comprehended, the company could neither send the ships petitioned for in England, nor relade them in the East Indies. In spite of all these remonstrances, the new charter passed the great securities, that the merchants were not limited to their former grants, in such a manner, that they did not amount to an exclusive privilege, and subjected the company to such alterations, restrictions, and qualifications, as the king should direct before the twenty-ninth day of September. This indulgence and other favours granted to the company were privately purchased of the ministry, and became productive of a loud outcry against the government. The merchants printed a petition to the whole transaction, and petitioned the House of Commons that their charter of trade to the East Indies might be confirmed by parliament. Another petition was presented by the company, praying that their charter might receive a parliamentary sanction. Both petitions were laid on their faces; and the petitioners were prohibited from any application to the members. The House having examined the different charters, the book of their new subscriptions, and every particular relating to the company, resolved that all the subjects of England had an equal right to trade to the East Indies, unless prohibited by act of parliament.

§ XXXVII. But nothing engrossed the attention of the public more than a bill which was brought into the House for a general naturalization of all foreign protestants. The advocates for this measure alleged, that great part of the lands of England lay uncultivated; that the strength of a nation consisted in the number of inhabitants; that the people were thinned by the war and foreign voyages, and required more numerous and devout stock, and that they were drawn from all parts of the empire by persecution in France and other countries, would gladly remove to a land of freedom, and bring along with them their wealth and manufactures; that the community had been largely repaid for the protection granted to those refugees who had already settled in the kingdom. They had introduced several new branches of manufacture, promoted industry, and lowered the price of labour; a circumstance of utmost importance as it was with taxes, and exposed to uncommon hazard from the enemy. The opponents of the bill urged with great vehemence, that it would cheapen the birthright of Englishmen; that the want of culture was owing to the oppression of the times; that foreigners being admitted into the privileges of the British trade, would grow wealthy at the expense of their benefactors, and transfer the fortunes they had gained into their native country; that the reduction of the national price of labour, and the want of sufficient revenue, while many thousands of English manufacturers were starving for want of employment, and the price of provisions continued so high, that even those that were employed could scarce supply their families with bread: and that the reduction of the national price of labour would be a great temptation to dissenter to forsake their employment, and the whole papers would render them an equal match in the body-politic for those of the church of England; to create a greater dependence on the crown, and, in a word, to supply a fortune lost with foreign members. Sir John Knight, a member of the House, in a speech upon this subject, exaggerated the bad consequences that would attend such a bill, with all the wit and vivacity of satire: it was printed and dispersed through the kingdom, and raised such a flame among the people as had not appeared since the revolution. They exclaimed, that all offices would be conferred upon Dutchmen, who would become lord-danes, and possess the revenues of religion and government; and they extolled Sir John Knight, as the saviour of the nation. The courtiers, incensed at the progress of this clamour, complained in the House of the speech which had been printed; and Sir Jonathan Kite, Sir John was put in a temporary imprisonment. He therefore thought proper to disown the paper, which was burned by the hands of the common hangman. The following was the popular disturbance, which rose to such a height of violence, that the court party began to tremble; and the bill was dropped for the present.

§ XXXVIII. Lord Coningsby and Mr. Porter had commenced the most flagrant acts of oppression in Ireland. These had been explained during the last session, by the gentlemen who appealed against the administration of Lord Sidney; but they were screened by the ministry; and therefore they were limited to the House of Commons, of which he and they were members. After an examination of the articles exhibited against them, the Commons, who were by this time at the devotion of the court, declared, that, considering the state of affairs in Ireland, they did not think them fit grounds for an impeachment. In the course of this session, the nation sustained another misfortune in the fate of Sir Francis Wheelock, who had been appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, with instructions to take under his convoy the merchant ships bound to Turkey, Spain, and Italy; to cruise thirty days in a certain latitude, for the protection of the Spanish plate-fleet; and, in making prize, to display the flag and the parchments of the House of Commons, of which he and they were members. which had impoverished his country, continued to tamper with the Duke of Savoy, and, by the canal of the Pope, made some offers to the King of Spain, which were rejected. Meanwhile he resolved to stand upon the offensive during the summer, and in July he passed the Catalonians, where his whole naval force might co-operate with the Count de Noailles, who commanded the land army. King William having received intelligence of the design upon Barcelona, formed a junction of the Brest and Toulon squadrons, by sending Russell to sea as early as the fleet could be in a condition to sail; but before he arrived at Portsmouth, the Brest squadron had quitted the rendezvous. On the third day of May the admiral sailed from St. Helens, and the French, having sailed from the ports of England and Holland, amounting to ninety ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and tenders. He detached Captain Fritharch of the Monmouth with two fire-ships, to destroy a fleet of French merchant ships near Conject-bay; and this service being performed, he returned to St. Helen's, where he had left Sir Cloudesley Shovel with a squadron, to take on board a body of land forces, intended for a descent upon the coast of France. These being embarked, under the command of General Potemkine, the whole fleet sailed again on the twenty-ninth of May. The land and sea officers, in a council of war, agreed that the Monmouth should separate from the rest, and proceed to Camaret-bay, where the forces should be landed. On the fifth day of June, Lord Berkeley, who commanded this squadron, parted with the grand fleet, and on the seventh anchored before the town of Camaret, to the north-west of the Marquis of Caermarthan, afterwards Duke of Leeds, who served under Berkeley, as rear-admiral of the blue, entered Camaret-bay with two large ships and six frigates, to cover the troops in landing. The French had received intelligence of the design, and taken such precautions, under the conduct of the celebrated engineer, Vauban, that the English were exposed to a terrible fire from new-erected batteries, while the confederate frigates, although the ships cannonaded them with great vigour, the soldiers could not maintain any regularity in landing. A good number were killed in the open boats before they reached the shore; and those who landed were soon repulsed, in spite of all the endeavours of General Potemkine, who received a wound in the thigh, which proved mortal. Seven hundred soldiers are said to have been lost on this occasion, besides those that were drowned. The Monmouth of war was towed off with great difficulty; but a Dutch frigate of thirty guns fell into the hands of the enemy.

§ XI. After this unfortunate attempt, Lord Berkeley, with the fleet, sailed to Dunkirk, where he joined with the fleet of Holland, and, at St. Helen's, received orders from the queen to call a council, and deliberate in what manner the ships and forces might be best employed. They agreed to make some attempt at the month, coast of Normandy. With this view they set sail on the fifth day of July. They bombarded Dieppe, and reduced the greatest part of the town to ashes. Thence they steered to Havre-de-Grace, which is like to the same fate. They harassed the French troops, who marched after them along shore. They shivered the whole coast, and visited every town with such consternation, that they would have been abandoned by the inhabitants, had not they been detained by military force. On the twentieth day of July, Lord of the ships rejoined to St. Helen's, where he quitted the fleet, and the command was given to Sir Cloudesley Shovel. This officer having received instructions to make an attempt upon Dunkirk, sailed with them, who, by a less joined, engaged the French and Meeters, with six-and-twenty Dutch pilots. On the twelfth of September he appeared before Dunkirk; and next day set sail in the Charles gallery, with two bomb-ketches, the Duchy of Cornwall. He was also passed for renewing a claim in an old action, limiting the number of acters of the peace, in the county of Wales. The Duke of Norfolk brought an action in the court of King's Bench for the recovery of the claim, but was defeated. The cause was tried, and the jury brought in their verdict for one hundred pounds. Thereupon the Duke of Norfolk petitioned the king, after the advice of the lords of the Council, advised the king to repeal the Act of Parliament. Having received his advice, the king found, restored a youth of twenty-six years, then a cadet at the University of Orléans, where his grandfather, the Duke, had been rector of the university, was called to the court measures, was granted with a and as many of the machines called infernals. These were set on fire without effect, and the design miscarried; then Shovel steered to Calais, which having bombarded with little success, he returned to the coast of England; and his bomb-ketches and machinces were sent into the river Thames.

trenching themselves on the other side of the river. King William having reconnoitred their disposition, thought it impracticable to pass at that place; and therefore marched down to Malines, where he encamped when it was already effected by the Duke of Wurttemberg. Here the confederates passed the Scheldt on the twenty-seventh day of the month; and the king fixed his head-quarters at Warnemehem. His intention was to have taken possession of the town and denuded it of water-works; for a considerable part of his army in that district; but Luxembourgh having posted himself between that place and Menin, extended his lines in such a manner, that the confederates could not get possession of the town without leaving them, nor subcutting his army at the expense of the Castellany of Courtray, during the remainder of the campaign. This surprising march was of such importance to the French king, that he wrote with his own hand a letter of thanks to his army: and ordered that it should be read to every particular squad and battalion.

§ XLIII. The King of England, though disappointed in his scheme upon Courtray, found means to make some advantage of his superiority in number. He drafted troops from the garrison of Ligue and Maestricht; and on the third day of September reinforced his body with a large detachment from his own camp, confining the command upon the garrison of Dulem, and orders to undertake the siege of Iuuy. Next day the whole confederate forces passed the Lys, and encamped at Wouterghem. From thence the king, with part of the army, marched to Heemslager, as if to lay siege to that place, in order to make considerable detachments, for the security of Ypres and Menin on one side, and to cover Furnes and Dunkirk on the other. At this juncture, a Frenchman being seized in the very act of setting fire to one of the ammunition waggoners in the allied army, confessed he had been employed for this purpose by some of the French generals, and suffered death as a traitor. On the sixteenth day of the month, the Duke of Holstein-Ploen invested Iuuy, and carried on the siege in such a manner, that in about a month the garrison capitulated. The king ordered Dixmudey, Deyenne, Ninove, and Tulemont, to be secured for winter-quarters to part of the army: the dauphin returned to Versailles: William quitted the camp on the last day of September; and both armies broke up about the middle of October.

§ XLIV. The operations on the Rhine were preconceived between King William and the Prince of Baden, who had visited London in the water. The dispute between the emperor and the Elector of Saxony was compromised; and this young prince dying during the negociation, the treaty was perfected by his brother and successors. King William furnished twenty thousand men in consideration of a subsidy from the court of Vienna. In the beginning of June, Mareschal de Lorges passed the Rhine at Philspurgh, in order to give battle to the imperialists, encamped at Hailbon. The Prince of Baden, who was not yet joined by the Saxons, Hessians, nor by the troops of Munster and Paderborn, despatched couriers to quench the march of these auxiliaries, and advanced to Eppingen, where he proposed to wait till they should come up; but, on the fifteenth, receiving unfounded intelligence that the enemy were in motion towards him, he advanced to meet them in order of battle. De Lorges concluded that this was a desperate effort, and immediately halted, to make the necessary preparations for an engagement. This pause enabled Prince Louis to take possession of a strong pass near Sintzheim, from which he could not easily be dislodged. Then the Mareschal proceeded to Visloch, and ravaged the adjacent country, in hopes of drawing the imperialists from their entrenchments. The prince being joined by the Hessians, resolved to beat up the quarters of the enemy, and the French general being apprized of his design, retreated at midnight with the utmost precipitancy, and left behind them such baggage as he could. The baggage to Philippsbourg; then he moved to Gonsbergh, in the neighbourhood of Manhem, repassed the Rhine, and encamped between Spiers and Worms. The Prince of Baden was attacked by the allies, and forced to the bridge of boats near Hagenbach, in the middle of September.

§ XLV. We have already observed, that the French king had determined to act vigorously in Catalonia. In the beginning of May, the Duke de Noailles advanced at the head of eight-and-twenty thousand men to the river Ter, on the opposite bank of which the vicerey of Catalonia was encamped with sixteen thousand Spaniards. The French general passed the river in the face of this army, and joined with their entrenchments with such facility, that in less than an hour they were totally defeated. Then he marched to Palamos, and undertook the siege of that place, while at the same time it was blocked up by the combined squadrons of Brent and Toulon. Though the besieged made an obstinate defence, the town was taken by storm, the houses were pillaged, and the people put to the sword, without distinction of age, sex, or condition. Then he invested Gironne, which in a few days capitulated. Ostadt met with the same fate, and Noailles was created vicerey of Catalonia by the French king. In the beginning of August he distributed his forces into quarters of refreshment, along the river Terdevre, resolving to sustain his situation as long as possible, saved by the arrival of Admiral Russel. The war languished in Piedmont, on account of a secret negociation between the King of France and the Duke of Savoy; notwithstanding the reconnoitres of Bourgigny, Earl of Galway, who had succeeded the Duke of Schomberg in the command of the British forces in that country. Canas was closely blocked up by the reduction of Fort St. George, and the Vaubois gained the advantage in some skirmishes in the valley of Bagelles: but no design of importance was executed.*

§ XLVI. England had continued very quiet under the queen's administration, if we except some little commotions occasioned by the practices, or perhaps by intrigues, of the Jacobites. Prosecutions were revived against certain gentlemen of Lancashire and Cheshire, for having been concerned in the conspiracy formed in favour of the late king's projected restoration from Normandy. These steps were owing to the suggestions of infamous informers, whom the ministry countenanced. Colonel Parker and one Crosby were imprisoned, and bills of treason found against them; but Parker made his escape from the Tower, and was released by sending his bills to the Lords. A pound was set upon his head. The king having settled the affairs of the confederacy at the Hague, embarked for England on the eighth of November, and next day landed at Margate, where he was received by the House of Parliament, with a speech, in which he observed that the

* In the course of the year, M. de Casse, governor of St. Domingo, made an unsuccessful attempt upon the island of Jamaica, and M. M. ber; and laid the country of Alasc under contribution. Considering the advanced season of the year, this was a rash undertaking; and the French general resolved to profit by his error. He fought with advantage against the imperialists, foreseeing that should they be worsted in battle, their whole army would be ruined. Prince Louis, informed of his intention, immediately passed the Rhine; and this retreat was more effected, than the French could have supposed; for the whole of the camp he had occupied, was overflown. Soon after this incident both armies retired into winterquarters. The campaign in Hungary produced no effect on the imperialists; who had not, at the close of the winter, arrived at Belgrade in the middle of August; and about the same time Caparra assembled the imperial army in the neighbourhood of Peterwaldin. The Turks passed the Sava, in order to attack their camps, and carried on their approaches with five hundred pieces of cannon; but made very little progress. The imperialists received reinforce ments; the season wasted away; a feud arose between the war and the chart of the Tartars; and the Danube being swelling by heavy rains, so as to interrupt the operations of the Turks, their general decamped in the night of the first of October. They afterwards made an unsuccessful attempt upon Belgrade, while the monarch made himself master of Giulia. In the course of this summer, the Venetians, who were also at war with the Turks, reduced Cylcut, a place of importance on the river Naranta, and made a conquest of the island of Seio in the Archipelago.
posture of affairs was improved both by sea and land since they last partied; in particular, that a stop was put to the progress of the French arms. He desired they would continue the act of tonnage and poundage, which would expire at Christmas, and agree to the transport ships employed in the direction of Ireland; and exhorted them to prepare some good bill for the encouragement of seamen. A majority in both Houses was already secured; and in all probability he bargained for the concurrence of the Scotch parliament, and a bill for ten millions seven hundred sixty thousand seven hundred and twelve pounds for the service of the army and navy. In order to raise this sum, they continued the land-tax; they renewed the subsidy of tonnage and poundage for five years, and imposed new duties on different commodities. The triennial bill enacted, that a parliament should be held once in three years at least: That within three years at first, after the dissolution of the parliament then sitting, and so from time to time, for ever after, legal writs under the great seal should be issued, by the direction of the crown, for calling, assembling, and holding another new parliament; That no parliament should continue longer than two years, and further was recommenced from the first day of the first session: and, that the parliament then subsisting should cease and determine on the first day of November next following, unless their majesty should express an intention to the contrary. The king and queen, who shed tears of sorrow at his decrease; and sincerely lamented by the public, as a pattern of elegance, ingenuity, meekness, charity, and moderation. These qualities he must be allowed to have possessed, notwithstanding the inventives of his enemies, who accused him of puritanism, flattery, and ambition; and charged him with having conveyed to a dangerous schism in the church, by accepting the archbishopre of Canterbury living the life of a heretic. He was mighty and wise; the metaphysian see by Dr. Tennison, Bishop of Lincoln, recommended by the whig party, which now predominated in the cabinet. The queen did not long survive her favourite prelate. After his death, and that of his wife, he was taken from the small-pox, and the symptom proving dangerous, she prepared herself for death with great composure. She spent some time in exercises of devotion, and private conversation with the new archbishop; she received the sacrament with all the bishops who were in attendance; and expired on the twenty-eighth day of December, in the thirty-third year of her age and in the sixth of her reign, to the inexpressible grief of the king, who for some weeks after her death could neither see company nor attend to the business of state. Mary was in her person tall and well-proportioned, with an oval visage, lively eyes, agreeable features, a mild aspect, and an air of dignity. Her apprehension was clear, her memory tenacious, and her judgment sound. She was a zealous protagonist, scrupulously exact in all the duties of devotion, of an even temper, and of a calm and mild conversation. She was ruffled by no passion, and seems to have been a stranger to the emotions of natural affection; for she ascended, without compunction, the throne from which her father had been deposed, and treated her sister as an alien to her blood. In a word, Mary seems to have imbibed the cold disposition and apathy of her husband; and to have centered all her ambition in desiring the epithet of an humble and obedient wife. It was XLVIIL In the meantime, being informed of the queen’s dangerous indisposition, sent a lady of her bed-chamber to desire she might be admitted to her majesty; but this request was not granted. She was thanked for her expression of concern, and given to understand the physician had directed that the queen should be kept as quiet as possible. Before her death, however, she sent a forgiving message to her sister; and after her decease, the Earl of Sunderland effected a reconciliation between the king and queen, and placed them at Kensington, where she was received with uncommon civility. He appointed the palace of St. James’s for her residence, and presented her with the greater part of the queen’s jewels. But a mutual jealousy had disappeared, and both went to reside at the exteriors of friendship and esteem. The two Houses of parliament wanted in the king at Kensingom, with consolatory addresses on the death of his consort: ther e example was followed by the regency of Scotland, the clergy and clergy of London, the dissenting ministers, and almost all the great corporations in England.

to France, helped to conceal others that came from that kingdom; and that all those persons told him they were furnished with money by Sir John Friend to defray the expense of their expeditions. His testimony was confirmed by other infamous emigrants, who renewed but too much counterace from the government. Blank warrants were issued, and filled up occasionally with such names as the informers suggested. These were delivered to Aaron Smith, solicitor to the treasury, with whom the baclers, according to Lt. and his associates to Lancashire, tinder the protection of a party of Dutch horse guards, com-dined by one Captain Baker. They were empowered to break open houses, seize papers, and apprehend persons according to their pleasure; and they committed many acts of violence and oppression. The persons, against whom these measures were taken, being apprized of the impending danger, generally retired from their own habitations. Some, however, were taken and imprisoned; a few arms were secured; and, in the house of Mr. Stanish, at Standish-hall, they found the draft of a declaration to be published by King James at his landing. As this prosecution seemed calculated to revive the horror of a stale conspiracy, and the evidence were persons of abandoned characters, the friends of those who were persecuted found no great difficulty in rendering the scheme odious to the nation, and the police employed Cesare Fergusson, who had been concerned in every plot that was hatched since the Rye-house conspiracy. This veteran, though appointed housekeeper to the excise-office, thought himself himself vexed for the part he acted in the revolution, became dissatisfied, and upon this occasion, published a letter to Sir John Trenchard on the abuse of power. It was replete with the most bitter invectives against the ministry, and contained a great number of dastard instances, in which the court had committed the vilest corruption, perfidy, and oppression. This production was in every body’s hand, and had such an effect upony the people, that when the prisoners were brought to trial, they were found guilty; and he was put to death sus to death had not been prevented by the interposition of those who were friends to the accused persons, and had already taken effectual measures for their safety.
Lunt, chief associate in the mystery of information was wasTarface, a wretch of the most profligate principles, who finding himself disappointed in his hope of reward from the ministry, was privately gained over by the agents for the prisoners. Lunt, when desired in court to point out the persons whom he had accused, committed such a mistake as greatly invalidated his testimony; and Tarface declared before the bench, that the pretended plot was no other than a false one, between himself and Lunt Cranmer, in order to procure money from the government. The pris-niners were immediately acquitted, and the ministry incurred a heavy load of popular odium, as the authors or abettors of those crimes were the innocent. The government, with a view to preserve their abhorrence of such practices, ordered the witnesses to be prosecuted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the gentlemen who had been accused; and at last the affair was brought into the House of Commons. The Jacobites triumphed in their victory. They even turned the battery of corruption upon the evidence for the crown, not making it a considerable impression. But the cause was now debated before judges who were not at all proportionate to their views. The Commons having set on foot an inquiry, and examined all the papers and circumstances relating to the pretended plot, resolved, That there was sufficient ground for the prosecution. They ordered the men at Manchester; and that there was a dangerous conspiracy against the king and government. They issued an order for taking Mr. Stanish into custody; and the messenger reporting that he had not yet been found, they proceed an address to the king, desiring a proclamation might be published, offering a reward for apprehending his person. The Peers concurred with the Commons in their sentiments of this affair; and they have been since then the House of Lords, also, by the persons who thought themselves aggrieved, the question was put, whether the government had cause to prosecute them; and carried in the affirmative; though a protest was entered against this vote by the Earls of Rochester and Nottingham. Notwithstanding these decisions, the accused gentlemen prosecuted Lunt and two of his accomplices for perjury, at the Lancster assizes; and all three were found guilty. They were immediately indicted by the crown, for a conspiracy against the lives and liberties of the persons they had accused. The intention of the ministry, in laying this indictment, was to seize the opportunity of punishing some of the witnesses for the general. A man who had preserved an honest testimony, but the design being discovered, the Lancastershire men refused to produce their evidence against the informers: the prosecution dropped of consequence, and the prisoners were discharged.

§ II. While these measures were employed in examining the state of the revenue, and taking measures for raising the necessary supplies, the inhabitants of Rossjohn presented a petition, complaining, that the officers and soldiers promised to consider the remittance, and redress the grievances of which they complained. Accordingly, he ascended Colonel Hastings; appointed a council of officers to sit weekly and examine all complaints against any officer and soldier; and published a declaration for the maintenance of strict discipline, and the due payment of quarters. Notwithstanding these concessions the Commons prosecuted their examinations; and the contractors for clothing the army, because they were refused to answer upon oath to such questions as might be put to him by the commissioners of accounts. They brought a bill for obliging him and Mr. Richard Harriug, the other contractor, together with the two Pauncefords, to discover how they had disposed of the sums paid into their hands on account of the army; and for punishing them, in case they should persist in their refusal. At this period they received a petition against the commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches. Three of them, by means of an address to the king, were removed with disgrace, for having acted arbitrarily, corruptly, and contrary to the trust reposed in them by act of parliament.

§ III. Those who encouraged this spirit of reformation introduced another inquiry about the orphans’ bill, which was since passed, and was act, liable to the undue influence. A committee being appointed to inспект the chamberlain’s books, discovered that bribes had been given to Sir John Trevor, speaker of the House, and Mr. Wilmot, speaker of the committee. The first being voted guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, abdicated the chair, and Paul Foley was appointed speaker in his stead. Then Sir John and Mr. Wilmot were summoned before the committee of House naturally concluded that the same arts had been practised in obtaining the new charter of the East India company, which had been granted so much against the sense of the nation. Their books were subjected to the same committee that carried on the inquiry into the East India company, and surety for the punctuality and corruption was soon disclosed. It appeared that the company, in the course of the preceding year, had paid near ninety thousand pounds in secret services; and that Sir Thomas Cooke, one of the directors, had, in a manner similar to that in which the chief manager of this infamous commerce, Cooke, refusing to answer, was committed to the Tower, and a bill of pains and penalties brought in, obliging him to discover how the sums claimed and paid had been distributed. The bill was violently opposed in the upper House by the Duke of Leeds, as being contrary to law and equity, and furnishing a precedent of a dangerous nature. Cooke being, in great fear to his own person, brought to the bar of the House of Lords, declared he was ready and willing to make a full discovery, in case he might be favoured with an indemnifying vote, to secure him against all actions and suits, except those of the East India company, in which he had been indemnified. The Lords commended his request, and passed a bill for this purpose, to which the Commons added a penal clause; and the former was laid aside.

§ 4. When the king went to the House, to give the royal assent to the money bills, he endeavoured to discourage this inquiry, by telling the parliament that the session of the year was far advanced, and the circumstances of necessity requiring an end of the articles of impeachment, which he would not despatch such business as they should think of most importance to the public, as he should put an end to the session in a few days. Notwithstanding this shameful interposition, both Houses appointed a joint committee to lay on the complicated scheme of fraud and iniquity. Cooke, on his first examination, confessed, that he had delivered tallies for ten thousand pounds to Francis Tytson, deputy-governor, for the special-service of the company; an equal sum to Robertas, five hundred to Charles Bates, and three hundred and ten to Mr. Moliness, a merchant, for the same purposes; and he owned that Sir Basil Firebrace had received forty thousand pounds on various pretences. In the same day, the sums paid to Tytson were delivered to the king by Sir Joseph Child, as a customary present which former kings had received; and that the sums paid to Acton were distributed among some members of parliament. Firebrace being examined, affirmed that he had received the whole forty thousand pounds for his own use and benefit; but that Bates had received sums of money, which he understood were offered to some persons of the first quality. Acton declared that ten thousand pounds of the sum which he had received was distributed among persons who had interest with members of parliament; and that great part of the money passed through the hands of Clapps, who was acquainted with some colonels in the House, and northern members. Bates owned he had received the money, in consideration of using his interest with the Duke of Leeds in favour of the company: that this noblemans knew of the gratuity; and that the sum was reckoned by his Grace's domestic, one Roberta, a forger, who kept it in his possession until this inquiry was talked of, and then it was returned. In a word, it appeared by this man's testimony, as well as by the Marquis of Tweedale, appointed commissioner, who, after the king's letter had been read, expatiated on his majesty's care and concern for their safety and welfare; and his firm purpose to maintain the presbyterian discipline in the church of Scotland. Then he pronounced upon the king's name, that if they would pass an act for establishing a colony in Africa, America, or any other part of the world where a colony might be lawfully planted, his majesty would act in concert with such rights and privileges as he had granted in like cases to the subjects of his other dominions. Finally, he exhorted them to consider ways and means to raise the necessary supplies for maintaining their land forces, and for providing a competent number of ships of war. The parliament immediately voted an address of condolence to his majesty on the death of the queen; and they granted one hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling for the services of the ensuing year, to be raised by a general poll-tax, a land-tax, and an additional excise.

§ VIII. Their next step was to desire the commissioner would transmit their humble thanks to the king, for his care to vindicate the honour of the government and the justice of the nation, in ordering a precognizance to be taken with respect to the slaughter of Glencoe. A motion was afterwards made that the commissioners should exhibit an account of their proceedings in this affair; and according to a report, consisting of the king's instructions, Dalrymple's letters, the depositions of witnesses, and the opinion of the committee, was laid before the parliament. The motion is said to have been privately influenced by Secretary Johnstone, of the affairs of Darien, who was his rival in power and interest. The written opinion of the commissioners, who were creatures of the court, importuned, That Macdonald of Glencoe had been poniardedly murdered; That the king's instructions contained nothing to warrant the massacre; and that Secretary Dalrymple had exceeded his orders. The parliament concurred with this report. They resolved, that Livingston was not to blame, for having given the order in his absence, for sending him home to be tried in Scotland; as also, that Campbell of Glenlivet, Captain Drummond, Lieutenant Lindsy, Ensign Lundy, and Serjeant Barber, should be sent to Scotland, and prosecuted according to law, for the parts they had acted in that affair. The commission, in consequence of these resolutions, the parliament drew up an address to the king, in which they laid the whole blame of the massacre upon the excess in the Master of Stair's letters concerning that transaction. They began, By the commission, that the sentence would probably hang over her, as he should think fit for the vindication of his government; that the actors in that barbarous slaughter might be prosecuted by the king's advocate, according to law; and that some resolution might be made to the men of Glencoe who escaped the massacre, for the losses they had sustained in their effects upon that occasion, as their habitations had been plundered and burned, their lands wasted, and their cattle driven away; so that they were reduced to extreme poverty. Notwithstanding this address to the Scottish parliament, by which the king was so solemnly exculpated, his memory is still loaded with the suspicion of having concurred, countenanced, and enforced this barbarous excess. In consequence of these resolutions, the parliament dismissed the commission, and passed the act of censure, and the commission was put to death, without giving them any satisfaction; and the other actors in the tragedy, far from being punished, were preferred in the service. While the commissioners were employed in the inquiry, they made such discoveries concerning the conduct of the Earl of Breadalbane, as amounted to a charge of high treason: and he was committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh; but it seems he had disseminated with the highlanders, by the king's permission, and now sheltered himself under the shadow of a royal pardon.

§ IX. The committee of trade, in pursuance of the powers granted by the king to his commissioner, prepared an act for establishing a company trading to Africa and the Indies, empowered to plant towns, or forts, in places uninhabited, or in others, with the consent of the natives; vesting them with an exclusive right, and an exemption for one-and-twenty years from all duties and impositions. This act was likewise confirmed by letters-patent under the great seal, directed by the parliament, without any further warrant from the crown. Patterson, the Roman Catholic, took the advantage of this settlement upon the Isthmus of Darien in such a manner as to carry on a trade in the South Sea, as well as in the Atlantic; nay, even to extend it as far as the East Indies: so great was the glory of his projects, allowed by the prospect of gain, were eager to engage in such a company, excepted from all manner of imposition and restriction. The Scottish parliament likewise passed an act in favour of the episcopal clergy, deeming. That those who should enter in that character, if their means were not required, might continue in their benefits under his majesty's protection, without being subject to the power of presbytery. Seventy of the most noted ministers of that persuasion took the benefit of this indulgence. Another law was enacted, for raising nine thousand men early, to recruit the Scottish regiments abroad; and an act for erecting a public bank; then the parliament was adjourned to the seventh day of November.

§ X. Ireland began to be infected with the same factions which had broke out in England since the revolution: Lord Capel, the lord-deputy, governed in a very partial manner, that the parliament was not able to ferret out in regard to equity or decorum. He undertook to model his parliament in such a manner, that they should comply with all the demands of the ministry; and he succeeded in his endeavours, by making such arbitrary changes in offices as were most useful to the ministry. He had passed an act for the convoking a parliament for the twenty-seventh day of August, when he opened the session with a speech, expatiating upon their obligations to King William, and exhorting them to make that return to the society and means of the nation. They forthwith voted an address of thanks, and resolved to assist his majesty to the utmost of their power, against all his enemies foreign and domestic. They passed the bill for an additional excise, together with an act for taking away the words "De heretic; comburendo;" another amnulling all attaunders and acts passed in the late pretended parliament of King James: a third to prevent foreign education: a fourth for a poll-tax; a fifth for the settling the estates of intestates. Then they resolved, That a sum not exceeding one hundred and sixty-three thousand three hundred and twenty-five pounds, should be granted to his majesty, and the five hundred and twenty pounds, and a continuation of the additional excise. Sir Charles Porter, the chancellor, finding his importance diminished, if not entirely destroyed, by the assuming disposition and power of the lord-deputy, began to court popularity by exposing the cause of the Irish, against the severity of the administration; and actually formed a kind of tory interest, which thwarted Lord Capel in all his measures. A motion was made in parliament to impeach the chancellor for sowing discord and division among his majesty's subjects: but being indulged with a hearing by the House of Commons, he justified himself so much to their satisfaction, that he was voted clear of all imputation by a great majority. Notwithstanding this act, forty thousand pounds were sent over an address, in which they bore testimony to the mild and just administration of their lord-deputy.

§ XI. King William having taken such steps as were deemed necessary to correct the abuse of power in his absence, crossed the sea to Holland in the middle of May, fully determined to make some great effort in the Netherlands, that might aggrandize his military character, and humble the power of France, which was already on the decline. The king's title was actually of such a manner, that the haughty Louis found himself obliged to stand upon the defensive against enemies over whom he had been used to triumph with uninterrupted success. France, which had not only subdued, but probably could not quiet; he saw his advances to peace rejected; and to crown his misfortunes, he sustained an irparable

The conduct of the army in Flanders was intrusted to Mareschal Villeroi; and Boufflers commanded a separate army, though subject to the other's orders. As the disposition of the latter was so much neglected, it was granted that the confederates would have a superiority of numbers in the field, and was well acquainted with the enterprise genius of their chief; he ordered a new line to be drawn between the Lyse and Oudenarde, in order to secure Dunkirk, which Villeroi had intended to invest; but that general now changed his resolution, and undertook the siege of Druymede, garrisoned by eight battalions of foot, and a regiment of dragoons, commanded by Major-General Otterberg, who, to six and thirty hours after the trenches were opened, surrendered himself and his soldiers prisoners of war. This scandalous example was followed by Colonel de Marrel, who yielded the towns of St. Omer, Ypres, to the elector of Saxony on the same conditions, even before a battery was opened by the besiegers. In the sequel they were both tried for their misbehaviour: Ellemberg suffered death, and Ofarel was broken with infancy. The Prince of Vaudemont sent a message to the French general, demanding the garrisons of those two places, according to a cartel which had been settled between the powers at war; but no regard was paid to this remonstrance. Villeroi, after several marches of the old part of his army, countermanded the order, and returned to the camp.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

The breaches being now practicable, and preparations made for a general assault, Count Guscard, the governor, capitulated for the town on the fourth of August; and the French retired into the citadel, against which twelve batteries played upon the thirteenth. The trenches, meanwhile, were carried on with great expedition, notwithstanding all the efforts of the besieged, who fired without ceasing, and exerted amazing diligence and intrepidity in defending and repairing the damage they sustained. At length, the assaults became so destructive from the unceasing showers of bombs and red-hot bullets, that Boufflers, after having made divers furious sorties, formed a scheme for breaking through the confederate camp with his cavalry, but the attempt, however, was prevented by the extreme vigilance of King William.

§ XV. After the bombardment of Brussels, Villeroi being reinforced with all the troops that could be drafted from garrisons, advanced towards Namur, with an army of ninety thousand men; and Prince Vaubemont being joined by the Prince of Hesse, with a strong body of forces from the Rhine, took possession of the strong camp at Massy, within five English miles of the besieging army. The King, understanding that the enemy had reached Fleurus, where they discharged ninety pieces of cannon, as a signal to inform the garrison of their approach, left the conduct of the siege to the Elector of Bavaria, and took upon himself the command of the confederate army, in order to oppose Villeroi, who, being further reinforced by a detachment from Germany, declared, that he would hazard a battle for the relief of Namur. But, when he viewed the forces which lay near Massy, he resolved his resolution, and retired in the night without noise. On the thirteenth day of August, the besieged were summoned to surrender, by Count Horne, who, in a parley with the Count de Lecque, general of the French infantry, gave him to understand, that the Mareschal Villeroi had demanded the Meusegate; so that the garrison could not expect to be relieved. No immediate answer being returned to this message, the parley was broke off, and the king resolved to proceed without day to a general assault, which he had already planned with the elector and his other generals. Between one and two in the afternoon, Lord Cutts, who desired the command, though it was not in his turn of duty, rushed out of the trenches of the second line, at the head of three hundred grenadiers, to make a lodgment in the breach of Terra-nova, supported by the regiments of Coulthorp, Buxham, Hamilton, and Mackay; who, with Cutts, had a body of match, the Bavarians, and Brandenburgers, attacked at two other places. The assailants met with such a warm reception, that the English grenadiers were repulsed, even after they had mounted the breach, Lord Cutts being for some time disabled by a wound. Many were killed and afterwards killed by a cannon-ball from the batteries of the besiegers. The Bavarians, by mistaking their way, were exposed to a terrible fire, by which their general, Count Rivera, and a great number of their officers were slain: nevertheless, they fixed themselves on the outward entrenchment, on the point of the Cochorn next to the Sambre, and maintained their ground with amazing fortitude. Lord Cutts, when his wound was dressed, returned to the scene of action, and ordered two hundred chosen men of Mackay's regiment, commanded by Lieutenant Cockle, to attack the face of the saillant-angle next to the breach, sword in hand, while the ensigns of the same regiment should advance, and plant the colours on the palissades. Cockle and his detachment executed the command he had received with admirable intrepidity. They broke through the palisadoes, drove the French from the covered-way, made a lodgment in one of the batteries, and turned the cannon against the enemy. The Bavarians, being thus sustained, made their post good. The Major-Generals La Cave and Schwerin lodged themselves at the same time, on the left, and though the general assault did not succeed in its full extent, the confederates remained masters of a very considerable lodgment, nearly an English mile in length. Yet this was dearly purchased with two thousand men, including many officers of great rank and reputation. During the action the Elector of Bavaria signalized his courage in a very remarkable manner, riding from place to place through the hottest of the fire, giving his directions with notable presence of mind, according to the emergency of circumstances, animating the officers with praise and promise of preference, and distributing handfuls of gold among the private soldiers.

§ XVI. On the first day of September, the besieged having obtained a cessation of arms, that their dead might be buried, the Count de Guscard appearing on the breach, and, it was desired, so as to prevent the destruction of the batteries immediately mounting the breach, the French governor offered to surrender the fort of Coehorn; but was given to understand, that if he intended to capitulate, he must treat with the Elector of Bavaria. His highness immediately accepted of Boufflers, he agreed to the proposal; the cessation was prolonged, and that very evening the capitulation was finished. Villeroi, who lay encamped at Embourg, was no sooner apprised of the event, by a discharges of all the artillery, and a running fire along the lines of the confederate army, than he passed the Sambre near Charleroi, with great precipitation; and having reinforced the garrison of Dinant, retreated towards the lines in the neighborhood of Mons. On the fifth day of September, the French garrison, which was now restored from fifteen to five thousand five hundred men, evacuated the citadel of Namur. Boufflers, in marching out, was arrested in the name of the King, who had returned from the garrisons of Dixmude and Deynse, which the French king had detained, contrary to the cartel subsisting between the two nations. The mareschal was not a little disgraced in the eyes of the allies, who received him warmly at王先生, who assured him the King of Great Britain entertained a profound respect for his person and character. William even offered to set him at liberty, provided he would pass his word, that the garrisons of Dixmude and Deynse should be sent back to his majesty, who would return in a fortnight. He said, that he could not enter into any such engagement, as he did not know his master's reasons for detaining the garrisons in question. He was therefore, conveyed to Namur; was thence removed to Maestricht, and treated with great reverence and respect, till the return of an officer whom he had despatched to Versailles with an account of his capture. Then he engaged his word, that the garrisons of Dixmude and Deynse should be sent back to the allied army. He was immediately released, and conducted in safety to Dinant. When he repaired to Versailles, Louis was always in full of extraordinary respect for his captive, and offered him the warmest expressions of regard; declared himself perfectly well satisfied with his conduct; created him a duke and peer of France; and presented him with a very large sum, in acknowledgment of his defeat, taken and killed, and afterwards killed by a cannon-ball from the batteries of the besiegers. The Bavarians, by mistaking their way, were exposed to a terrible fire, by which their general, Count Rivera, and a great number of their officers were slain: nevertheless, they fixed themselves on the outward entrenchment, on the point of the Cochorn next to the Sambre, and maintained their ground with amazing fortitude.

was so dilatory in their preparations, that he was not in a condition to set till the middle of August. Lord Paget had been sent ambassador from England to the Ottoman Porte, with instructions relating to a pacification: but being arrested in Provence, where the Sultan died and was succeeded by his nephew, Mustapha, who resolved to prosecute the war in person. The warlike genius of this new emperor afforded but an uncomfortable prospect to his subjects, that their Duke Michel, that Mussulman 'had taken the opportunity of the war in Hungary, to invade the Crimea, and besiege Azoph; so that the Tartars were too much employed at home to spare the succours which the Sultan demanded. Nevertheless, Mustapha and his son, the future Sultan, who had already commenced the operations of the campaign, passed the Danube, took Lissa and Titul by assault, stormed the camp of General Veteran, who was posted at Lugos with seven thousand men, and who lost his life in the action. The infantry were cut to pieces, after having made a desperate defence; but the horse retreated to Cariosebes, under the conduct of General Truchese. The Turks, after this exploit, retired to Orsova. Their navy, meanwhile, surprised the Venetian fleet at Scio, where several ships of the republic were destroyed, and they recovered that island, which the Venetians thought proper to abandon; but, in order to balance this misfortune, these last obtained a decisive victory over the Barshaw of Negropont in the Morea.

§ XVIII. The French king still maintained a secret negotiation with the Duke of Savoy, whose conduct had been equally unnerving, that the ministers of State, and the opinion of his allies, undertook the siege of Castil, which was counted one of the strongest fortifications in Europe, defended by a numerous garrison, abundantly supplied with ammunition and provision. The siege was begun about the middle of May; and the place was surrendered by capitulation in about fourteen days, to the astonishment of the French, who did not know that this was a sacrifice by which the French court obtained the Duke's forbearance during the remaining part of the campaign. The capitulation imported, that the place should be restored to the Duke of Mantua, who was the rightful proprietor; that the fortifications should be demolished at the expense of the allies; that the garrison should remain in the fort till that work should be completed: and hostages were exchanged for the performance of these conditions. The duke understood the art of prosecution so well, that September was far advanced before the siege was desisted; and then he was again seized with an ague, which obliged him to quit the army.

§ XIX. In Catalonia the French could hardly maintain the footing they had gained. Admiral Russel, who wintered at Malons, took possession of him, and asserted all his majesty's ships employed, or to be employed, in the narrow seas, and in the Mediterranean. He was reinforced by four thousand five hundred soldiers, under the command of Brigadier-General Stewart; and seven thousand men, imperialists as well as Spaniards, were drafted from Italy for the defence of Catalonia. These forces were transported to Barcelona, under the convoy of Admiral Nevil, detached by Russel for that purpose. The affairs of Catalonia had already changed their aspect. Several French parties had been defeated. The Spaniards had blocked up Ostalric and Castel-Follit: Nusilis had been recalled, and the command devolved upon the Duke de Vendome, who no sooner understood that the forces from Italy were landed, than he distanced Ostalric and Castel-Follit, and retired to Palamos. The Viceroy of Catalonia, and the English admiral, having resolved to give battle to the enemy, and reduce Palamos, the English troops were landed on the ninth day of August, and the allied army advanced to Palamos. The French appeared in order of battle; but the viceroy declined an engagement; and from attacking the enemy, he withdrew his forces, and the admiral, returning to the British squadron, which ought to have joined the fleets of England and Holland: that he had taken no care to provide tents and provisions for the British forces. On the twenty-seventh day of August he sailed for the coast of Portugal, where the fleet was engaged by the enemy in a tempest: then he steered down the Straits, and towards the latter end of September arrived in the bay of Cadiz. There he left a number of ships under the command of Vice-Admiral Cooke, who was expected from England, and returned home with the rest of the combined squadrons.

§ XX. While Admiral Russel asserted the British dominion in the Mediterranean, the French coast was again insulted in their turn by a fleet of twenty ships under command of Lord Berkeley of Stratton, assisted by the Dutch admiral Allemoine. On the fourth day of July they anchored before St. Malo, which they bombarded from nine ketches covered by some frigates, which sustained more damage than was done to the enemy. On the sixth, Granville underwent the same fate, and then the fleet returned to Portsmouth. The bomb vessels being refitted, the fleet sailed round to the Downs, where four hundred soldiers were embarked for an attempt upon Dunkirk, under the direction of Meesters the famous Dutch engineer, who had prepared his infernal, and other machines for the service. On the first day of August the experiment was tried without success; but two smoke ships miscarried. The French had secured the Rishbank and wooden forts with pikes, bombs, chains, and floating batteries, in such a manner that they could not be drawn near enough to produce any effect. Besides, the councils of the assailants were distracted by violent animosities. The English officers hated Meesters, because he was a Dutchman, and had acquired some credit with the king; but, on the other hand, treated them with disrespect. He retired with his machines in the night, and refused to co-operate with Lord Berkeley in his design upon Calais, which was now put in execution. On the sixteenth he brought his batteries to bear upon the place, and several of the French quarters, but the enemy had taken such precautions as rendered his scheme abortive.

§ XXI. A squadron had been sent to the West Indies under the joint command of Captain Robert Wilton and Colonel Lillingston, with twelve hundred land forces. They had instructions to co-operate with the Spaniards in Hispaniola, against the French settlements on that island, and to destroy their fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland, in their return. In their return, they were accordingly joined by seventeen hundred Spaniards raised by the President of St. Domingo; but instead of proceeding against Petit-Guara, according to the direction they had received, they anchored at Port France, and laid designs for the country for his own private advantage, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Lillingston, who protested against his conduct. In a word, the sea and land officers lived in a state of perpetual dissension; and both became extremely disagreeable to the Spaniards, who soon renounced all connexion with them and their designs. In the beginning of September the commodore set sail for England, and lost one of his ships in the gulf of Florida. He himself died in his passage; and the greater part of the men being swept off by an epidemic distemper, the squadron returned to Britain in a most miserable condition. Notwithstanding the great efforts the nation had made to maintain such a number of different squadrons for the protection of commerce, as well as to annoy the enemy, the trade suffered severely from the French privateers, which swarmed in both channels, and made prise of many rich vessels. The Marquis of Caermarthen, being stationed with a squadron off the Scilly islands, mustook a fleet of merchant ships for the Brest fleet, and retired with precipitation to Milford-Haven. In consequence of this retreat, the privateers took a good number of ships from Barbadoes, and one of the French admiral's ships valued at a million sterling. The merchants renewed their clamour against the commissioners of the admiralty, who produced their orders and instructions in their own defence. The admiral had been guilty of the neglect to make any provision for the conduct on this occasion; but the chief source of those national calamities was the circumstantial intelligence transmitted to France, from time to time, by the malcontents of England; for they were actuated by a scandalous jealousy, of which they stood divested, namely, that of rejoicing in the distress of the country.

§ XXII. King William, after having conferred with the states of Holland, and the Elector of Brandenburgh, who met him at the Hague, embarked for England on the nineteenth of November, October, and landed at Margate, from whence he proceeded to London, where he was received as a conqueror, amidst the rejoicings and acclamations of the people. On the same day, he summoned a convention of the lords and commons, in which it was determined to convocate a new parliament. While the nation was in good humour, it was supposed that they would return such members only as were well affected to the government; whereas the present parliament might proceed in its inquiries into corruption and other grievances, and be less influenced by the crown, as their dependence was of such short duration. The parliament was, therefore, dissolved by proclamation, and a new one summoned to meet at Westminster on the twenty-second day of November. While the whole nation was occupied in the elections, William, by the advice of his chief confidants, laid his own disposition under restraint, in another effort to conciliate the people. He honoured the diversions of Newmarket with his presence, and there received a compliment of congratulation from the University of Cambridge. Then he visited the Earls of Sunderland, Northumberland, and Newcastle, at their different houses in the country; and proceeded with a splendid retinue to Lincoln, from whence he repaired to Welbeck, a seat belonging to the Duke of Newcastle in Nottinghamshire, where he was attended by Dr. Sharp, Archbishop of York, and his clergy. He lodged one night with Lord Brooke, at Warwick castle, dined with the Duke of Shrewsbury at Eyrefoot, and by the way of Woodstock, made a solemn entry into Oxford, having been met at some distance from the town by the Earls, and at the same time the University, the vice-chancellor, the doctors in their habits, and the magistrates in their formalities. He proceeded directly to the theatre, where he was welcomed in an elegant Latin speech; he received from the chancellor on his knees the usual presents of a large English Bible, and book of Common Prayer, the cuts of the university, and a pair of gold-fringed gloves. The conduits ran with wine, and a magnificent banquet was prepared, but an anonymous letter being found on the stairs, it was said there was a design to poison his majesty, William refused to eat or drink in Oxford, and retired immediately to Windsor. Notwithstanding this abrupt departure, which did not escape the search of magistrates at the university, Sir William Trumbal, secretary of state, as one of their representatives in parliament.

The king character had proved ineffectual; he was still dry, reserved, and forbidding; and the malcontents weighed bitterly against his behaviour to the Process Anne of Denmark. The queen, when left alone, or sequestered in England, this lady congratulated him upon his success in a dutiful letter, to which he would not desire to send a reply, either by writing or message; nor had she or her husband been favoured with the slightest mark of his favour or recognition. that after an appointed day, no clipped money would pass to payment, except to the collectors of the revenue and taxes, or upon loans or payment into the exchequer: that, after another day to be appointed, no clipped money of any sort should pass to payment whatsoever: and that a third day was to be appointed to bring their clipped money to be resumed, after which they should have no allowance upon what they might offer. They addressed the king to issue a proclamation agreeing to these resolutions: and, if the clipped money was not be resumed on such day, it was to be published accordingly. Such were the fears of the people, augmented and inflamed by the enemies of the government, that all payment immediately ceased, and a face of distraction appeared through the whole kingdom. The adversaries of the king seized this opportunity to aggravate the apprehensions of the public. They inveighed against the ministry, as the authors of this national grievance; they levelled their satire particularly at Montague; and it required uncommon fortitude and address to avert the most dangerous consequences of popular discontent. The House of Commons agreed to the following resolutions: that twelve hundred thousand pounds should be raised by a duty on glass windows, to make up the loss on the clipped money; that the recompense for supplying the deficiency of clipped money should extend to all silver coin, though of a coarser alloy than the standard: that the collectors and other officers of the government and services to be employed should receive all such moneys; that a reward of fifteen per cent. should be given to all such persons as should bring in either milled or broad uncropped money, to be applied to the expenses of the kingdom: that a reward of three-pence per ounce should be given to all persons who should bring in wrought plate to the mint to be coined: that persons might pay in their whole next year’s land-tax in clipped money, at one convenient time to be appointed for that purpose: that the commissioners should be appointed in every county, to pay and distribute the milled and broad uncropped money, and the new coined money, in lieu of that which was diminished. A committee was appointed by the House, to examine into these determinations, was sent up to the House of Lords, who made some amendments, which the Commons rejected; but, in order to avoid cavils and conferences, they dropped the bill, and brought in another without the clauses which the Lords had inserted. They were again proposed in the upper House, and overruled by the majority: and, on the twenty-first day of January, the bill received the royal assent. The king, in instructing the commissioners to inquire into the clipping annuities, and continuing the duties on low wines. At the same time, the king passed the bill of trials for high treason, and an act to prevent mercenary elections. Divers measures were introduced to enforce the Commons; and that the losses in their trade and payments, occasioned by the rise of guineas, might be taken into consideration. A bill was immediately brought in for taking off the obligations and encouragement for coming guineas for a certain time; and the Commons proceeded to lower the value of this coin: a task in which they met with great opposition from some members, who alleged that it would foment the public disturbances. At length, however, the majority agreed, that a guinea should be lowered from thirty to eight and twenty shillings, and afterwards to six and twenty: at length a clause was inserted in the bill for encouraging people to bring plate to the mint, setting the price of a guinea at fifteen and half-pence, and naturally sunk to its original value of twenty shillings and sixpence. Many persons, however, supposing that the price of gold would be raised the next session, hastened up the proceedings; and many sums and recommendations by the malcontents, the new coined silver money was reserved, to the great detriment of commerce. The king ordered mints to be erected in York, Bristol, Exeter, and Chester, for the purpose of the recovery, which was executed with great diligence, and with a view to the currency of England, which had been the worst, became the best, coin in Europe.

§ XXV. At this period the attention of the Commons was almost exclusively directed to the king’s fortune, and to the affairs of Derbyshire. While the warrant was depending, the gentlemen of that county resolved to oppose it with all their power. In consequence of a petition, they were indulged with a hearing by the lords of the treasury. Sir William Williams, in the name of the rest, alleged that the lordsships of the Princes of Wales, actually unalienable; that the revenues of those lordsships supported the government of Wales, in paying the judges and other salaries; that the grant was of too large an extent for any foreign subject; and that the people of the county were too great to be subject to any foreigner. Sundry other substantial reasons were used against the grant, which, notwithstanding all their remonstrances, would have passed were not the king’s gentlemen addressed themselves by petition to the House of Commons. Upon this occasion, Mr. Price, a member of the House, harangued with great severity against the Dutch in general, and did not even abstain from sarcasms upon the king’s person, title, and government. The objections started by the petitioners being duly considered, were found so reasonable, that the Commons presented an address to the king, representing, that those mansions had been usually annexed to the principality of Wales, and proceeded on the Princes of Wales for their support: that many persons in those parts held their estates by royal tenure, under great and valuable compositions, rents, royal payments, and grants. The king and Scotch had enjoyed great privileges and advantages under such tenure. They, therefore, besought his majesty to recall the grant, which was in diminution of the honour and interest of the crown; and that he would not have passed were not the representatives of the kingdom in foreign parts not been allotted without the consent of parliament. This address met with a cold reception from the king, who promised to recall the grant which had given such offence to the Commons; and said he would pass it, in some other way of showing his displeasure. at the time ofPortsmouth.

§ XXVI. The people in general entertained a national aversion to this nobleman: the malcontents imputed a notion that he made use of his interest and intelligence to injure the trade of England, that the commerce of his own country might flourish without competition. To his suggestions they imputed the act and patent in favour of the Scottish company, which was supposed to have been thrown in as a bone of contention between the two kingdoms. The subject was first started in the House of Lords, who invited the Commons to a conference; a committee was appointed to examine into the particulars of the act for creating the Scottish company, and that evening presented a joint address against it, as a scheme that would prejudice all the subjects concerned in the wealth and trade of the English nation. They represented, that, in consequence of the concessions made to the Scotch, the trade of England might be injured, that king’s subjects would become a free port for all East and West India commodities: that the Scots would be enabled to supply all Europe at a cheaper rate than the English could afford to sell their manufactures for: therefore England would lose the benefit of its foreign trade: besides, they observed that the Scots would smuggle their commodities into England, to the great detriment of his majesty and his estates. To this remonstrance the king replied, that he had been ill served in Scotland; but that he hoped some remedies would be found to prevent the inconveniences of which they were apprehensive. In all probability he had been imposed on by the merchants, that dangers for, in a little time, he discarded the Marquis of Tweedale, and dismissed both the Scottish secretaries of state, in lieu of whom he appointed Lord Murray, son to the Marquis of Sunderland. Nevertheless the committee proceeded on the inquiry, and in consequence of their report, confirming a petition from the East India company, the House resolved, that the directors of the Scottish company were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour, in administering the crown with the greatest injury, and that they should be impeached for the same. Meanwhile, Roderick Mackenzie, from whom they had received their chief information, began to retract his evidence, and was ordered not to be retaken; but he could not be retaken, although the king, at their request, issued a proclamation for that purpose. The Scots were extremely incensed against the king, when they understood he had disowned his company, from which they had promised themselves such wealth and advantage. The settlement of Darien was already planned, and afterwards put in execution, though it miscarried. It was a subject of the committee to consider the state of the nation with regard to commerce, and having duly weighed all circumstances, agreed to the following resolutions: that a council of trade should be formed, to consider of the necessity of measures for the more effectual preservation of commerce: that the commissioners should be nominated by parliament, but none of them have seats in the House; that they should take a oath, acknowledging the title of King William as rightful and lawful; and adjuring the pretensions of James, or any other person. The king considered these resolutions as an open attack upon his prerogative, and signified his displeasure to the Earl of Sunderland, who pacified this measure, but it was so popular in the House, that in all probability it would have been put in execution, had not the attention of the Commons been diverted from it at this period by the detection of a new conspiracy. The friends of King James had formed a council of Queen Mary’s secretaries for effecting a restoration of that monarch, on the supposition that the interest of William was considerably weakened by the decease of his consort. Certain individuals, whose zeal for James overrode their discretion, formed a design to seize the person of King William, and convey him to France, or put him to death in case of resistance. They had sent emissaries to the court of St. Germain’s, to demand a commission for this purpose, which was refused. The Earl of Aylesbury, Lord Montgomery, son to the Marquis of Povva, Sir John Fennick, Sir John Frew, Captain Charnock, Captain Porter, and one Mr. Goodman, were the first contrivers of this project. Charnock, with a view to this, was to procure a body of horse and foot from France, to make a descent in England, and they would engage not only to join him at his landing, but even to replace him on the throne of England. These offers being declined by James, on pretence that the French king could not spare such a number of troops at that juncture, the Earl of Aylesbury went over in person, and was admitted to a conference with Louis, in which the scheme of an invasion was entered upon. The Duke of Berwick, the Earl of Aylesbury, Lord Montgomery, the Duke of Berwick repaired privately to England, where he conferred with the conspirators, assured them that King James was ready to make a descent with a considerable fleet of horse, ships, and troops, and gave directions for providing men, arms, and horse, to join him at his arrival. When he returned to France, he found everything prepared for the expedition. The troops were drawn down to the sea-side: a great number of transports were assembled at Dunkirk: Monsieur Garet had advanced as far as Calais with a squadron of ships, which, when joined by that of Du Bart at Dunkirk, was judged a sufficient convoy; and James had come as far as Calais in his way to embark. Meanwhile, the Jacobites in England were assiduously employed in making preparations for a revolt. Sir John Friend had very near completed a regiment of horse. Considerable progress was made in levying troops by Sir William Pimble, Sir John Fennick had enlisted four troops. Colonel Temple had undertaken for one regiment of dragoons: Colonel Parker was preferred to the command of another: Mr. Curzon was commissioned for a third; and the malcontents intended to raise a fourth in Suffolk, where their interest chiefly prevailed.

neymarsh, by one Captain Gill, about the beginning of January, and is said to have undertaken the task of seizing or assassinating King William. He imparted his design to Harrison, alias Johnston, a priest, Charnock, Porter, and Sir William Pimble, who agreed to be pretended to have a particular commission for this service. After various consultations, they resolved to attack the king on his return from Richmond, where he commonly hunted on Saturdays; and the design of their intentions was a large between Brentford and Turnham-Green. As it would be necessary to charge and disperse the guards that attended the coach, they agreed that their number should be increased to forty horsemen, and each man in his proper posture; and, when their complements were full, they determined to execute their purpose on the fifteenth day of February. They concerted the manner in which they should meet in small parties without suspicion, and waited with impatience for the hour of action. In this interval, some of the underling actors, seized with horror at the reflection of what they had undertaken, or capitivated with the prospect of reward, resolved to prevent the execution of the design by a timely discovery. On the eleventh day, Mr. Fisher informed the Earl of Portland of the scheme, and named some of the conspirators; but his account was imperfect. On the thirteenth, however, he returned with a more circumstantial account of their number, and recommended himself to the earl. The earl was accosted by one Pendergrass, an Irish officer, who told his lordship he had just come from Hampshire, at the request of a particular friend, and understood that he had been sent out to town, and beguiling him in a design to assassinate King William. He said he had promised to embark in the undertaking, though he detected it in his own mind, and took this first opportunity of revealing the secret, which was of such consequence to his majesty’s life that owned himself a Roman catholic, but declared, that he did not think any religion could justify such a treacherous purpose. At the same time he observed, that as he lay under obligations to some of the conspirators, it would not be for his interest to accuse them, and that he would upon no consideration appear as an evidence. The king had been so much used to fictitious plots, and false discoveries, that he paid little regard to the information, until they were confirmed by the testimony of another conspirator called La Rue, a Frenchman, who communicated the same particulars to Brigadier Levison, without knowing the least circumstance of the other discoveries. Then the king believed the story, and, and that a commission of Pendergrass, such as Mr. Fisher and La Rue were severely examined in his presence. He thanked Pendergrass in particular for this instance of his probity; but observed, that it must prove ineffectual, unless he would be sent amongst them, and, without knowing who they were, he should not be able to secure his life against their attempts. At length Pendergrass was prevailed upon to give a list of those he knew, yet not before the king had solemnly promised that he should not be used as an evidence against them, except with his own consent. As the king did not go to Richmond on the day appointed, the conspirators postponed the execution of their design till the Saturday following. They accordingly met at different houses on the Friday, when every man received his instructions. There they agreed, that after the perpetration of the parricide, they should ride in a body as far as Hammersmith, and then disperse, either London by different avenues. But, on the morning when they understood that the guards were returned to their quarters, and the king’s coaches sent back to the Mews, they were seized with a sudden alarm, on the suspicion that their plot was discovered. Sir George Barelaw withdrew himself, and every one began to think of providing for his own safety. Next night, however, a great number of them were apprehended, and then the whole discovery was communicated to the privy council. To procuring the most effectual compulsion, great diligence was used to find Sir George Barelaw, who was supposed to have a particular commission from James for assassinating the Prince of Orange; but he made good his retreat, and it was never proved that any such commission had been granted.
§ XXIX. This design and the projected invasion proved equally abortive. James had scarce reached Calais, when the Duke of Wirttemberg despatched his aide-de-camp to Flanders to King William, with an account of the purposed descent. Expresses with the same tidings arrived from Sweden, and further subscribe or corroborate Vaudémont's pretenses. Two considerable squadrons being ready for sea, Admiral Russel embarked at Spithead, and stood over to the French coast with about fifty sail of the line. The English were confounded at his appearance, and hailed in their vessels under the shore, in such shallow water that he could not follow and destroy them: but he absolutely ruined their design, by cooping them up in their harbours. King James, after having tarried some weeks at Calais, returned to Germany. His declarations have finally opened the garrison from which they had been drafted: the people of France exclaimed that the malignant star which ruled the destiny of James, had blasted this and every other project formed for his restoration. By means of the reward offered in the proclamation, the greater part of the conspirators were betrayed or taken. George Harris, who had been sent from France, with orders to obey Sir George Barclay, surrendered himself to Sir William Trumbull, and was executed. The design, however, which had been engaged. Porter and Pendergrass were apprehended together. This last insisted upon the king's promise, that he should not be compelled to give evidence; but the sheriff stoutly maintained that he was no longer bound to be silent, as his friend had made a confession; and they were both admitted as evidence for the crown.

§ XXX. After the examination, the king, in a speech to both Houses, communicated the nature of the conspiracy against his life, as well as the advices he had received touching the invasion: he explained the steps he had taken to defeat the double design, and professed his confidence in the Parliament, as the means of guarding everything that should appear necessary for their common safety. That same evening the two Houses waited upon him at Kensington, in a body, with an affectionate address, by which they expressed their alacrity of the willanous and barbarous design which had been formed against his sacred person, of which they besought him to take more than ordinary care. They assured him they would to the utmost defend his life, and support his government against the late King James, and all other enemies; and declared, that in case his majesty should come to a violent death, they would revenge it upon his adversaries and their adherents. He was extremely well pleased with this warm address, and asked them to take the opportunities of recommending himself to the continuance of their loyalty and affection. The Commons forthwith empowered him, by bill, to secure all persons suspected of conspiring against his person and government. They likewise desired him to call in the supplies. A new bill for making good the deficiency in the supplies, and for the despatch of national affairs. They voted an address, to desire that his majesty would banish by proclamation all adherents of ten miles from the counties of London and Westminster; and give instructions to the judges going on the circuits, to put the laws in execution against Roman Catholics and non-jurors. They drew up an association, binding themselves to assist each other in support of the king and his government, and to revenge any violence that should be committed against his person. This was signed by all the members then present: but, as some had abstained themselves on frivolous pretences, the House ordered, that in sixteen days the absentees should appear and sign. Five did not appear, and the members neglecting to comply with this injunction within the limited time, the speaker was ordered to write to those who were in the country, and demand a peremptory answer; and the clerk of the House attended such as pretended to be all in W. The absentees, including two peers pressed in this manner, thought proper to sail with the stream, and sign the association, which was presented to the king by the Commons in a body, with a request that it might be lodged among the records of the House of Commons, as a perpetual memorial of their loyalty and affection. The king received them with uncommon complacency; declared, that he heartily entered into the same association; that he should always be ready to venture his life with his good subjects, against all who should endeavour to subvert the religion, laws, and liberties of England; and he promised that this, and all other associations, should be lodged among the records of the Tower of London. Next day the Commons approved the scheme which he had hinted at; and the Earl of Newcastle, Sir Edward Seymour, and Mr. Finch, objected to the words rightful and lawful, as applied to his majesty. They said, as the crown and its prerogatives were vested in him, they would yield obedience, though they could not acknowledge him as their rightful and lawful king. Nothing could be more absurd than this distinction, started by men who had actually constituted part of the administration; unless they supposed that the right of King William extended to the Queen Mother, and the Earl of Rochester proposed an expostulation in favour of such tender consciences, by altering the words that gave offence; and this was adopted accordingly. Fifteen of the Peers, and ninety-two Commons, signed the association with reluctance. It was, however, subscribed by all sorts of people in different parts of the kingdom; and the Bishops drew up a form for the clergy, which was signed by a great majority. The Commons brought in a bill, declaring all men incapable of public trust, or of sitting in parliament, who would not engage in this association. At the same time, the council issued an order for renewing all the commissaries in England, and resolved, that those who had not signed it voluntarily should be dismissed from service as disaffected persons.

§ XXXI. After these warm demonstrations of loyalty, the Commons proceeded upon ways and means for raising the necessary revenue. A bill was introduced, by which the sum of two millions five hundred and sixty-four thousand pounds should be raised; and it was called the land bank, because established on land securities. This scheme, said to have been projected by the famous Dr. Chamberlaine, was patronized by the Earl of Sunderland, and managed by Foley and Harley; so that it seemed to be a Tory plan, which Sunderland supported, in order to reconcile himself to the court. The Bank of England petitioned against this bill, and were heard by their counsel; but their representations produced no effect, and the bill having passed through both Houses, received the royal assent. On the twenty-first day of May, the new bank began to issue money, at one shilling and sixpence on the pound; and a commission was appointed to examine all depositions made in the House of Commons.

The most remarkable laws enacted in this session were. An act for voiding all the elections of parliament-men, at which the elected had been an enemy to his country, but it was rejected by a great majority. seventh day of April the king closed the session with a short but gracious speech; and the parliament was prorogued to the sixteenth day of June.

§ XXXI. Before this period some of the conspirators had been brought to trial. The first who suffered was Richard Jewel, who, in the reign of James, had denounced the Protestant religion; the next were lieutenant King and Thomas Keys, who last had been formerly a trumpeter, but lately assigned to Captain Pemberton, to raise in high treason, and executed at Tyburn. They delivered papers to the sheriff, in which they solemnly declared, that they had never seen or heard of any commission from King James for assassinating the Prince of Orange; nor had they ever been concerned in any plot to levy war, but that they had been engaged in it as a personal actor. He endeavoured to invalidate the testimony of Blair, by proving him guilty of the most shocking ingratitude. He observed, that both the evidences were reputed papists. The orate of Hutchinson, who officiated as chaplain in the prisoner’s house, declared upon oath that after the revolution he used to pray for King William, and that he had often heard Sir John Friend say, that though he could not comply with the present government, he would live peaceably under it, and never engage in any conspiracy. Mr. Howland, father of the present Bishop of Winchester, added, that the prisoner was a good protestant, and frequently expressed his detestation of king-killing principles. Friend himself owned he had been with some of the conspirators at a meeting in Leadenhall-street, but heard nothing of raising men, or any design against the government. He likewise affirmed, that a consultation to levy war was not treason; and that his being at a reasonable concert could amount to no more than a misprision of treason. Lord Chief Justice Holt declared, that although a bare conspiracy, or design to levy war, was not treason within the statute of Edward III., yet if the design was to commit actual violence against the person of the king, by the means of levying war, then the consultation and conspiracy to levy war becomes high treason, though no war be actually levied. The same inference must be drawn against the orators and witnesses of the revolution. The judge’s explanation influenced the jury, who, after some deliberation, found the prisoner guilty. Next day Sir William Perkins was brought to the bar, and upon the testimony of Porter, Everlank, his own groom, and Haywood, a notorious informer, was convicted of having been concerned not only in the invasion, but also in the design against the king’s life. The evidence was scanty, and the prisoner, having been bred to the law, made an artful but vigorous defence; but the judge acted as counsel for the crown; and the jury decided by the hints they received from the bench. He and Sir John Friend underwent the sentence of death, and suffered at Tyburn on the third day of April. Friend professed innocence, and denied that he had ever had any notion of dismemberment; but that he had been engaged in the assassination scheme; that he died in the commission of that crime; and that he had no knowledge of the design purposed by King James, and therefore had made no preparations; that he was utterly ignorant of the assassination scheme; that he died in the commission of that crime; and that he had no notion of the cause in the cause for which he suffered. Perkins declared, upon the word of a dying man, that the tenor of the king’s commission, which he saw, was general, directed to all the king’s subjects. The King’s Bench took up the Prince of Orange and his adherents, and to seize all forts, castles, &c. but that he neither saw nor heard of any commission particularly levelled against the person of the Prince of Orange. He owned, however, that he was privy to the design; but believed it was known to few or none but the immediate undertakers. These two criminals were in their last moments attended by Collier, Snatt, and Cook, three nonjurors clergymen, who absolved them in the view of the populace with an imposition of hands; a public infusion of holy water, or holy water poured over them. They were found guilty of high treason, and executed at Tyburn. The condemned were presented by the grand jury, for having countenanced the treason by absolving the traitors, and thereby encouraged other persons to disturb the peace of the kingdom. A vindication was given to the conduct of King James, and he and the others were connected against them, Cook and Snatt were committed to Newgate; but Collier absconded, and published a vindication of their conduct, in which he affirmed, that the imposition of hands was the general practice of the primitive church. The absolution of many of the other priests, observed, the men of the commonwealth. Those three clergymen were presented by the grand jury, for having countenanced the treason by absolving the traitors, and thereby encouraged other persons to disturb the peace of the kingdom. condemnation the court-agents tampered with him to make further discoveries; and after his fate had been protracted by divers short reprieves, he was sent into banishment. From the whole tenour of these discoveries and proceedings, it appears that James had actually meditated an invasion: that his partisans in England had made preparations for joining him on his arrival; that a few despatches of that faction had concerted a scheme against the life of King William; that in prosecuting the conspirators, the court had countenanced informers; that the judges had strained the law, wrested circumstances, and even deviated from the function of their office, to convict the prisoners: in a word, that the administration had employed all the private means that could be used for those unhappy people, which they themselves had in the late reigns numbered among the grievances of the kingdom.

§ XXXIII. The warthen, however, manifested on this occasion may have been owing to national resentment of the purpose invasion. Certain it is, the two Houses of parliament, and the people in general, were animated with extraordinary indignation against France at this juncture. The Lords besought his majesty, in a solemn address, to appoint a day of thanksgiving of Almighty God, for having defeated the barbarous purpose of his enemies; and this was observed with uncommon zeal and devotion. Admiral William and the commander-in-chief of the French coast, returned to the Downs; but Sir Cloudesley Shovel, being properly prepared for the expedition, subjected Calais to another bombardment, by which the town was taken, with a loss near 3000 porters, who were overwhelmed with consternation. The generals of the allied army in Flanders resolved to make some immediate retaliation upon the French for their unmanned design upon the life of King William, as they took for granted that Louis was accessory to the scheme of assassination. That monarch, on the supposition that a powerful diversion would be made by the descent on England, had established a vast magazine at Givet, designing, when the allies should be sufficiently furnished with military provisions, to strike some stroke of importance early in the campaign. On this the confederates now determined to wreak their vengeance. In the beginning of March the Earl of Athlone and Mouwen de Coehorn, with the concurrence of the duke of Holstein-Ploen, who commanded the allies, sent a strong detachment of horse, drafted from Brussels and the neigh ing garnisons, to amuse the enemy on the side of Charlevoix; while they assembled forty squadrons of horse, and also sixteen pieces of cannon, to the number of 130 mortars, in the territory of Namur. Athlone with part of this body invested Dinant, while Coehorn, with the remainder, advanced to Givet. He forthwith began to batter the town on the seventh day of April, which was taken on fire, and by four in the afternoon wholly destroyed, with the magazine it contained. Then the two generals joining their forces, returned to Namur without interruption. Hitherto the republic of Venice had deferred acknowledging King William; but now they sent an extraordinary embassy for that purpose, consisting of Signors Soranzo and Venier, who arrived in London, and on the first day of May had a public audience. The king, on this occasion, knighted Soranzo as the senior ambassador, and presented him with the sword according to custom. On that day, too, William declared in council, that he had appointed the same regency which had governed the kingdom during his last absence; and embarking on the seventh at Margate, arrived at Orange-Polder in the evening, under convoy of Vice-Admiral Aymer. This officer had been ordered to attend with a squadron, as the famous Du Bart still continued at Dunkirk, and some attempt of that instance was apprehended from his enterprise gens.

§ XXXIV. The French had taken the field before the allied army could be assembled: but no transitus of consequences distinguished this campaign, either upon the Rhine or in Flanders. The scheme of Louis was still offensive on the side of the Netherlands, while the active plans of King William were defeated for want of money. All the funds for this year proved defective; the land bank failed, and the national bank sustained a rude shock in its credit. The loss of the nation upon the recent damage amounted to two millions of pounds; and though the different mints were employed without intermission, they could not for some months supply the circulation, especially as great part of the new money was kept by persons who received the profit and disposed of it at an unreasonable advantage. The French king, having exhausted the wealth and patience of his subjects, and greatly diminished their number in the course of this war, began to be dissident of his arms, and employed all the private means that could be used for those unhappy people, which they themselves had in the late reigns numbered among the grievances of the kingdom.

through a wood. A very desperate action ensued, in which the Generals Heuser and, Poland, with many other gallant officers, lost their lives. At length the Ottoman horse were driven from the assault, and the Germans, though roughly handled on the second day after the engagement, retreated at midnight, and the Turks remained quiet in their entrenchments.

§ XXXV. In Pidemont the face of affairs underwent a strange alteration. The Duke of Savoy, who had for some time been engaged in a secret negotiation with France, at length embraced the offers of that crown, and privately signed a separate treaty of peace at Loretto, to which prince the emperor was persuaded the French king engaged to present him with four million of livres, by way of reparation for the damage he had sustained; to assist him with a certain number of auxiliaries against all his enemies; and to effect a marriage between the Duke of Burgundy and the Princess of Pidemont, as soon as the parties should be marriagable. The treaty was guaranteed by the Pope and the Venetians, who were extremely desirous of seeing the Germans driven out of Italy. King William being apprized of this negociation, communicated the intelligence to the Earl of Galway, his ambassador at Turin, who expostulated with the duke upon this defecion; but he persisted in denying any such correspondence, which was the advance of a little army emboldened him to avow it, without fearing the resentment of the allies whom he had abandoned. Catani marched into the plains of Turin, at the head of fifty thousand men, and an armed meeting prior to that of Augsburg; and the duke imported to the ministers of the allies the proposals which France had made; represented the superior strength of his army; the danger to which he was exposed; and finally his inclination to embrace her offers. On the twelfth of July a truce was concluded for a month, and afterwards prolonged till the fifteenth of September. He wrote to all the powers engaged in the confederacy, except King William, expatiating on the same topics, and solicit- ing the English to concur in his measures. Though with this concurrence, he on the twenty-third day of August signed the treaty in public, which he had before concluded in private. The emperor was no sooner informed of his design, than he took every step which he thought could divert him from his purpose. He sent the Count Mansfelt to Turin, with proposals for a match between the King of the Romans and the Princess of Savoy, as well as with offers to augment his forces and his subsidy; but the duke had already settled his terms with France, and could not recede. Prince Eugene, though his kinsman, expressed great indignation at his conduct. The young Prince de Commercy was so provoked at this defection, that he chose to make it a subject of complaint to his chief; but the quarrel was compromised by the intervention of friends, and they parted in an amicable manner. He had conceived the treaty until he should receive the remaining part of the subsidies due to him from the confederates. A considerable sum had been remitted from England to Genoa for his use; but Lord Galway no sooner received intimation of his new engagement, than he put a stop to the payment of this money, which he employed in the Milaneese, for the subsistence of those troops that were in the British service. King William was encamped at Gleemours when the duke's envoy notified the separate peace which his master had concluded with the French king, of which France was immediately cognizant; on receiving the information, he assembled his army, and, attended by the minister without the least emotion. One of the conditions of this treaty was, that within a limited time the allies should evacuate the duke's dominions; otherwise they should be expelled by the joint forces of France and Savoy. A neutrality was offered to the confederates; and this being rejected, the contracting powers resolved to attack the Milanese. Accordingly, when the truce expired, the French and Savoyard forces, under the command of those duchies, and undertook the siege of Valetta: so that, in one campaign, he commanded two contending armies. The garrison of Valetta, consisting of seven thousand men, and fifteen thousand men; cavalry, and French corsairs; and the Duke of Savoy prosecuted the siege with uncommon impetuosity. But, after the truces had been opened for thirteen days, a courier arrived from Madrid, with an account of his catholic majesty's having agreed to the neutrality for Italy. The King of England had his attention engaged in the affairs of Poland, who died at the age of seventy, in the course of this summer, after having survived his faculties and reputation. As the crown was elective, a competition arose for the succession. The kingdom was divided by factions; and the Dutch, being now set sail towards Ushant in order to insult the coast of France. He pillaged and burned the villages on the islands Grosnez, Ileau, and Heydie; made prize of about twenty vessels; bombarded St. Martin's on the isle of Re, and the town of Olonne, besieging it by land, and bombarding it by sea; and the French, in five different places with the Dutch, landed on shells and carcasses. Though these appear to have been enterprises of small import, they certainly kept the whole coast of France in perpetual alarm. The ministry of that year, in order to diminish the number of the English, ordered the Breton and Guetuel they ordered above one hundred battalions to be erected, and above sixty thousand men were continually in arms for the defence of the maritime places. To the month of May, Rear-Admiral Benbow sailed with a small squadron, in order to block up the port of Dunkirk, but that famous adventurer found means to escape in a fog, and steering to the eastward, attacked the Dutch fleet in the Bahle, under a convoy of five frigates. He pursued them in the tracks of the enemy, and the number of the trading ships; but, falling in with the outward-bound fleet, convoyed by thirteen ships of the line, he was obliged to burn four of the frigates, turn the fifth afloat, and part with all his prizes, except fifteen, which he carried into Dunkirk.

§ XXXVII. The parliament of Scotland met on the eighth day of September: and Lord Murray, secretary of state, now Earl of Tollibardine, presented king's commissioners, to which he was appointed, to reintroduce the war, and two successive bad harvests, which had driven a great number of the inhabitants into Ireland, there was no opposition to the court measures. The members of parliament adjourned his majesty's confederacy, and granted a supply of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds for maintaining their forces by sea and land. They passed an act for securing their religion, lives, and property, in case his majesty should come to an untimely death. By another, they obliged all persons in public trust to sign the association; and then the parliament was adjourned to the eighth day of December. The disturbances of Ireland seemed now to be entirely appeased. Lord Capel dying in May, the council, by virtue of an act passed in the reign of Henry VIII. elected the chancellor, Sir Charles Porter, to be lord justice and chief governor of that kingdom, until his majesty's pleasure should be known. The parliament met in June, and the court of admiralty, and the guilds, were summoned by the king. The corporation of London were adjourned to the fourth day of August. By that time Sir Charles Porter, and the Earl of Month and Droughead, were appointed lords justices, and signed the king's pleasure that they should be the members of the beginning of December the chancellor died of an apoplexy.

§ XXXVIII. King William being tired of an inactive campaign, left the army under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, and about the latter end of August repaired to his palace at Loé, where he enjoyed his favourite exercise of stag-hunting. He visited the court of Brandenburg at Berne, and the court of Denmark; and then returned safe and sound to the Hague; and embarking for England, landed at Margate on the sixth day of October. The domestic economy of the nation was extremely perplexed at this juncture, from the sinking of public credit, and the stagnation that necessarily attended a reconnoissance. These grievances were, with difficulty, induced by a tax on coin and the entire suspension of the coin of the realm. It was a symptom that the prime minister, the shrewd statesman, chancellor of the exchequer, acting upon the national sense of adventure, which the moment interest had produced. The king opened the session of parliament on the twentieth day of October, was a speech importing that the time had been made for a negotiation, but that the best way of treating with France would be sword in hand. He, therefore, desired that they would be expeditious in raising the money and in completing the house of commons for making good the funds already granted. He declared that the civil list could not be supported without assistance. He recommended the miserable condition of the French Protestants to their compassion. He desired they would continue the best expedients for the recovery of the national credit. He observed, that unanimity and despatch were now more than ever necessary for the honour, safety, and advantage of England. The Commons having taken this speech into consideration, resolved that they would support his majesty and his government, and assist him in the prosecution of the war; that the standard of gold and silver should not be altered; and that there should be no counterfeiting of old or new coins. Then they presented an address, in a very spirited strain, declaring, that notwithstanding the blood and treasure of which the nation had been drained, the Commons of England would not be diverted from their firm resolutions of paying the war charges by a variety of representations and threats. They, therefore, renewed their assurances, that they would support his majesty against all his enemies at home and abroad. The House of Lords delivered another to the same purpose, declaring, that they would never be wanting or backward, on their parts, in what might be necessary to his majesty's honour, the good of his kingdoms, and the quiet of Christendom. The Commons, in the first transports of their zeal, ordered the petitions palliatives to be brought by the hands of the common hangmen. They deliberated upon the estimates, and granted above six millions for the service of the ensuing year. They resolved that a supply should be granted for making good the deficiency of parliamentary funds; and appropriated several duties for this purpose.

§ XXXIX. With respect to the coin, they brought in a bill, repealing an act for taking off the obligation and extending the operation of guineas for a certain time, and improving and coining guineas and half guineas, at the extravagant price of those coins, which occasioned this act, was now fallen. They passed a second bill for remediying the ill state of the coin; and a third, explaining an act in the last session for laying an additional duty on wine and spirits of the first extraction. In order to raise the supplies of the year, they resolved to tax all persons according to the true value of their real and personal estates, their stock upon land and in trade, their income offices, pensions, and professions. A duty of one penny per week, for one year, was laid upon all persons not receiving alms. A further imposition of one farthing in the pound per week was fixed upon all servants receiving four pounds per annum, at wages, and upwards to eight pounds a-year inclusive. Those who received from eight to sixteen pounds were taxed at one halfpenny per pound. An aid of three shillings in the pound for one year was laid upon all lands, tenements, and appurtenances to this act. The treasury was enabled to borrow a million and a half at eight per cent. and to circulate exchequer bills to the amount of as much more. To cancel these debts, the surplus of all the supplies, except the three guineas, was appropriated. The Commons voted one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds for making good the deficiency in recompensing the hammered money, and the recompense for bringing in plate to the mint. This sum was not to be paid out of the current revenue, but was to be taken from the bank, board, vellum, and parchment, made or imported. Taking into consideration the services, and the present languishing state of the bank, whose notes were at twenty per cent. discount, they resolved, that it should be enlarged by new subscriptions, made by four-fifths in talles struck on parliamentary funds, and one-fifth in bank-bills or notes: that effectual provision should be made by parliament for paying the principal of all such talles, as should be subscribed in the bank, as well as the interest; and that there should be allowed to all such subscribers: that an interest of eight per cent. should be allowed on all such talles: and, that the continuance of the bank should be prolonged to the first day of August, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ten. That all assignment of orders on talles subscribed into the bank, should be registered in the exchequer: that, before the day should be fixed for the beginning of the new subscriptions, the old should be made one hundred per cent. and what might exceed that value should be divided among the old members: that all the interest due on those talles which might be subscribed in the bank-stock, at that time appointed for subscriptions, to the end of the last preceding half-year, should be allowed from all such subscriptions: and that liberty should be given by parliament to enlarge the number of bank-bills, to the value of the sum that should be so subscribed, over and above the twelve hundred thousand pounds required for the subscriptions: that all bills should be obliged to answer such bills and demands; and, in default thereof, be answered by the exchequer out of the first money due to them: that no other bank should be erected or allowed by act of parliament, during the continuance of the bank of England: that no act should be exempted from all tax or imposition: that no act of the corporation should forfeit the particular interest of any person concerned therein; that provision should be made to prevent the officers of the exchequer, and all other officers or receivers of the money being diverted, delaying, or obstructing the course of payments to the bank; that care should be taken to prevent the altering, counterfeiting, or forgery any bank-bills or notes: that the estate and interest of each other in the stock of the corporation should be made a personal estate: that no contract made for any bank-stock to be bought or sold should be valid in law or equity, unless actually registered in the bank-books within seven days, and actually transferred by the party to whom the stock was made. A bill upon these resolutions was brought in, under the direction of the chancellor of the exchequer: it related to the continuation of tonnage and poundage upon wine, vinegar, and tobacco; and comprehended a clause for laying an additional duty on wine, spirituous and other liquors, at three quarters. All the several branches constituted a general fund, since known by the name of the General Mortgage, without prejudice to their former appropriations. The bill also provided, that the talles should bear eight per cent. interest: that from the tenth of June for five years they should bear no more than six per cent. interest: and, that no premium or discount upon them should be taken. In case of the general funds proving insufficient to pay the whole interest, it was provided, that every proprietor should receive his proportion of the product, and the deficiency be made good from the next aid: but should the fund produce more than the interest, the surplus was estimated to operate to the multiplying fund, and to the principal. In order to make up a deficiency of above eight hundred thousand pounds, occasioned by the failure of the land bank, additional duties were laid upon leather: the tax was enlarged for persons to come in and annually upon the annuities payable by several former acts, and to obtain more certain interest in such annuities.

§ XI. Never were more vigorous measures taken to support the credit of the government; and never by the government served such a set of enterprising undertakers. The Commons having received a message from the king, touching the condition of the civil list, resolved, that a sum not exceeding five hundred and fifteen thousand pounds shall be granted for the support of the civil list for the ensuing year, to be raised by a mail-tax, and additional duties upon mim, sweets, eyder, and penny. They likewise resolved, that an additional aid of one shilling in the pound should be had upon land, as an equivalent for the duty of ten per cent., for raising one million four hundred thousand pounds by a lottery. The treasury was empowered to issue an additional number of exchequer bills, to the amount of twelve hundred thousand pounds, every lbour day. Bills bearing interest at the rate of five-ounce a day, and ten per cent. for circulation: finally, in order to liquidate the transport debt, which the funds established for that purpose had not been sufficient to defray, a money-bill was passed to oblige pedlars to take out licences, and pay for them at certain stated prices. One cannot without astonishment reflect upon the prodigious efforts that were made upon this occasion, or consider without indignation the enormous sums that were raised up by usurers and extortioners from the distresses of their country. The nation did not seem to know its own strength, until it was put to this extraordinary trial: and the experiment of mortgages funds succeeded so well, that later ministers have proceeded in the same system, imposing burthen upon burthen, as if they thought the sneezes of the nation could never be overstrained.

X.1. The public credit being thus bolstered up by the supply of bills, Mr. Montagu, in his speech, told the supplies of the ensuing year, the attention of the Commons was transferred to the case of Sir John Fenwick, who had been apprehended in the month of June at New Romney, by his mendicant, to Elybridge, when taken, written a letter to his lady by one Webber, who accompanied him; but this being seized, the letter was found, containing such a confession as plainly excused him guilty. He then entered into a treaty with the court for turning evidence, and delivered a long information in writing, which was sent abroad to his majesty. He made no discoveries that could injure any of the Jacobites, who, by his account, and other concurring testimonies, appeared to have been counsel of the malicious comploters and uncomploivers. The first, headed by the Earl of Middleton, insisted upon receiving security from King James, that the religion and liberties of England should be preserved: the second, of the other party, at the head of which was the Earl of Melfort, resolved to bring him in without conditions, relying upon his own honour and generosity. King William having sent over an order for bringing Fenwick to trial, unless he should make more material discoveries, the prisoner, with a view to amuse the ministry, until he could take other measures for his own safety, accused the Earls of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, and Bath, the Lord Godolphin, and Admiral Russell, of having corresponded with King James, and engaging to act for his interest. Meanwhile his lady and relations tampered with the two witnesses, Porter and Goodman. The first of these discovered those practices to the government; and one Clancys, who acted as agent for Sir F. Fenwick, was tried, convicted of subornation, fined, and set in the pillory; but they had succeeded better in their attempts upon Goodman, who disappeared; so that one witness only remained, and Fenwick began to think his life was out of danger. Admiral Russell acquainted the House of Commons, that he and several persons of quality had been reflected upon in some informations of Sir John Fenwick; he therefore desired, that he might have an opportunity to justify his own character. Mr. Secretary Trumbull had published the papers, which having been read, the Commons ordered, that Sir John Fenwick should be brought to the bar of the House. There he was exhorbit by the speaker to make an ample discovery; which, however, he declined, except with the provision that he should first receive some security that what he might say should not prejudice himself. He was ordered to withdraw, until they should deliberate on his request. Then he was called in again, and the speaker told him that he might desire the favour of the House, by making a full discovery. He desired he might be indulged with a little time to recollect himself, and promised to obey the command of the House. The House consented, he was allowed to go to his own security; which they refusing to grant, he chose to be silent, and was dismissed from the bar. voted, that his informations, reflecting upon the fidelity of several noblemen, members of the House, and others, upon borsaw, were false and scandalous, contrary to the understanding of the House, which was the king and his subjects, in order to stifle the conspiracy.

XII. A motion being made for leave to bring in a bill to attain him of high treason, a warm debate ensued, and the question being put, was carried in the affirmative by a large majority, and presented with the bill. The bill, and allowed the use of pen, ink, paper, and counsel. When he presented a petition, praying that his counsel might be heard against passing the bill, they made an order, that his counsel should be heard, and that the bill be read in the bar of the House: so that he was surprised into an irregular trial, instead of being indulged with an opportunity of offering objections to their passing the bill of attainder. He was accordingly brought to the bar of the House; and the bill being read in his hearing, the speaker called upon the king's counsel to open the evidence. The prisoner's counsel objected to their proceeding to trial, alleging, that their client had not received the least notice of their purpose, and therefore could not be prepared for his defence; but that they came to offer their reasons against the bill. The House, after a long debate, resolved, that he should be allowed further time to produce witnesses in his own behalf; and if they should also be likewise allowed to produce evidence to prove the terrors of which he stood indicted; and an order was made for his being brought to the bar again in three days. In the mean time, his counsel, who were examined, which had been found against him by the grand jury was produced; and Porter was examined as an evidence. Then the record of Clancys's conviction was read; and one Rix testified, that Dighton, the prisoner's solicitor, had offered him an annuity of one hundred pounds, to discredit the testimony of Goodman. The king's counsel moved, that Goodman's examination, as taken by Mr. Vernon, clerk of the council, might be read. Sir J. Pows, and Sir Edward Seymour, who were taken in Sir Bartholomew Shower's house, and the names of the comploivers and uncomploivers. The first, headed by the Earl of Middleton, insisted upon receiving security from King James, that the religion and liberties of England should be preserved: the second, of the other party, at the head of which was the Earl of Melfort, resolved to bring him in without conditions, relying upon his own honour and generosity. King William having sent over an order for bringing Fenwick to trial, unless he should make more material discoveries, the prisoner, with a view to amuse the ministry, until he could take other measures for his own safety, accused the Earls of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, and Bath, the Lord Godolphin, and Admiral Russell, of having corresponded with King James, and engaging to act for his interest. Meanwhile his lady and relations tampered with the two witnesses, Porter and Goodman. The first of these discovered those practices to the government; and one Clancys, who acted as agent for Sir F. Fenwick, was tried, convicted of subornation, fined, and set in the pillory: but they had succeeded better in their attempts upon Goodman, who disappeared; so that one witness only remained, and Fenwick began to think his life was out of danger. Admiral Russell acquainted the House of Commons, that he and several persons of quality had been reflected upon in some informations of Sir John Fenwick; he therefore desired, that he might have an opportunity to justify his own character. Mr. Secretary Trumbull had published the papers, which having been read, the Commons ordered, that Sir John Fenwick should be brought to the bar of the House. There he was exhorbit by the speaker to make an ample discovery; which, however, he declined, except with the provision that he should first receive some security that what he might say should not prejudice himself. He was ordered to withdraw, until they should deliberate on his request. Then he was called in again, and the speaker told him that he might desire the favour of the House, by making a full discovery. He desired he might be indulged with a little time to recollect himself, and promised to obey the command of the House. The House consented, he was allowed to go to his own security; which they refusing to grant, he chose to be silent, and was dismissed from the bar. voted, that his informations, reflecting upon the fidelity of several noblemen, members of the House, and others, upon borsaw, were false and scandalous, contrary to the understanding of the House, which was the king and his subjects, in order to stifle the conspiracy. whether or not the information of Goodman should be read? and was carried in the affirmative by a majority of seventy-three voices. Then two of the grand jury who had been present at the trial, Mr. Russell, Cockley, and others, had who had suffered death in the reign of Charles II. This author (said he) takes notice, that a conspiracy or agreement to levy war is not treason without actually levying war; a sentiment on which he concurred with Lord Coke, and chief justice St. John. Fenwick, who was not raised to the bar, in legal opinion, was a lawyer. He asserted, that the House of Commons has a right to be represented both by the upper and lower houses, for the protection they are constituted. Let us, therefore, reflect upon the possibility of a parliament debarred by the arts of corruption into servile compliance with the designs of tyrants, and the fruits of such compliance would be so formidable for the consequences. The debate being finished, the prisoner was, at the desire of Admiral Russell, questioned with regard to the imputations he had fixed upon that great gentleman and others, from bastardy: but he desired to be excused on account of the risk he ran while under a double prosecution, if any thing which should escape him might be turned to his prejudice.

§ XLIV. After he was removed from the bar, Mr. Vernon, at the desire of the House, recapitulated the arts and practices of Sir John Fenwick and his friends, to procrastinate the trial. The bill was read a second time; and the speaker at the bar enquired, if the question should be put for its being committed to a grand jury, which would be immediately followed by a new flame of contention. Hawles, the solicitor-general, affirmed, that the House in the present case should act both as judge and jury. Mr. Harescourt said, he knew no trial for treason but what was confirmed by Magna Charta, by a jury, the birthright and darling privilege of an Englishman, or per legem terrae, which includes impeachments in parliament; it was a strange trial where the person was accused of the offence, but he never heard of a juryman who was not on his oath, nor of a judge who had not power to examine witnesses upon oath; and was not empowered to save the innocent as well as to convict the guilty. Sir John Fenwick was of opinion, that the parliament ought not to stand upon little niceties and forms of other courts, when the government was at stake. Mr. Howe asserted, that to de a thing of this nature, because the parliament had power to do it, was a strange way of reasoning: that what was justice and equity at Westminster-hall, was justice and equity that one had precedent in parliament, was of worse consequence than a hundred in Westminster-hall, because personal or private injuries did not foreclose the claim of original right; whereas the parliament could ruin the nation beyond redemption, because it could establish twenty laws. Sir Richard Temple, in arguing against the bill, observed, that the power of parliament is to make any law, but the jurisdiction of parliament is to govern itself by the law: to make a law, therefore, against all the laws of England, was a "peninnunm," never to be used but in case of absolute necessity. He affirmed, that by this precedent the House overthrew all the laws of England; first, in condemning a man upon one witness; secondly, in passing an act without any trial. The Commons never did nor can assume a jurisdiction of trying any person: they may, for their own information, hear what can be offered; but it is no trial where witnesses are not upon oath. All bills of attainder have passed against persons that were dead or dead, or without the compass of the law: some have been brought in after trials in Westminster-hall; but none of those have been called trials, and they were generally reversed. He denounced the advantages that the House declare any treason which was not treason before. When inferior courts were dubious, the case might be brought before the parliament, to judge whether it was treason or felony; but there was no way found by the laws, nor any judgment was not in the parliament by bill, but only in the House of Lords. Lord Digby, Mr. Harley, and Colonel Granville, spoke to the same purpose. But their arguments and remonstrances had no effect upon the majority, by whom the prisoner was devoted to destruction. The bill was committed, passed, and sent up to the House of Lords, where it produced the longest and warmest debates which had been known since the restoration. Bishop Burnet, in his "History," speaks of the House of Commons, by a long speech in favour of the bill, contradicting some of the fundamental maxims which he had formerly avowed in behalf of the liberties of the people. At length it was carried by a majority of seven voices; and one-and forty lords, including eight prelates, entered a protest, couched in the strongest terms, against the decision.

§ XVI. When the bill received the royal assent, another act of the like nature passed against Barclay, Holmes, and some other incorporators who had left from the nation, in case they should not surrender themselves upon or before the twenty-fifth day of March next ensuing. Sir John Fenwick solicited the mediation of the Lords in his behalf, which the lords, by a recommendation of the Earl of Granville, gave him to understand, that the success of his suit would depend upon the fulness of his discoveries. He would have previously stipulated for a pardon; and they insisted upon his depending on their favour. He stated some time between the fears of infamy and the terrors of death, which last be at length chose to undergo, rather than incur the disgraceful character of an informer. He was complimented with the axe, in consideration of his rank and alliance with the house of Howard, and suffered on Tower-hill with great composure. In the paper which he delivered to the sheriff, he took God to witness, that he knew not of the intended treason, until it was the common subject of discussion in every private place, and that he was not for the service of King James. He thanked those noble and worthy persons who had opposed his attainder in parliament; protested before God, that the information he gave to the sheriffs, he had received in letters and messages from France; and observed that he might have expected mercy from the Prince of Orange, as he had been instrumental in saving his life, by preventing the execution of a design which had been for his execution; a circumstance settled with the probability induced in the late conversation of the Lords to conceal their purpose of assassination from his knowledge. He professed his loyalty to King James, and prayed Heaven for his speedy restoration.

A. D. 1697. While Fenwick's affair was in agitation, the Earl of Monmouth had set foot some practices against the Duke of Shrewsbury. hitherto promoted his councils behind the curtain. That politician was now sworn of the privy-council, and gratified with the office of lord-chamberlain, which had been resigned by the Earl of Leicester, in the time of his imperious and unrelenting silence; severe and poignant in his writings and remarks upon mankind in general, but humane, good-natured, and generous to excess, in his commerce with individuals.

III. Thus having made some promotions, and appointed a regency, embarked on the twenty-sixth day of April for Holland, that he might be at hand to manage the negociation for a general peace. By this time the treaty of May, and the French, Dutch, and the Swedish minister, and Mr. Dykvelt, in behalf of the States-general, who resolved, in consequence of the concessions made by France, that, in concert with their allies, the mediation of Sweden might be accepted. The emperor and the court of Spain, however, were not satisfied with those concessions: yet his imperial Majesty declared he would embrace the proffered mediation, provided the treaty of Westphalia should be re-established; and provided the King of Sweden would engage to join his troops with those of the allies, in case France should break through this stipulation. This proposal being delivered, the ministers of England and Holland at Vienna presented a joint memorial, pressing his imperial majesty to ratify the second article of the place at which the congress might be opened. The emperor complied with reluctance. On the fourteenth day of February, all the ministers of the allies, except the ambassador of Spain, agreed to the proposal; and on the twenty-first Lottinburgh sent the Swedish plenipotentiary. Spain demanded, as a preliminary, that France should agree to restore all the places mentioned in a long list which the minister of that crown presented to the assembly. The emperor proposed, that the congress should be held at Aix-la-Chapelle, or Frankfort, or some other town in Germany. The other allies were more disposed to negotiate in Holland. At length the French king suggested, that the minister which would more belong to King William, called Newbourg-house, situated between the Hague and Delft, close to the village of Ryswick; and to this proposition the ministers agreed. Those of England were the Earl of Pembroke, a virtuous, learned, and popular nobleman, the Lord Villiers, and Sir Joseph Williamson: France sent Harley and Crevy to the assistance of Calilieres. Louis was not only tired of the war, on account of the misery which it had involved his kingdom; but in siring a peace, he was actsued by another motive. The King of Spain had been for some time in a very ill state of health, and the French monarch had an eye to the succession. This aim could not be accomplished while the enemy was alive; and it was of traction from the kingdom, that he might at once turn his whole power against Spain, as soon as Charles should expire. The emperor harboured the same design upon the Spanish crown, and for that reason interested himself in the continuance of the grand alliance. Besides, he foresaw he should in a little time be able to act against France with an augmented force. The Czar of Muscovy had engaged to find employment for the Turks and Tartars. He intended to raise the Elector of Saxony to the throne of Poland; and he had made some progress in a negociation with the circles of the Rhine, for a considerable body of auxiliary troops. The Dutch had no other view but that of securing a barrier in the Netherlands. King William insisted upon the French king's acknowledging his title; and the English nation wished for nothing so much as the end of a ruinous war. On the tenth day of February, Calilieres, in the name of his master, agreed to the following preliminaries: That the treaties of Westphalia and Nimuegen should be the basis of this negociation; that Strasburg should be restored to the empire, and Luxembourg to the Spaniards, together with all their dominions and revenues by the French in the county of Luxembourg; that Dinant should be ceded to the Bishop of Liège, and all union since the treaty of Nimuegen be made void; that the French king should make restitution of Lorraine, and, upon conclusion of the peace, acknowledge the Prince of Orange as King of Great Britain, without condition or restraint. The confederates of eleemosynary work were severe and poignant in his writings and remarks upon mankind in general, but humane, good-natured, and generous to excess, in his commerce with individuals.

§ XLIX. Meanwhile, the French king, in the hope of procuring more favourable terms, resolved to make his last effort against the Spaniards in Catalonia and in the Netherlands, and to elevate the Prince of Conti to the throne of Poland; an event which would have greatly improved the interest of France in Europe. Louis had got the start of the confederates in Flanders, and sent thither a very numerous army, commanded by Catinat, Villeroi, and Bourdies. The campaign was opened with the siege of Aeth, which was so sooner invested, than King William, had resolved of having the site of the fiercest and perhaps the most notable of all the French monarchs, who commanded a separate body. He did not think proper to interrupt the enemy in their operations before Aeth, which surrendered in a few days after the trenches were opened; but continued with his army to Flanders, with the intention of making an advantageous camp, where he covered Brussels, which Villeroi and Bourdies had determined to besiege. In Catalonia, the Duke of Vendome invested Barcelona, in which some thousands of Frenchmen, besides five thousand burgheurs, who had voluntarily taken arms on this occasion. The governor of the place was the Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, who had served in Ireland, and been vested with the command of the imperial troops which were sent into Spain. The French general being reinforced from Provence and Languedoc, carried on his approaches with surprising impetuosity; and was repulsed in several attacks by the valour of the defenders. At length the enemy surprised and routed the Viceroy of Catalonia; and, flushed with this victory, stormed the outworks, which had been long battered with their cannon. The dispute was very bloody and obstinate; but the French, by dint of numbers, made themselves masters of the covered-way and two bastions. There they erected batteries of cannon and mortars, and fired furiously on the town, which, however, the Prince of Hesse resolved to defend to the last extremity. The court of Madrid, however, was unwilling to risk any troops in that place, and the probability it would be restored at the peace, despatched an order to the prince to capitulate; and he obtained very honourable terms, after having made a glorious defence for nine weeks; in consideration of which he was appointed viceroy of the province. France was no sooner in possession of this important place, than the Spaniards became as eager for peace as they had been before averse to a negociation.

§ L. Their imprudence was not a little inflamed by the success of Pointis in America, where he took Carthagena, in which he found a booty amounting to eight millions of crowns. Having ruined the fortifications of the place, and received advice that an English squadron under Admiral Neville had arrived in the West Indies, with a design to attack him in his return, he bore away for the Straits of Bahama. On the twenty-second day of May he fell in with the English fleet, and one of his fly-boats was taken. The supper proceeded. Then Neville steered to Carthagena, that he found quite abandoned by the inhabitants, who, after the departure of Pointis, had been roused a second time by the conspiracy, was released upon bail; but this privilege was denied to Lord Montgomery, who had been imprisoned in Newgate on the same account.

paper, in which the principal articles of the peace between France and England, signed at Aix-la-Chapelle, William quitted the camp, and retired to his house at Loo, confident of having taken such measures for a pacification as could not be disappointed. The subject of this field negotiation is said to have turned upon the interest of King James, which the French monarch most wished to abandon: others, however, suppose that the first foundation of the partition treaty was laid in this conference. But, in all probability, William's sole aim was to put an end to the English in the camp, which had rendered him very unpopular in his own dominions, and to obtain from the court of France an acknowledgment of his title, which had since the queen's death become the subject of dispute. He perceived the emperor's backwardness towards a pacification, and foresaw numberless difficulties in discussing such a complication of interests by the common method of treating: he, therefore, chose such a step as he thought would alarm the jealousy of the allies, and quicken the negotiation at Ryswick. Before the congress was opened, King James had published two manifestos, addressed to the catholic and protestant princes of the confederacy, representing his wrongs, and craving redress; but before the emperor could arrive, the letters he afterwards issued a third declaration, solemnly protesting against all that might or should be negotiated, regulated, or stipulated with the usurper of his realm, as being void of all rightful and lawful authority. On the twentieth of June, declared, that to lay aside the project of a perpetual peace, declaring at the same time, that this should not be accepted before the last day of August, France would not hold herself bound for the conditions she now offered; but Caunin, the emperor's plenipotentiary, protested he would pay no regard to this limitation. On the thirtieth of August, however, he delivered to the mediators an ultimatum, importing, That he adhered to the terms of Westphalia, and Strasburg, and accepted of Strasbourg with its appurtenances: That he insisted upon the restitution of Lorraine to the prince of that name; and demanded, That the church and chapter of Liège should be re-established in the possession of their incontestable rights. Next day the French plenipotentiaries declared, That the month of August being now expired, all their offers were vacated: That, therefore, the King of France would reserve Strasburg, and unite it, with its dependencies, to his crown for ever: That in other respects he would adhere to the project, and restore Barcelona to the crown of Spain; but that these terms must be accepted in twenty days, otherwise he should think himself at liberty to revise. The ministers of the electors and princes of the empire, represented the inconveniences and dangers that would accrue to the German body from France's being in possession of Luxemburg, and that no one could be a judge to decide such a case: They offered of an equivalent for that province. They likewise presented another to the States-general, requiring them to continue the war, according to their engagements, until France should have complied with the preliminaries. No regard, however, was paid to either of these addresses. Then the imperial ambassadors demanded the good offices of the mediator, on certain articles: but all that he could obtain of France was, that the term for adjusting the peace between him and the emperor should be prolonged till the first day of November, and in the mean time an armistice be punctually observed. Yet even these concessions were made, on condition that the treaty with England, Spain, and Holland should be signed on that day, even though the emperor and empire should not concur.

§ LIV. Accordingly, on the twentieth day of September, the articles were subscribed by the Dutch, English, Spanish, and French ambassadors, and the imperial ministers protested against the transaction, observing the second condition that a separate peace had been concluded with France, and that the states of the empire, who had been imposed upon through their own credulity, would not for the future engage to act in the character of mediators in certain preparatory articles settled between England and France, King William promised to pay a yearly pension to Queen Mary D'Esty, of fifty thousand pounds, or such sum as should be established for that purpose by act of parliament. This stipulation, as a violation of articles—The French king engaged, that he would not disturb or disquiet the King of Great Britain in the possession of his realms or government: nor assist his enemies, nor favour conspiracies against his person. This obligation was reciprocated. A free conference was allowed. Commissaries were appointed to meet at London, and settle the pretensions of each crown to Hudson's Bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and retaken by the English: both the limits of the lands to be restored, as well as the exchanges to be made. It was likewise stipulated, That, in case of a rupture, six months should be allowed to the subjects of each power for removing their effects: That the separate articles of the treaty of Nimweigen, relating to the principality of Orange, should be entirely executed: and, That the ratifications should be exchanged in three weeks from the day of signing. The treaty between France and Holland imported a general armistice, a perpetual amity, a mutual restitution, a reciprocal renunciation of all pretensions upon each other, a confirmation of the peace with Savoy, a re-establishment of the treaty concluded between her and the provinces of Brabant and Brabant-Neuve, a hundred and seventy, a comprehension of Sweden, and all those powers that should be named before the ratification, or in six months after the conclusion of the treaty. Besides, the Dutch ministers concluded a treaty of commerce with which their king should be in execution. Spain had great reason to be satisfied with the pacification, by which she recovered Gironne, Rhodes, Barcelona, Luxemburg, Charleroy, Mons, Courtray, and all the towns, fortresses, and territories taken by the French, in the province of Luxemburg, Namur, Dender, Flanders, and Hainault, except eighty-two towns and villages claimed by the French: this dispute was left to the decision of commissioners, or in case they should not agree, to the determination of the States-general. A remonstrance in favour of the French protestant refugees in England, Holland, and Germany, was delivered by the Earl of Pembroke to the mediators, in the name of the protestant allies, on the day that preceded the conclusion of the treaty; but the French plenipotentiaries declared, in the name of their master, that as he did not pretend to prescribe rules to King William about the English subjects, he expected the same liberty with respect to his own. No other effort was made in behalf of those conscientious exiles; the treaties were ratified, and the peace proclaimed at Paris and London.

§ LV. The emperor still held out, and perhaps was encouraged to persevere in his obstinacy by the success of his arms in Hungary, where his general, Prince Eugene of Savoy, obtained a complete victory at Zenta over the forces of the grand signor, who commanded his army in person. In this battle, which was fought on the twenty-seventh of September, the grand vizir, the aga of the janissaries, seven-and-twenty bashaws, and about thirty thousand men, were killed or drowned in the river Tysse; six thousand were wounded or taken, together with all their artillery, tents, baggage, provision, and ammunition, the grand signor himself escaping with difficulty; a victory the more glorious and acceptable, as the Turks had a great superiority in point of numbers, and as the imperialists did not lose a thousand men during the whole action. Thus the emperor, perceiving that the event of this battle had no effect in retarding the treaty, thought proper to make use of the armistice, and continued the negotiation after the forementioned treaties had been signed. This was likewise the case with the princes of the empire; though those of the protestant persuasion complained, that their interest was neglected. In one of the articles of the treaty, it was stipulated, That in the places to be restored by France, the Roman catholic religious should continue to be re-established. The ambassadors of the protestant princes joined in a remonstrance, demanding, That the Lutheran religion should be restored in those places where it had been previously prevailed, and that both parties should be equally disagreeable to France and the emperor. Then they refused to sign the treaty, which was now concluded between France, the emperor, and the catholic princes of the empire. By this pacification, Trea, the palatinate, and Louvain, were restored to their respective owners. The countries of Spanheim and Veldenz, together with the duchy of Deux Ponts, were ceded to the King of Sweden. Francis Louis Palatine was confirmed in the electorate of Cologne; and Cardinal Weinsberg restored to all his rights and benefits. The claims of the Duchess of Orleans upon the palatinate were referred to the arbitration of France and the emperor; and in the mean time the pretender palatine was supplied with his necessary without an annuity of one hundred thousand florins. The ministers of the protestant princes published a formal declaration against the clause relating to religion, and afterwards solemnly protested against the manner in which the negotiation had been conducted. Such was the issue of a long and bloody war, which had drained England of her wealth and people, almost entirely ruined her commerce, debauched her morals, by encouraging vanity and corruption, and entailed upon her the curse of foreign connexions, as well as a national debt, which was gradually increased to an intolerable burthen. After all the blood and treasure which had been expended, William's ambition and revenue amounted to nothing. Nevertheless, he reapplied the solid advantage of seeing himself firmly established on the English throne; and the confederate, though not successful in every instance, accomplished their great aim of putting an end to the enmity which had agitated the nation for a hundred years. They mortified his vanity, they humbled his pride and arrogance, and compelled him to disgorge the acquisitions which, like a robber, he had made in violation of public faith, justice, and humanity. Had the confederate war been to one end, they had acted from genuine zeal for the common interest of mankind; and prosecuted with vigour the plan which was originally concerted, Louis would in a few campaigns have been reduced to the most abject state of disgrace and submission; for he was destitute of true courage and magnanimity.

King William having finished this important transaction, returned to England about the middle of November; he was received in London with a joyous accost and salutations of the people, who now again hailed him as their deliverer from a war, by the continuance of which they must have infallibly beggar'd.

majority of those who really entertained revolution principles opposed the court, from apprehensions that a standing army once established would take root, and grow into an habitual maxim of government: that should the people be disarmed, and the sword left in the hands of mercenary soldiers, they might be more easily brought under the mercy of him by whom those mercenaries should be commanded. They might overthrow elections, dictate to parliaments, and establish a tyranny, before the people could take their own measures for their own defense. They could not help thinking it was possible to form a militia, that with the concurrence of a fleet might effectually protect the kingdom from the dangers of an invasion. They firmly believed, that a militia might be regularly trained to military discipline, and wages paid for their services, so that they did not doubt they would surpass those hirelings in courage, considering that they would be animed by every concurrend motive of interest, sentiment, and affection. Nay, they argued, that Britain, surrounded as it was by a boisterous sea, secured by floating bulwarks, abounding with stout and hardy inhabitants, did not deserve to be free, if her sons could not protect their liberties within the seas as well as on them, or share the dominion of the kingdom. Yet, among the genuine friends of their country, some individuals exposed the opposite maxims. They observed, that the military system of every government in Europe was now altered, that the standing army might be a dangerous power; and it might be learned but by those who made it their sole profession; that, therefore, while France kept up a large standing army of veterans, ready to embark on the opposite coast, it would be absolutely necessary for the safety of the nation, to maintain a small standing force, which should be voted in parliament from year to year. They might have suggested another expedient, which in a few years would have produced a militia of disciplined men. The idea of a standing army was entertained, for a term of years, at the expiration of which they might have claimed their discharge, volunteers would have offered themselves from all parts of the kingdom, even from the desire of learning the use and exercise of arms, the ambition of being concerned in scenes of actual service, and the chagrin of little disappointments or temporary disgusts, which yet would not have impelled them to enlist as soldiers on the common terms of perpetual slavery. In consequence of such a succession, the whole kingdom would soon have been stocked with members of a disciplined militia, equal, if not superior, to any army of professed soldiers. But this scheme would have defeated the policy of the nation, as it would make them domestic foes than of foreign enemies; and industriously avoided every plan of this nature, which could contribute to render the malcontents of the nation more formidable. The plan which the parliament in this session, in considering this matter, may not be amiss to sketch the outlines of the ministry, as it stood at this juncture. The king's affection for the Earl of Portland had begun to abate, in proportion as his esteem for Sunderland increased, together with his consideration for Mrs. Villiers, who had been distinguished by some particular marks of his majesty's fav'ur. These two favourites are said to have supplanted Portland, whose place in the king's bosom was now filled by Van Keppel, a gentleman of Sunderland, who had first served his majesty as a page, and afterwards acted as private secretary. The Earl of Portland growing troublesome, from his jealousy of this rival, the king resolved to send him into honourable exile, in quality of an ambassador extraordinary to the court of France; and Trumbull, his friend and creature, was dismissed from the office of secretary, which the king conferred upon Vernon, a plodding man of business, who had acted as under-secretary to the Duke of Shrewsbury. This nobleman railed the Earl of Sunderland, in his credit at the council-board, and was supported by Somers, lord chancellor of England, by Russell, now Earl of Orford, first Lord of the Treasury, and by R. C. a gentleman of the court, who was an upright judge, a plausible statesman, a commissary-courte, affable, mild, and insinuating. Orford appears to have been rough, turbulent, factious, and shallow. Montagu had distinguished himself early by his poetical genius; but he soon converted his attention to the cultivation of more solid talents. He rendered himself remarkable for his eloquence, discernment, and knowledge of the English constitution. To a delicate taste, he united an eager appetite for political studies. The first cared for the enjoyment of life; the other inspired with a great ambition. He, at the same time, was the distinguished encourager of the liberal arts, and the professed patron of projectors. In his private deportment he was liberal, easy, and amiable: as a statesman, bold, dogmatical, and aspiring.

§ III. The terrors of a standing army had produced such a universal ferment in the nation, that the dependents of the court in the House of Commons durst not openly oppose the vote of the standing army to the lower branch of the latter, and employed all their address in persuading the House to agree, that a very small number should be retained. When the Commons voted, that all the forces raised since the year one thousand six hundred and eighty should be disbanded, the courtiers desired the vote might be recommitted, on pretense that it restrained the King to the old tody regiments, on whose fidelity he could not rely. This motion was entertained, and the standing army was reduced to an abridgment of the standing army. The king was extremely mortified at these resolutions of the Commons; and even declared to his particular friends, that he would never have intermeddled with the affairs of the nation, had he foreseen they would make such returns of ingratitude and distrust. His displeasure was aggravated by the resentment expressed against Sunderland, who was supposed to have advised the unpopular measure of retaining a standing army. This nobleman, dreading the vengeance of the Commons, resolved to avert the fury of the impending storm, by resigning his office, and retiring from court, contrary to the entreaties of his friends, and the earnest desire of his majesty.

§ IV. The House of Commons, in order to sweeten the unpalatable cup they had presented to the king, voted the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds per annum for the support of the civil list, distinct from other services. Then they passed a law prohibiting the circulation of all hammered coin, including a clause for making out new exchequer bills, in lieu of those which were or might be filled up with indorsements: they framed another to open the correspondence of the foreign ministers, and to declare that an act of the 2d of August, 1709, was to be held null and void; and a third for continuing the imprisonment of certain persons who had been concerned in the late conspiracy: a fourth granted further time for administering oaths with respect to tallies and orders in the exchequer and bank of England. These bills having received the royal assent, they resolved to grant a supply, which, together with the funds already settled for that purpose, should be sufficient to answer and cancel all exchequer bills, to the amount of two millions seven hundred thousand pounds. Another supply was voted for the payment and reduction of the army, including half-pay to such commissioned officers as were natural-born subjects of England. They granted one million four hundred thousand pounds, to make good deficiencies. They resolved, that the sum of two millions three hundred and forty-eight thousand one hundred and two pounds was necessary to pay off arrears, subsistence, contingencies, general officers, guards, and garrisons; of which sum eight hundred and fifty-five thousand five hundred and two pounds remained in the hands of the paymaster. Then they took into consideration the subsidies due to foreign powers, and the sums owing to contractors for the bread and for maintaining the distant dependencies of the nation, they found the general debt of the navy amounted to one million three hundred and ninety-two thousand seven hundred and forty-two pounds. That of the ordnance was equal to two hundred and four thousand one hundred and fifty-seven pounds. The transport debt contracted for the reduction of Ireland, and other services, did not fall short of four hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred and ninety-three pounds; and they owed nineteen thousand five hundred and twenty thousand pounds, for quartering and clothing the army, which had been raised by one act of parliament in the year 1677, and disbanded by another in the year 1679. As this enormous loan or debt had not been discharged, the Commons passed a number of votes for raising sums of money by which it was considerably lightened; and settled the funds for those purposes by the continuation of the land-tax, the rated poor-tax, and various other assessments. With respect to the revenue, it was raised by a new subsidy of tonnage and poundage, the hereditary and temporary excise, a weekly portion from the revenue of the post office, the first-fruits and tenth of the clergy, the fines in the alienation office, and post fines, the revenue of the wine-levellers, mortality, sheriffs' proffers, and compositions in the exchequer, and seizures, the income of the duchy of Cornwall, the rents of all other crown lands in England or Wales, and the duty of four and a half per cent. upon exports, and contributed to the Tower: Leeward Islands. The bill imported, That the overplus arising from these funds should be accounted for to parliament. Six hundred thousand pounds of this money was allotted in the first instance to the expenses of the end of the year; the rest was granted for the jointure of fifty thousand pounds per annum, to be paid to Queen Mary d’Est, according to the stipulation at Ryswick; and to maintain a court for the Duke of Orleans. The revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall, ... expenditure, was voted preceptor. § V. The Commons having discussed the ways and means for raising the supplies of the ensuing year, which rose almost to five millions, took cognizance of some frauds in the collection of exchequer-seals, a species of forgery which had been practised by a confidence, consisting of Charles Duncombe, receiver-general of the excise, Bartolomeo Burton, who possessed a place in that branch of the revenue, John Knight, treasurer of the customs, and John Marriot, a stationer of the excise office at London. The last became evidence, and the proof turning out very strong and full, the House resolved to make examples of the delinquents. Duncombe and Knight, both members of parliament, were sent in contempt, and committed to the Tower: Burton was sent to Newgate: and bills of pains and penalties were ordered to be brought in against them. The first, levelling at the House of Lords, passed through the House, though not without great opposition: but was rejected in the House of Lords by the majority of one voice. Duncombe, who was extremely rich, is said to have paid debt for his release. The other two bills met with the same fate. The Peers discharged Duncombe from his confinement; but he was recommitted by the Commons, and remained in custody till the end of the session. While the Commons were employed on ways and means, some of the members in the opposition proposed, that one fourth part of the money arising from improper grants of the crown should be appropriated to the service of the public, but this was a very unpalatable expedient, as it affected not only the wages of King William's reign, but also the taxes which had been granted by Charles II. and his brother. A great number of petitions were presented against this measure, and so many difficulties raised, that both parties agreed to lay it aside. In the course of this inquiry, they discovered that one Railton held a grant in trust for Mr. Montagu, chancellor of the exchequer. A motion was immediately made that he should withdraw; but the House, after some debate, and upon the opinion of a great many members in the prosecution of this minister, the House voted it was their opinion, That Mr. Montagu, for his good services to the government, did deserve his majesty's favour. § VI. This extraordinary vote was a sure prelude of success in the execution of a scheme which Montagu had concerted against the East India company. They had been sounded about advancing a sum of money for the public service, by way of loan in consideration of a parliamentary settlement; and they offered to raise seven hundred thousand pounds on that condition: but before they formed this resolution, another body of merchants, under the auspices of Montagu, offered to lend two millions of pounds, and undertook to be gratified with an exclusive privilege of trading to the East Indies. This proposal was very well received by the majority in the House of Commons. A bill for this purpose was immediately brought in; and the Commons, by a special committee, represented their rights and claims under so many royal charters; the regard due to the property of above a thousand families of consequence; the interests of the nation, the wealth of the company, and the means of raising it in India, amounting to forty-four thousand pounds of yearly revenue. They alleged they had expended a million in fortifications: that during the war they had lost twelve great ships, with fifteen hundred thousand pounds: that since the last subscription they had contributed a hundred and ninety-five thousand pounds to the customs, with above eighty-five thousand pounds in taxes: that they had furnished six thousand barrels of gunpowder on a very just, growing under the most oppressive burthens. Certain it is, they were at this period the most mercenary and corrupt undertakers that ever had been employed by any king or administration since the first establishment of the English government. § VII. The Commons now transferred their attention to certain objects in which the people of Ireland were interested. Colonel Michelborne, who had been joint governor of London, and Lord lieutenant of Limerick, was sent to that place, petitioned the House in behalf of himself, his officers, and soldiers, to whom a considerable sum of money was due for subsistence; and the city itself implored the mediation of the Commons with his majesty, that its services and sufferings might be taken into consideration. The House having examined the allegations contained in both petitions, presented an address to the king, recommending the councils of Londonerry to his majesty's favour: that they might no longer remain a notorious spectacle to all, a scorn to their enemies, and a discouragement to well-affectcd subjects; they likewise declared, that the government, having found matters raised, to be justifications of royal favour, for a lasting monument to posterty. To this address the king replied, that he would consider them according to the desire of the Commons. William Molineaux, a gentleman of Dublin, having published a book to prove that thirty wives of Ireland, drawn up in the midst of that parliament of England, the House appointed a committee to inquire into the cause and nature of this performance. An address was voted to the king, desiring he would give directions for the discovery and punishment of the authors. Upon the report of the committee, the Commons in a body presented an address to his majesty, representing the dangerous attempts which had been lately made by some of his subjects in Ireland, to shake off their subjection and dependence upon England: attempts which appeared not only from the bold and pertinacious assertions contained in a book lately published, but more fully and authentically by the proceedings of the Commons in Ireland. These had, during their last session, transmitted an act for the better security of his majesty's person and government, whereby an English act of parliament was pretended to be re-enacted, with alterations obligatory on the courts of justice and the citizens of England. The Commons, therefore, besought his majesty to give effectual orders for preventing any such encroachments for the future, and the pernicious consequences of what was past, by punishing those who had been guilty therein; that he would take care to see the laws which direct and restrain the parliament of Ireland punctually observed, and discourage every thing which might have a tendency to lessen the dependence of Ireland upon England. This remonstrance was graciously received, and the king promised to comply with their request.

§ VIII. The jealousy which the Commons entertained of the government in Ireland, animates them to take other measures, that averted the subject of that kingdom. Understanding that the Irish had established divers woolen manufactories, they, to another address, entrusted his majesty to take measures for discouraging the woolen manufactories in Ireland, and to restrict the importation of English manufactures, and to promote the linen manufacture, which would be profitable to both nations. At the same time, receiving information that the French had subsidised some English manufactories, and set great work for frustrated an act for the House, by the lurking company, against certain merchants who had smuggled alamodes and lustrings from France, even during the war, the committee of trade was directed to inquire into the allegations; and all the secrets of the trade were opened, the key was taken, and the company resolved, that the manufactures of alamodes and lustrings set up to England had been beneficial to the kingdom; that there had been a destructive and illegal trade carried on during the war, for importing these commodities, by which the king had been defrauded of his customs, and the English manufacturers greatly discouraged, that, by the smuggling vessels employed in this trade, intelligence had been carried into England during the war, and the enemies of the government conspired from justice. Stephen Segrregor, Rhene, Baudoine, John Gooele, Nicholas Santim, Peter de Hierre, John Pierce, John Dumatre, and David Barreau, were imprisoned at the bar of the House of Commons, and their property sequestered; and, after the bills upon them, according to their respective circumstances, they were in the mean time committed to Newgate, until those fines should be paid: and the Commons addressed the king, that the monies might be appropriated to the maintenance of Greenwich hospital. The House having taken cognizance of this affair, and made some new regulations in the prosecution of the African trade, presented a solemn address to the king, representing the general degeneracy and corruption of the age, and beseeching his majesty to command all his judges, justices, and magistrates, to put the laws in execution against plunderers and robbers, to make the king professedly to himself well pleased with this remonstrance, presented to give immediate directions for a reformation, and expressed his desire that some more effectual proviso might be made for suppressing impious books, containing doctrines against the Trinity; doctrines which abounded at this period, and took their origin from the licentiousness and profanity of the times.

§ IX. In the midst of this unprovoked immorality, Dr. Thomas Bray presented a petition, praying, that some part of these estates might be set apart for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign countries. Missionaries, catechists, itinerants, and other books for the instruction of ignorant people, were sent to the English colonies in America. The book was printed and published, by subscription, and the bill having been brought into the House of Commons, for the better discovery of estates given to superstitious uses, Dr. Bray presented a petition, praying, that some part of these estates might be set apart for the propagation of the Gospel among the people of Virginia, and the Leeward Islands. About this period, a society for the reformation of manners was formed under the king's countenance and encouragement. Considerable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read the Scriptures at certain places of public worship, to administer the sacrament every Sunday. The members of this society resolved to inform the magistrates of all vice and immorality that should fall under their cognizance; and not to publish by law those who should be proved to constitute a fund of charity. The business of the session being terminated, the king, on the third day of July, proposed the parliament, after having thanked them, in a short speech, for the many testimonies of their affection he had received; and in two days after the prorogation it was dissolved.

§ X. In the month of January, the Earl of Portland had sent out on his embassy to France, where he was received with very particular marks of distinction. He made a public entry into Paris with such magnificence, as is said to have astonished the French nation. He interceded for the protestants in that kingdom, against whom he proposed to redress with his whole heart. If, however, he proposed that King James should be removed to Avignon, in which case his master would supply him with an honourable pension: but his remonstrances on both subjects proved ineffectual. Louis, however, in a conference with him at Mols, is supposed to have communicated his project of the partition treaty. The Earl of Portland, at his return to England, finding himself totally eclipsed in the king's favour, by Keppel, now created Earl of Albemarle, resigned his employments in disgust; nor could the king's solicitations prevail upon him to resume any office in the household; though he promised to serve his majesty in any other shape, and was soon employed to negotiate the peace with the Dutch. If this nobleman miscarried in the purposes of his last embassy at the court of Versailles, the agents of France were equally unsuccessful in their endeavours to retrieve their commerce with England, which the war had interrupted. Their commissary, sent over to London with powers to regulate the trade between the two nations, met with insuperable difficulties. The parliament had burdened the French commodities with heavy duties which were already appropriated to different uses; and the channel of trade was in many respects entirely altered. The English merchants supplied the nation with wines from Italy, Spain, and Portugal; with timber from Holland and the fisheries of the Channel Islands. The Dutch were hindered by the English manufactures of paper, hats, stuffs, and silks, had been erected up and successfully carried on in England, by the French refugees.

§ XI. By this time a ferment had been raised in Scotland, by the apposition and discourses their new company had sustained. They had employed agents in England, Holland, and Hamburg, to receive subscriptions. The adventurers in England were intimidated by the measures which had been taken in parliament against the Scottish company. The Dutch East India company took the alarm, and exerted all their interest to prevent their countrymen from subscribing; and the king permitted his resident at Hamburg to present a memorial against the Scottish company to the senate of that city. The parliament of Scotland being assembled by the Earl of Marchmont as king's commissioner, the company presented it with a remonstrance, containing a detail of their grievances, arising from the conduct of the English House of Commons, as well as from the memorial presented by the king's minister at Hamburg, in which he actually disowned the act of parliament and letters patent which had passed in their favour, and threatened the inhabitants of that city with his majesty's resentment, in case they should join the Scots in their undertaking. They represented, that such instances of interference had put a stop to the subscriptions; and each individual would be ill advice to risk his property in the credit of the company, discouraged the adventurers, and threatened the entire ruin of a design, in which all the most considerable families of the nation were deeply engaged. The parliamentarians, for that case into consideration, sent an address to his majesty, representing the hardships to which the company had been exposed, explaining how far the nation in general was concerned in the design, and entreaty that he would take measures to effectually vindicate their undoubted right and privileges of the company. This address was seconded by a petition from the company itself, praying that his majesty would give some intimation to the senate of France to prevent the inhabitants of that city to renew the subscriptions they had withdrawn: that, as a gracious mark of his royal favour to the company, he would bestow upon them two small frigates, then lying useless in the harbour of Burntisland; and that, in consideration of the obstructions they had encountered, he would continue their privileges and immunities for such longer time as should seem reasonable to his majesty. Though the commissioner was wholly devoted to the king, who had actually resolved to ruin this company, he could not apprise the resentmeut of the nation; and the heats in parliament became so violent, that he was obliged to adjourn it to the fifth day of November. In this interval, the directors of the company, understanding from their agent at Hamburg, that the address of the parliament, and their own petition, had produced no effect in their favour; they wrote a letter of complaint to the Lord Seafield, secretary of state, that they had received assurances of the king's having given orders to his resident at Hamburg touching their memorial; and entreaty the interposition of his lordship, that justice might be done to the company. The secretary, in his answer, promised to take the first convenient opportunity of representing the affair to his majesty; but he said this could not be immediately expected, as the king was much engaged in the affairs of the English parliament. This declaration the directors considered as a mean respite, a mere measure towards a more efficacious one, to abate the minds of that people from the king's person and government.

§ XI. King William at this time resided in his own mind a project of the greatest consequence to the interest of Europe; namely, that of settling the succession to the throne of Spain, which in a little time would be vacated by the death of Charles II., whose constitution was already exhausted. He had lately redressed extremities, and his situation was no sooner known in France, than Louis detached a squadron towards Cadiz, with orders to intercept the Plate-sheets, in case the King of Spain should die before the expected arrival of his fleet at the galleons; but it arrived too late for that service, and the nation loudly exclaimed against the tardiness of the equipment. His catholic majesty recovered from his disorder, contrary to the expectation of his people: but continued long in the severest illness, which was supposed to be a relapse every moment apprehended. In the latter end of July, King William embarked for Holland, on pretence of enjoying a recess from business, which was necessary to his constitution. He was glad of an opportunity to withdraw himself for some time from a kingdom in which he had been exposed to such opposition and chagrin. But the real motive of his voyage was a design of uniting with the French king, remote from the observation of those who might have penetrated into the nature of his negotiation. He had appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his absence, and, as one of the ombre, nominated the Earl of Marlborough, who had regained his favour, and been constituted governor of the Duke of Gloucester. At his majesty's departure, seated orders were left with the minister, directing, that sixteen thousand men should be retained in the service, notwithstanding the vote of the Commons, by which the standing army was limited to ten thousand. He alleged, that the apprehension of troubles which might arise at the death of King Charles, induced him to transgress this limitation; and he hoped that the new parliament would be more faithful to his secret. His enemies, however, made a fresh handle of this step, to depreciate his character in the eyes of the people.

conclus. He was instructed to procure the succession of the crown for one of the dauphin's sons, or at least to hinder it from devolving upon the emperor's children. With a view to give weight to his negotiations, the French king entered an army of sixty thousand men to advance towards the frontiers of Catalonia and Narbâre, while a great number of ships and galleys cruised along the coast and entered the harbours of Spain. Harcourt immediately before his departure informed the emperor of his design; but the latter had no power to dispose of his crown against the laws of nature and the constitution of the realm: that, by the order of succession, the crown ought to descend to the children of his brother-in-law; that, in that instance; that, if the Spaniards would declare in favour of the dauphin's second son, the Duke of Anjou, they might train him up in the manners and customs of their country. When he found them averse to this proposal, he assured them his master would approve of the Elector Prince of Bavaria, rather than consent to the succession's devolving upon a son of the emperor. Nay, he hinted, that if they would choose a sovereign among themselves, they might depend upon the protection of his most Christian majesty, who had no other view than that of preventing the host of Austria from becoming too formidable to the liberties of Europe. The Queen of Spain, having discovered the intentions of the Elector Prince of Bavaria, and the presence of the air of Madrid was prejudicial to his health. Harcourt immediately took the alarm. He supposed her intention was to prevail upon her husband, in his absence, to consent to this union. But all doubts were all removed, when he understood that the Count de Harach, the imperial ambassador, had privately repaired to Toledo. He forswore the same road, prefacing to have received a memorial from his master, with a positive order to deliver it into the king's own hands. He was given to understand, that the management of foreign affairs had been left to the care of Cardinal Corfalanda at Madrid, and that the king's health would not permit him to attend to the choice of his successor. The Emperor offered of French force to assist in raising the siege of Ceuta in Barbary, which the Moors had lately undertaken: but this offer was civilly declined. Harcourt, not yet discouraged, redoubled his efforts at Madrid, and found means to engage Cardinal Portocarrero in the interests of his master. In the mean time Louis concluded an alliance with Sweden, under the pretext of preserving and securing the commonwealth; by such means as should be adjudged, most proper and convenient. During these transactions, King William was not wanting in his endeavours to terminate the war in Hungary, which had raged fifteen years with so little success. About the middle of August, Lord Paget and Mr. Collins waited at Brunswick on the coast of Holland, arrived in the Turkish camp near Belgrade; and a conference being opened under their mediation, the peace of Carlswitz was signed on the twenty-sixth day of January. By this treaty, the emperor renounced in possession of all his conquests: Cammack was restored to the Poles: all the Moras, with several fortresses in Dalmatia, were ceded to the Venetians; and the Zbor of Muscovy retained Azoph during a truce of two years; so that the Turks, by this pacification, lost great part of their European dominions. The cardinal primate of Poland, who had strenuously adhered to the Prince of Conti, was prevailed upon to relinquish his pretensions, and the commotions in Lithuania being appeased, peace was established through all Christendom.

§ XVI. Such was the indignation of William, kindled by this conduct of his ministry and his parliament, that he threatened to abandon the government; and had actually prepared to accept the succession on that occasion: but he was diverted from this purpose by his ministry and confidants, and resolved to pass the bill by which he had been so much offended. Accordingly, when it was ready for the royal assent, he went to the House of Peers, where having demanded of the Commons what he had thought that although he might think himself unhappily indisposed, in being deprived of his guards, which had constantly attended him in all his actions; yet, as he believed nothing could be more fatal to the nation than any distrust or jealousy between him and his parliament, he was come to pass the bill, according to their desire. At the same time, for his own justification, and in discharge of the trust reposed in him, he declared, that in his own just opinion the nation was left too much exposed; and that it was incumbent upon them to provide such a strength as might he necessary for the safety of the kingdom. They thanked him, in an address, for this conduct of his ministry, and assented to the desires of his parliament. They assured him, he should never have reason to think the Commons were undutiful or unkind: for they would, on all occasions, stand by and assist him in the preservation of his sacred person, and in the support of his government, against all his enemies whatsoever. The Lords presented an address to the same effect; and the king assured both Houses, he entertained no doubts of their loyalty and affection. He forthwith issued orders for reducing the army to the number of seven thousand men, to be maintained in England under the name of guards and garrisons; and, hoping the hearts of the Commons were now mollified, he made another motion in favour of his Dutch guards, whom he continued dismants without the most sensible regard. Lord Ranalgh was sent with a written message to the Commons, giving them to understand, that the necessary preparations were made for transporting the guards who did not come with him to England, and that they should embark immediately, unless out of consideration to him, the House should be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in the service; a favour which his majesty would take very kindly. The Commons, with his advice, sent an address to the king, to express some sunder and unspeakable grieve, that he should propose any thing to which they could not consent with due regard to the constitution, which he had taken upon himself to offer in the name of any person to preserve. They reminded him of the declaration, in which he had promised that all the foreign forces should be sent out of the kingdom. They observed, that nothing conducted more to the happiness and welfare of the nation, than an entire confidence between the king and people, which could no way be so firmly established as by intrusting his sacred person with his own subjects, who had so eminently signalized themselves during the late long and expensive war. They received a soothing answer to this address, but remained firm to their purpose, in which the king was fully acquiesced. On the other hand, guards were now transported to Holland. At a time when they declared themselves so well pleased with their deliverer, such an opposition, in an affair of very little consequence, savoured most strongly of obstinacy. In the midst of all these professions of regard, they entertained a national prejudice against himself, and all the foreigners in his service. Even to the House of Commons his person was treated with great disrespect in violent imputations. They suggested that he neither loved nor trusted the English nation: that he treated the natives with the most disagreeable reserve; and chose his confidants from the number of strangers that surrounded him; that, after every session of parliament, he retired from the kingdom, to enjoy an indolent and nugatory privacy with a few favourites. These suggestions were certainly true. He was extremely disgusted with the English, whom he considered had shameful, ignominious, and ungrateful, and he took no pains to disguise his sentiments.

§ XVII. The Commons having effected a dissolution of the army, voted fifteen thousand seamen, and a proportion of the seamen of the nation, as a guard for the safety of the kingdom: they created one million four hundred and eighty-four thousand fifteen hundred pounds, for the services of the year, to be raised by a tax of three shillings in the pound upon lands, personal estates, pensions, and offices. A great number of petitions from men of estabished credit, were carried away by the revolution, were now encouraged, by the treaty of Ryswick, to return, and appeared in all public places of London and Westminster, with remarkable encouragement. Among these was a secret whisper about, that the treaty contained a secret article in favour of those who professed that religion; and some did not even scruple to insinuate, that William was a papist in his heart. The Commons alarmed at the number and insolence of those religions, desired the king, in an address, to remove by proclamation all papists and non-jurors from the city of London and parts adjacent, and put the laws in execution against them, that the work of designs they were always hatching might be effectually disappointed. The king gratified them in their request of a proclamation, which was not much regarded: but a remarkable law was enacted against papists in the course of this session. The other members of the new cabinet, about this period, petitioned the lower House, to make some provision that their corporation might subsist for the residue of the term of twenty-one years, granted by his majesty, for the payment of five pounds per cent. by the late act for settling the trade to the East Indies, might be settled and adjusted in such a manner, as not to remain a burden on the petitioners; and that such further considerations might be had for their relief, and for the preservation of the East India trade, as should be thought reasonable. A bill was brought in upon the subject of this petition; but rejected at the second reading.

Discontented men had risen to such a height, that some members began to assert, they were not bound to maintain the votes and credit of the former parliament; and upon this maxim would have constructed their interest towards a repeal of the act made in favour of the new compacts; but such a scheme was of too dangerous consequence to the public credit, to be carried into execution.

§ XVIII. That spirit of persecution which could not be gratified with this sacrifice, produced an inquiry into the management of naval affairs, which was aimed at the Earl of Orford, a nobleman whose power gave unbreage, and whose wealth excited envy. He officiated both as treasurer of the navy, and lord commissioneer of the admiralty, and seemed to have forgot the sphere from which he had risen to titre and office. The Commons drew up an address, complaining of some A.D. 1692. unimportant articles of maimangement in the conduct of the navy; and the earl was wise enough to avoid further prosecution. The country was at peace. On the fourth day of May the king closed the session, with a short speech, hinting dissatisfaction at their having neglected to consider some points which he had recommended to their attention. He declared his intention to the first of June. In a little time after this prorogation, his majesty appointed a regency, and on the second day of June embarkred for Holland.

§ XIX. In Ireland nothing of moment was transacted. The parliament of that country, passed an act for raising one hundred and twenty thousand pounds on lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to defray the expense of maintaining twelve thousand men, who had been voted by the Commons of England, when the assembly was prorogued. A new commission afterwards arrived at Dublin, constituting the Duke of Bolton, the Earl of Berkeleys and Galway, lords-justices of Ireland. The clamour in Scotland increased; for the minister had recommended the union of their companies, and in a great measure defeated the design from which they had confined themselves such heaps of treasrue. Notwithstanding the discouragements to which their country was subjected, the king of England: they created four large ships which had been built at Hamburgh for their service. These were laden with a cargo for traffic, with some artillery and military stores; and the advenures returned, to the number of twelve hundred, they sailed from the port of Edinburg, and were lost: the ship left the seventeenth day of July in the preceding year. At Madura they took in a supply of wine, and then steered to Crab-Island in the neighborhood of St. Thomas, lying between St. Cruz and Porto-iero. The design was to take possession of this little island; but, when they entered the road, they saw a large tent pitched upon the shore, and the Danish colours flying. Finding themselves anticipated in this quarter, they directed their course to the coast of Darom, where they met with the natives for the establishment of their colony, and taking possession of the ground, to which they gave the name of Caledonia, began to form a projected plan of erecting a town under the appellation of New Edinburgh, by the direction of their council, consisting of Pateron the projector, and six other directors. They had no sooner completed their settlement, than they wrote a letter to the king, containing a detail of their proceedings. The whole by the French was doubted intelligence that the French intended to make a settlement on that coast; and that their colony would be the means of preventing the evil consequences which might arise to his majesty's kingdom and dominions from the execution of such a scheme. They acknowledged his goodness in granting those privileges by which their company was established; they implored the continuance of their royal favour and protection, as they had punctually adhered to the conditions of the act of parliament, and the potent they had obtained.

§ XX. By this time, however, the king was resolved to crush them effectually. He understood that the greater part of their savages had been procured by the king of France, and had received compacts, restrictions, and other articles, under the form of treaties, and the other English settlements in America, to issue proclamations, prohibiting, under the severest penalties, all his majesty's subjects from holding any correspondence with the Scottish colony, or any instruments, who had discovered, ammunition, or provision; on pretence that they had not communicated their design to his majesty, but had people was sent ambassador extraordinary to France; the Earl of Pembroke was declared, by his majesty, to be the president of the council, and Lord Viscount Lonsdale keeper of the grey seal.

The king of France, seeing how far the intrepidity, the king of France, the lord steward of the household, the Earl of Bridgewater, first commissioner, and Sir Godfrey Carteret, the minister, the Earl of Monmouth, the Earl of Jersey, and Mr. Montagu.
plied Darien, in violation of the peace subsisting between him and his allies. Their colony was, doubtless, a very dangerous encroachment upon the Spanish dominions, and it would have complicated the relations between Porto-Bello and Panama, and divided the Spanish empire in America. The French king complained of the invasion, and offered to supply the court of Madrid with a fleet to dislodge the intruders; but the Spanish ambassador at the court of London, presented a memorial to King William, remonstrating against the settlement of this colony, as a mark of disregard, and a breach of the alliance, and alleging that it would take proper measures against such hostilities. The Scots affirmed, that the natives of Darien were a free people, whom the Spaniards had in vain attempted to subdue: that, therefore, they had an original and incontrovertible right to dispose of their own lands, part of which the company had purchased for a valuable consideration. But there was another cause more powerful than the remonstrances of the Spanish court, to which the colony fell a sacrifice; and that was the jealousy of the English traders and planters. Darien was said to be a country abounding with gold, which would in a little time enrich the adventurers. The Scots were known to be an enterprising and profiting people, and the harbour near Golden Hills was already declared a free port. The English apprehended that their planters would be allured into this new colony; by the double prospect of finding gold, and plundering the Spanish vessels coming to that part of the world. They would choose it as their chief residence: that the plantations of England would be desolated; that Darien would become another Algiers; and that the settlement would produce effects of the most alarming nature. The remonstrances of England in that kingdom would be confounded.

The Dutch, too, are said to have been jealous of a company, which in time might have proved their competitors in the commerce, and have diminished the hitherto dominant trade of the English nation, and by a loyal and lenient treatment, had softened the king's heart against the new settlers, whom he abominated to their fate, notwithstanding the repeated petitions and remonstrances of their constituents. Fanine compelled the first adventurers to quit the coast: a second group, of men and provisions, was sent thither from Scotland: but one of their ships, laden with provisions, being burnt by accident, they likewise deserted the place: another reinforcement arrived, and being better provided than the former, had maintained their footing; but they were soon divided into factions that rendered all their schemes abortive. The Spaniards advanced against them, but, finding themselves incapable of withstanding their numbers, they had drawn back into their former plantation, and to quell their attempts, they were permitted to retire. Thus vanished all the golden dreams of the Scottish nation, which had engaged in this design with incredible eagerness, and even embarked their fortune in the enterprise. The men of the Spanish nation, however, were seized upon any other occasion. They were now not only disappointed in their expectations of wealth and influence, but a great number of families were absolutely ruined by the miscarriage of the design, which they imputed solely to the conduct of King William. The whole kingdom of Scotland seemed to join in the clamour that was raised against their sovereign, taxed him with double dealing, ingratitude, and base ingratitude, to a people who had lavished their treasure and best blood in support of his government, and in the gratification of his ambition; and had their power been equal to their animosity, in all probability a rebellion would have ensued.

§ 82. The English minister at Lisbon, William, had long cultivated an intimacy of friendship. During his residence in this place, the Earl of Portland and the grand-duke of Tuscany had been in high displeasure with William for their measure, and had begun a private negociation for that purpose. The court of Spain, apprized of their intention, sent a written remonstrance to Mr. Stanhope, the English minister at Madrid, expressing their resentment at this unprecedented method of proceeding, and declaring that a stop might be put to those intrigues, seeing the King of Spain would of himself take the necessary steps for preserving the public tranquillity, in case he should decide without their consent. A reparation of the same kind was made to the ministers of France and Holland: the Marquis de Canales, the Spanish ambassador at London, delivered a memorial to the lords-justices, couched in the most virulent terms, against this transaction, and even accused the king to the parliament. This Spanish was pleased with an opportunity to insult King William, who hated his person, and had hurled him the court, on account of his appearing covered in his father's burial, that he had ordered the ambassador to send him a letter, in which the king, more distant in the next day, when the ambassador had heard communicated this paper to the king, than he ordered the ambassador to quit the kingdom in eighteen days, and to remain within his own house till the time of his departure. He was likewise given to understand, that no writing would be received from him or any of his domestics. Mr. Stanhope was directed to complain at Madrid of the affront offered to his master, which he styled an insolent and saucy attempt to stir up sedition in the kingdom, by appealing to the people and parliament of England against his majesty. The court of Spain justified what their minister had done, and in their turn ordered Mr. Stanhope to leave their dominions. Don Bernardo de Quiros, the Spanish ambassador in Holland, presenting a memorial on the same subject, to the States-general; which, however, they refused to accept. These remonstrances did not interrupt the negociation, in which Louis was so eager, that the king had simplified what had been put forward, and in which he not only employed his whole influence in prevailing upon the Dutch to signify their accession to the articles agreed upon by France and England: but his Britannic majesty found means to remove the remainder.

§ XXII. About the middle of October, William returned to England, and conferred upon the Duke of Shrewsbury the office of chamberlain, vacant since the death of William the Prince of Orange. The King had resigned his seat at the treasury-board, together with the chancellorship of the exchequer; either foreseeing uncommon difficulty in managing a House of Commons, after the great dissension, or in ill humour, or dreading the interest of his enemies, who might procure a vote that his two places were inconsistent. The king opened the session of parliament, on the sixteenth day of November, with a long speech, advising a further provision for the safety of the kingdom by sea and land, as well as the repairs of ships and fortifications; exhorting the Commons to make good the deficiencies of the funds, discharge the debts of the nation, and provide the necessary supplies. He recommended some measures for the encouragement of agriculture, and punishing unlawful and clandestine trading; and expressed a desire, that some method should be taken for employing the poor, which were become a burthen to the kingdom. He assured them, that his resentment was in the highest degree of tenderness and discourse vise; and that he would decline no difficulties and dangers, where the welfare and prosperity of the nation might be concerned. He concluded with these words: "Since then, our arms are only for the general good, let us act with confidence in one another; which will not fail, with God's blessing, to make me a happy king, and yu a great and flourishing people."—The Commons were now become wanton in their distrust. Though they had received no real provocations, they were resolved to mortify him with their proceedings. They affected to put odious interpretations on the very harmless expression of, "Let us act with confidence in one another." Instead of an address of thanks, according to the English custom, they presented a sullen remonstrance, complaining that a jealousy and disgust had been raised of their duty and affection; and declaring he should show marks of his high displeasure, if it was not openly avowed, that he overreigned their proceedings to his majesty. He declared, in his answer, that no person had ever dared to misrepresent their proceedings, and, that if any should presume to impose upon him with such calumnies, he would treat them as his worst enemies.

§ XXIII. The House was not in a humour to be appeased with soothing promises and protestations: they determined to distress him, by prosecuting his ministers. During the war, the colonies of North America had grown rich by piracy. One Kidd, the master of a sloop, undertook to suppress the pirates, provided the government would furnish him with a ship of thirty guns, well manned. The board of admiralty declared that such a number of seamen could not be spared from the public service. Kidd was equipped by the private subscription of the Lord chancellor, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Earls of Romney, Oxford, and Bellamont, Sir Edward Harrison, and Colonel Livingstone, of New York. The king promised to contribute one half of the expense, and reserved to himself one tenth of the profits; but he never advanced the money. Kidd, being thus equipped, and provided with a commission to act against the French, as well as to make war on certain pirates therein mentioned by name, set sail from Plymouth; but, in lieu of cruising on the coast of America, he directed his course to the East Indies, where he himself turned pirate, and took a rich ship belonging to the Moors. Having divided his booty with his crew, none of whom left him, in order to join other adventurers, he burned his own ship, and sailed with his prize to the West Indies. There he purchased a sloop, in which he steered from North America, leaving part of his men in the prize, to remain in one of the Leeward Islands, until they should receive further instructions. Arriving on the coast of New York, he sent one Emmet to make his peace with the Earl of Bellamont, the governor of that province, who received him into his protection, in the course of which he was apprehended. Then his lordship sent an account of his proceedings to the secretary of state, desiring that he would send for the prisoners to England, as they were of too great consequence to be punished by murder, with death, and the majority of the people favoured that practice. The admiralty, by order of the lords-justices, despatched the ship Rochester to bring home the prisoners and their effects; but, after having been tossed for some time with tempests, and having been saved, the ship returned to Plymouth in a shattered condition. This incident furnished the malcontents with a colour to paint the ministry as the authors and abettors of a practical expedient to divert the public from the revenue of the public. The old East India company had complained to the regency of the capture made by Kidd in the East Indies, apprehending, as the vessel belonged to the Moors, they should be exposed to the resentment of the Mogul. In the beginning of December, this subject being brought abruptly into the House of Commons, a motion was made, That the letters patent granted to the Earl of Bellamont and others, of piracy generally, were dishonourable to the king, against the laws of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of the land, invasive of property, and destructive of trade and commerce. A warm debate ensued, in the course of which, some members declared war against the Duke of Shrewsbury, as partners in a piratical scheme; but these imputations were refuted, and the motion was rejected by a great majority. Not but they might have stigmatized the expedition as a little mean adventure, in which those nabobmen had embarked with a view to their own private advantage.

§ XXIV. While this affair was in agitation among the Commons, the attention of the upper House was employed upon the case of Dr. Watson, Bishop of St. David's. This prelate was supposed to have paid a valuable consideration for his bishopric; and, after his elevation to that dignity, he had, with a view of being reimbursed. He was accused of simony; and, after a solemn hearing before the Archbishop of Canterbury and six suffragans, convicted and deprived. Then he pleaded his innocence; and, to shew that the affair was brought into the House of Lords, in order to own him as a peer, for he had ceased to be a bishop. Thus disappointed, he had recourse to the court of delegates, by whom the archbishop's sentence was confirmed. The next effort that the Commons made in that behalf was a visit to the Illiain, with a view to the dismissal of that prelate. This was to raise a clamour against Dr. Burnet, Bishop of Siam. He was recalled in the House as a very unfit preceptor for the Duke of Gloucester, both as a Scottish man, and from the idea that his political views had been turned by order of the parliament, for asserting that William had a right to the crown from conquest. A motion was made for addressing his majesty that this prelate might be dismissed from his employment, but rejected by a great majority. Burnet had acted with uncommon integrity in accepting the trust. He had declined the office which he was in a manner forced to accept. He had offered to resign the bishopric of Siam; and, after the difficulty of a tutor would interfere with the duty of a pastor. He insisted upon the duke's residence all the summer at Windsor, which is in the diocese of Siam; and added to his private charities the whole income of his new office.

§ XV. The circumstance on which the anti-courtiers built their chief hope of distressing or disgracing the government, was the inquiry into the Irish forgeries, by which it is believed the king had distributed among his dependents. The commissioners appointed by parliament to examine these particulars, were Annesley, Trenchard, Hamilton, Langford, the Earl of Drogheda, Sir Francis Brewster, and Sir Richard Leving. The first four were actuated by all the virulence of faction; the other three were secretly guided by ministerial influence. They began their inquiry in Ireland, and proceeded with such severity as seemed to flow rather from resentment to the court, than from a love of justice and absence of corruption. They in particular scrutinized the grant of an estate which the king had made to Mrs. Villiers, now Countess of Orkney, as so to expose his majesty's partiality for that favourite, and subject him to the consequences of his action. In the course of their examination, the Earl of Drogheda, Leving, and Brewster, opposed the rest of the commissioners in divers articles of the report, which they refused to sign, and sent a letter to the king, explaining their reasons for dissenting from their colleagues. By this time, however, they were considered as hirelings of the court, and no regard was paid to their representations. The others delivered their report, declaring that a million and a half pounds was obtained of the confiscated estates; and a bill was brought in for applying them to the use of the public. A motion being made to reserve a third part for the king's disposal, it was amended; that the Commons passed an extraordinary vote, importing, that they would not receive any petition from any person whatsoever concerning the grants; and that they would consider the great services performed by the commissioners appointed the inquiry into the forfeited estates. They resolved, that the four commissioners who had signed the report had acquitted themselves with understanding, courage, and integrity; and, That Sir Richard Leving, although boundless and sedate, in the part cast upon his four colleagues, should be committed prisoner to the Tower. They afterwards came to the following resolution, which was presented to the king in form of an address: That the procuring and passing those grants were done against the law, and contrary to the heavy taxes upon the people, and highly reflected upon the king's honour; and, That the officers and instruments concerned in the same had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty. The king answered, That he was not only led by inclination, but thought himself obliged in justice to reward those who had served well in the reduction of Ireland, out of the estates forfeited to him by the rebellion in that kingdom. He observed, that as the long war had left the nation much in debt, their taking just and effectual ways for lessening that debt, and supporting public credit, was what, in his opinion, would best contribute to the security of the kingdom. This answer kindled a flame of indignation in the House. They forthwith resolved, That the adviser of it had used his utmost endeavours to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the king and his people.

§ XXVI. They proceeded, Basford, Hemming, and Basford, passed a bill of resumption. They ordered the report of the commissioners, together with the king's promise and speeches, and the former resolutions of the House touching the forfeited estates, to be added at the head of the public books. This was a high crime and misdemeanor. That justice might be close to purchasers and creditors in the act of resumption, thirteen trustees were authorized and empowered to bear and determine all claims relating to those estates; to sell them to the best purchasers; and the money arising from the sale was appropriated to pay the arrears of the army. It passed under the title of a bill for granting an aid to his majesty, by the sale of forfeited and other estates and interests in Ireland; and that it might undergo the fifth day of May, was connected with the money bill for the service of the year. In the House of Lords it produced warm debates; and some alterations were made, which the Commons unanimously rejected. They seemed to be in the habit of prevaricating, and ordered a list of the privy council to be laid before the House. The Lords demanded conferences, which served only to exasperate the two Houses against each other; for the Peers insisted upon their amendments; and the Commons were so provoked at their interfering in a money bill, that they determined to give a loose to their resentment. They ordered all the doors of their House to be shut, that no minister should go forth. Then they took into consideration the report of the Irish forfeitures, with the list of the privy councilors: and a question was moved, That an address should be made to his majesty, to remove John Lord Somers, Chancellor, and the other barons from highness's council forever. This, however, was carried in the negative by a large majority. The king was extremely chagrined at the bill, which he considered as an invasion of his prerogative, an insult on his person, and an attempt to break up the council: and at first resolved to hazard all the consequences of refusing to pass it into law: but he was diverted from his purpose by the remonstrances of the Commons, and they might be called a council after all.

Burke, Old, Monday, Colk's, Monday, M'Kean, M'Coll's, midday, Lewis's, Easter, his majesty's letter. Ralph.

Burning, Old, Monday, Colk's, Monday, M'Kean, M'Coll's, midday, Lewis's, Easter, his majesty's letter. Ralph.

The Commons resolved not to address his majesty, that no person who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highness Prince George of Denmark, should be admitted into his majesty's councils in England or Ireland. This resolution was levelled against the Earls of Portland, Albemarle, and Galway; but before the address could be presented, the king went to the House of Peers, and having passed the bill which had produced such a ferment, with some others, commanded the Earl of Bridgewater, speaker of the House, in the absence of the chancellor, who was indisposed, to propruge the parliament to the twenty-third day of May.

A.D. 1700.

In the House of Commons, the Commons having prosecuted their inquiry into the conduct of Kidd, brought in a bill for the more effectual suppressing of piracy, which passed into a law. An alias writ was directed against the House of Commons; and, in the mean time, the Commons were brought over to England; they presented an address to the king, desiring that the king might be not tried, discharged, or pardoned, till the next session of parliament: and his majesty complied with their request. Boiling still with indignation against the lord chancellor, who had turned many distressed persons out of the commission of the peace, the House ordered a bill to be prepared for qualifying justices of the peace; and appointed a committee to inspect the commission, under whose authority many dissatisfied men of small fortunes, depending on the court, were put into those places, the Commons declared in an address, that it would much conduce to the service of his majesty, and the good of this kingdom, the settlement of justice and good estates should be restored, and put into the commission of the peace and lieutenancy: and that men of small estates be neither continued, nor put into the said commission: and the payment of their salaries from his majesty; and that he would give directions accordingly. They were so mollified by this instance of his conciliating, that they thanked him in a body for his gracious answer. The bill was then referred to add the committee to sign the association, either through mistake, or want of opportunity. Having received a petition from the Lancaster clergy, complaining of the insolence and attempts of popish priests, they appointed a committee to inquire how far the laws against popish refugees had been put in execution; and upon the report, a bill was brought in, complying with the prayer of the petition. It decreed a further reward to such persons as should discover and convict popish priests and Jesuits; and perpetual imprisonment for those convicted on the oath of one or more witnesses. It enacted, That no person born after the twenty- second year of the reign of King George the first, should be capable of inheriting any title of honour or estate within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed; and, That no papist should be capable of purchasing any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, either in his own name or in the name of any other person, or in trust for him. Several alterations were made in this first draft, before it was at last shufled and sent up to the Lords, some of whom proposed amendments: these, however, were not adopted; and the bill obtained the royal assent, contrary to the expectation of those who prosecuted the measure, on the supposition that the king was a favourer of the papists. After all, the bill was deficient in necessary clauses to enforce execution; so that the law was very little regarded in the sequel.

§ XXVIII. The court sustained another insult from the old East India company, who petitioned the House that their navigation of the East Indies was a considerable part of the remaining part of the trade prescribed to them. They, at the same time, published a state of their case, in which they expatiated upon the equity of their claims, and magnified the injuries they had undergone. The new company now drew up a bill to obstruct the rest of the corrupt practices of their adversaries. But the influence of their great patron, Mr. Montague, was now vanished; the supply was not yet discussed, and the ministry had not considered the case: the bill to restrain them from the corrupt practices of their adversaries. But the influence of their great patron, Mr. Montague, was now vanished; the supply was not yet discussed, and the ministry had not considered the case: the bill to restrain them from the East Indies. The Commons, not yet satisfied with the vexations to which they had exposed their sovereign, passed a bill to appoint commissioners for taking and examining the public accounts. Another law was made to prohibit the use of India silks and stuffs which interfered with the English manufactories; a third, to take off duties on the exportation of woollen manufactures, corn, grain, meal, bread, and biscuit; and a fourth, in which provision was made for punishing governors or commanders in chief of plantations and colonies, in case they should commit any crimes or acts of injustice and oppression in the exercise of their administration.

§ XXIX. The policy of Scotland continued in violent agitation. They published a pamphlet, containing a detail of their grievances, which they in a great measure ascribed to his majesty. A complaint being preferred to the court, the king answered the charges of this petition, were referred to the baronet, and his majesty's justiciary, and was voted a false, scandalous, and treasonable libel; and ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman. The Commons addressed his majesty, to issue his royal proclamation for apprehending the author, printer, and publisher of the said libel; and he complied with their request. The Scottish company had sent up an address to the king, in behalf of some adventurers who were unwillingly detained prisoners in Carthagena; but Lord Basset Hamilton, who undertook the charge of this petition, was refused any assistance in his majesty's court, and the ministry took shelter from their solicitations behind a parliamentary inquiry. The subject of the Scottish colony being introduced into the House of Lords, the ministers, who had discoursed of the same subject, gave in evidence a distinct rumour of the king's intentions; and the ministers were answerable for the whole debate arose, not from any regard to the interest of Scotland, but from mere opposition to the court, which, however, triumphed in the issue. A motion was made, that the settlement of the Scottish colony at Darien was unconsistent with the good of the plantation trade of England; and and passed in the affirmative by a small majority. Then they presented an address, declaring themselves content with the measure. This was the general sentiment of the House; and their opinion that a prosecution of the design must end, not only in far greater disappointments to themselves, but also prove very inconvenient to the trade and quiet of the kingdom. They reminded the House of the benefits derived to both Houses, in the conveniences of the new settlement; and they expressed their approbation of the orders he had sent to the governors of the plantations on this subject. The king, in his answer to the address, in which he adhered to it, and declined to consent to the exhorting them to consider of a union between the two kingdoms as a measure, than which nothing could more contribute to their mutual security and advantage. The Lords, in pursuance of this advice, prepared a bill, appointing certain commissioners of the realm of England to treat with commissioners of Scotland for the weal of both kingdoms; but it was obstructed in the House of Commons, who were determined to throw every step that might tend To lessen the disgust or appease the animosity of the Scottish nation. The malcontents intimated, that the king's opposition to the Scottish company flowed neither from his regard to the interest of England, nor from his pœsotual observance of treaties with Spain; but solely from his attachment to the Dutch, who maintained an advantageous trade from the island of Curaçoa to the Spanish plantations in America, and were apprehensive that the Scottish company might be beneficial to the interest of this intercourse.
The pretensions served as fuel to the flame already kindled in Scotland, and industriously blown up by the calumniators of the Jacobites. Their parliament adopted the company as a motive to distraction; and that the clergy of Caithness, in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement, which the parliament would maintain and support. On account of this resolution the session was for some time discontinued: but when the Scots understood their new settlement was totally abandoned, their capital lost, and all their hopes entirely vanished, the whole nation was seized with a transport of fury. They loudly exclaimed, that they had been sacrificed and basely betrayed in that quarter whether they were entitled to protection. They conceived an address to the king, couched in a very high strain, representing the necessity of an immediate parliament. It was circulated about the kingdom for subscriptions, signed by a great number of those who sat in parliament, and presented to the king by Lord Ross, who with some others was de-poted for that purpose. The king told them, they should know his intention in Scotland; and in the mean time ad-devantage by protestation of faith. The people were exasperated at this new provocation, began to form the draft of a second national address, to be signed by the shires and boroughts of the kingdom; but, before this road could be pursued, the king wrote to the Duke of Queensberry, and the privy council of that nation, which was published for the satisfaction of the people. He professed himself grieved at the nation's loss, and willing to give what might be needful for the relief and ease of the kingdom. He assured them, he had their interest at heart; and that his good subjects should have convincing proofs of his sincere inclination to advance the wealth and prosperity of that ancient kingdom. He said he hoped this declaration would be satisfactory to all good men; that they would not suffer themselves to be misled; nor give advantage to enemies, and ill-designing persons, ready to seize every opportunity of embroiling the government. He gave notice, he understood that his personal absence had occasioned the late adjournment; but as soon as God should bring him back, their parliament should be assembled. Even this explanation, seconded by all the creeds, was not sufficient to quiet the storm raised by the national ferment, which rose to the very verge of rebellion.

§ XXX. The king, who, from his first accession to the throne, was not now convened in a capacity so much attended to as in other, according to the circumstances of his affairs, and the opposition he encountered, was at this period so incensed and embarrassed by the caprice and insolence of the Commons, that he willingly lent an ear to the leaders of the tories, who undertook to manage the parliament according to his pleasures, provided he would part with some of his ministers, who were peculiarly odious to the Commons.
The person thus adjusts himself was the Lord Chancellor Somers, the most active leader of the whig party. They demanded his dismissal, and the king exhorted him to resign his office; but he refusing to take any step that might indicate a fear of his enemies, or a concurrence of the House, this was not proceeded with for the seals by the Lord Jersey, to whom Somers delivered them without hesitation. They were successively offered to Lord Chief Justice Holt, and Trevor, the attorney-general, who were suspected and contemptuous; but neither was acceptable. Meanwhile, the king granted a temporary commission to three judges to sit in the court of chancery; and at length bestowed the seals, with the title of lord keeper, on Nathan Wright, one of the proprietors of a manor but little really qualified for the office to which he was now preferred.
Though William seemed altogether attached to the tories, and inclined to a new parliament, no person appeared to take the lead in the affairs of government; and, indeed, for some time the administration seemed to be under no particular direction.

§ XXXI. During the transactions of the last session, the negotiations for a second secret treaty had been con-ccluded in London by the French minister, Tallard, in conjunction with the Earls of Portland and Jersey, and was soon brought to perfection. On the twenty-first day of February the treaty was signed in London; and on the twenty-first of February, the king's emissaries appeared in the Hague by Brond, the French envoy, and the plenipoteniaries of the States-general. By this convention the treaty of Hyswick was confirmed. The contracting parties agreed, that, in case of the royal majesty being without a successor, and the dauphin should possess, for himself and his heirs, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the islands of St. Stephano, Porto Hercilo, Oristello, Telamone, Porto Logune, Prignano, the city and county of Enfola, of the province of Gopasca, the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, in exchange for which but the Duke of Lorraine should enjoy the duchy of Milan; but that the counties of Bische should remain in severence. But this treaty, signed by the first Angevin, duke Charles should inherit the kingdom of Spain and all its dependences in and out of Europe; but in case of his dying without issue, it should devolve to some other child of the emperor, excepting him who might succeed as emperor or King of the Romans: that this monarchy should never descend to a king of France or dauphin; and that three months should be allowed to the emperor, to consider whether or not he would accede to this treaty. Whether the French would be content to make themselves parties to this jonture, or proposed this treaty with a view to make a clandestine use of it at the court of Spain for more interested purposes, it is not easy to determine; at first, however, it was the opinion of the public, as if the parties had resolved to take no step in consequence of it, during the life of his catholic majesty.

§ XXXII. In the beginning of July the king embarked for Holland, after having appointed a regent to govern the kingdom in his absence. On the twenty-ninth day of the same month, the young Duke of Gloucester, the only remaining child of seventeen which the princes Anne had borne, died of a malignant fever, in the eleventh year of his age. His death was much lamented by the greater part of the English nation, not only on account of his promising talents and gentle behaviour, but also, as it left the succession undefined, and might create disputes of fatal consequence to the nation. The Jacobites openly expressed in an event which they imagined would remove the chief bar of the interest of the Prince of Wales; but the protestants generally turned their eyes upon the Princess Sophia, Electress of Hanover, who was created in allaying the national ferment, which rose to the very verge of rebellion.
tion. The king’s health began to decline, and even his faculties decayed apace. No person was appointed to ascend the throne when it should become vacant. The Jacobites also, in England, were embittered by the loss of their sentiment. They despatched Mr. Graham, brother of Lord Preston, to the court of St. Germain’s immediately after the death of the Duke of Gloucester: they began to bear themselves as if they were all over the kingdom. A report was spread that the Princess Anne had privately sent a message to her father; and Britain was once more threatened with civil war, confusion, anarchy, and ruin.

§ XXXIX. The new treaty between King William and the Dutch, by which they were bound to renew the war against the Spanish monarchy, obtained a great share of the public attention. The Elector of Brandenburgh, who had formed a league to crush the young King of Sweden, by invading his dominions on different sides, had been defeated. The Swedes actually entered Livonia, and undertook the siege of Riga; the King of Denmark, having demolished some forts in Holstein, the duke of which was connected with Sweden, invaded Tømningen. The Swedish minister in England demanded that assistance of William which had been stipulated in a late renewal of the ancient treaty between England and Sweden. The States of Holland were solicited to the same purpose. Accordingly, a fleet of thirty sail, English and Dutch, was sent to the Helvetic coast. Mr. Rooke, who joined the Swedish squadron, and bombarded Copenhagen, to which the Danish fleet had retired. At the same time, the Duke of Luxembourg, with the Swedish forces, which happened to be at Bremen, passed the Elbe, and landed at the further end of Holstein. The Danes immediately abandoned the siege of Tømningen; and a body of Sixons, who had made an irruption into the territories of the Duke of Brunswick, were obliged to retreat in disorder. By the mediation of William, a negociation was begun for a treaty between Sweden and Denmark, which, in order to quieten, Charles the young King of Sweden made a descent upon the Isle of Zealand. This was executed with great success. Charles was the first monarch that entered Holstein; and here he exhibited such marks of courage and conduct, far above his years, as equally astonished and intimidated his adversaries. Theo he determined to besiege Copenhagen; a resolution that struck such terror into the Danes, that they proceeded with redoubled diligence in the treaty, which was brought to a conclusion, between Denmark, Sweden, and Holstein, about the middle of August. Then the Swedes retired to Schonen, and the squadrons of the maritime powers returned from the Baltic.

§ XXXIV. When the new treaty party was communicated by the ministers of the contracting parties to the other powers of Europe, it generally received with a very unfavourable construction. Some feared that the negotiations would be embittered with their own quarrels, consequently could not give much attention to such a remote transaction. The Princes of Germany appeared cautious and dilatory in their answers, unwilling to be concerned in any plan that might excite the resentment of the House of Austria. The Elector of Brandenburgh, in particular, had set his heart upon the real dignity, which he hoped to obtain from the favour and authority of the emperor. The Italian states were averse to the partition treaty, from their apprehension of seeing France in possession of Naples, and other districts of their country. The Duke of Savoy afforded a ambiguous neutrality, in hopes of being able to barter his consent for any considerable advantages. The Swiss cantons declared seceding as guarantees. The emperor expressed his astonishment that any disposition should be made of the Spanish monarchy without the consent of the present possessor, and the states of the kingdom. He observed, that neither justice nor decorum could warrant the contracting powers to compel him, who was the rightful heir, to accept a part of his inheritance without his consent; that a motion would be freely made to share to a third person not yet named; and he declared, that he could take no final resolution, until he should know the sentiments of his catholic majesty, on an affair so important to his mutual interest was so nearly concerned. Leopold was determined, that the King of Spain, who signed a will in favour of his second son Charles; yet he took no measures to support the disposition, either by sending the archduke with a sufficient force to Spain, or by detaching troops into Italy.

§ XXXV. The people of Spain were exasperated at the insolvency of the treaty of Pavia, which they supposed a new intrigue to parcel out their dominions. Their pride took the alarm, at the prospect of their monarchy being dismembered; and their grandees repined at the thoughts of losing so many lucrative governments which they now expected. The king’s life became every day more and more precarious, from frequent returns of his disorder. The minister was weak and divided, the nobility factious, and the people discontented. The ministers of France had been alienated from the House of Austria, by the considerable and rapacious disposition of the Queen Mariana. The French had gained over to their interests the Cardinal Porto carrero, the Marquis de Monterey, with many other noblemen and persons of distinction. These, perceiving the sentiments of the people, employed their emissaries to raise a general cry that France alone could maintain the succession entire; that the House of Austria was feebile and exhausted, and any prince of that line must owe his chief support to detestable heretics. Porto carrero tampered with the weakness of his sovereign. He repeated and exaggerated all the suggestions: he advised him to consult Pope Innocent XII. for support on this momentous point of regulating the succession. That pontiff, in orature of France, having taken the advice of a college of cardinals, determined that the renunciation of Marie Theresa was invalid and null, as being founded upon compulsion, and contrary to the fundamental laws of the kingdom of Spain. He, therefore, exhorted Charles to contribute to the propagation of the faith, and the repose of Christendom, by making a new will in favour of a grandson of the French monarchy. This edict was seceded by the representatives of Porto carrero; and the weak prince complied with the proposal. In the mean time, the King of France seemed to act hastily, as a principal in the treaty of partition. His ministers at foreign courts co-operated with each other in their collections of information upon the different potentates in Europe. When Count Zinzendorf, the imperial ambassador at Paris, presented a memorial desiring to know what part France would act, should the King of Spain voluntarily place a grandson of Louis the fourteenth upon the throne, the Marquis de Torcy answered in writing, that his most christian majesty would by no means listen to such a proposal: nay, when the emperor’s minister gave them to understand that his master was ready to enter into a separate negociation with the Court of Versailles, touching the Spanish succession, Louis declared he could not treat on that subject without the concurrence of his allies.

§ XXXVI. The nature of the partition treaty was no sooner known in the kingdom of France, than it was at once pronounced to be a prejudicial to the interest of England. All the arguments were trumpeted by the malcontents, so that the whole kingdom echoed with the clamour of disaffection. Sir Christopher Musgrave, and others of the Tory faction, began to think in earnest of establishing the succession of the English crown upon the person of the Prince of Wales. They are said to have sent over Mr. Graham to St. Germain’s with an offer of composition to this purpose, and an assurance of the base and heartless dispositions of the House of Spain, in order to pass a vote that the crown should not be supported in the execution of the partition treaty. King William was not ignorant of the censure he had undergone, and not a little alarmed to find himself so unpopular among his own subjects. That he might anticipate the effect of the attention effectually upon the affairs of England, he resolved to take some measures for the satisfaction of the Scottish nation. He permitted the parliament of that kingdom to meet on the twenty-eighth day of October, and wrote a letter to them from his house at Lou, containing his assurance that he would not take any thing that could be reasonably proposed for maintaining and advancing the peace and welfare of their kingdom. He promised to give his royal assent to such acts as they should frame for the better establishment of the presbyterian discipline, for preventing the growth of papacy, suppressing vice and immorality, encouraging piety and virtue, preserving and securing personal liberty, regulating and advancing trade, retrieving the losses and promoting the interest of their African colonies, and those of their companies. He expressed his conviction that he could not assert the company's right of establishing a colony at Barren, without disturbing the peace of Christendom, and entailing a ruinous war on that ancient kingdom. He recommended unanimity and dispatch in raising competent taxes for their own defence; and told them he had thought fit to continue the Duke of Queensberry in the office of high-commissioner. Notwithstanding this soothing address, the national resentment continued to rage, and the parliament seemed altogether intractable. By this time the company had received certain tidings of the entire surrender of their settlement; and at the close of the session they represented to the parliament, that for want of due protection abroad, some persons had been encouraged to break in upon their privileges even at home. This remonstrance was succeeded by another national address to the king, who told them he could not comply any further, since the parliament was now assembled; and he had already made a declaration with which he hoped all his faithful subjects would be satisfied. Nevertheless, he found it absolutely necessary to practise other expedients for allaying the ferment of that nation. His ministers and their agents bestowed themselves so successfully, that the heats in parliament were entirely cooled, and the outery of the people subsided into unwavering murmurs. The parliament, with some solicitude, on the consideration of their great delinquency by his majesty, and as, next under God, their safety and happiness wholly depended on his preservation and that of his government, they would support both to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces as should be requisite for those ends. They passed an act for keeping on foot three thousand men for two years, to be maintained by a land-tax. Then the commissioner produced the king's letter, desiring to have eleven hundred men on his own account to the first day of June following: they forthwith complied with his request, and were prorogued to the sixth of May. The supernumerary troops were sent over by the States-general; and this archduke was honour'd with the title of duke, as a recompence for having concurred with the commissioners in managing the session of parliament.

§ XXXVII. King William had returned to England on the eighteenth day of October, not a little elusenred at the perplexities in which he found himself involved; and in the beginning of the next month he received advice that the King of Spain was actually dead. He could not be surprised at this event, which had been so long expected; but it was attended with a circumstance which he had not foreseen. Charles, by his last will, had declared the Duke of Anjou, second son of the dauphin, the sole heir of the Spanish monarchy. In case this prince should die without issue, or inherit the crown of France, he willed that Spain should devolve to the Duke of Berry; in default of him, and children, to the Archduke Charles and his heirs, failing of whom, to the Duke of Parma and his posterity. He likewise recommended a match between the Duke of Anjou and one of the archduchesses. When this testament was first notified to the French court, Louis seemed to hesitate between his inclination and engagement. He came to the same resolution as James and the States-general. Madame de Maintenon is said to have joined her influence to that of the dauphin, in persuading the king to accept the will; and Pontchartrain was engaged to support the same inclination. For the present, however, the council was content to divide the real effects of the monarchy. The rest of the ministry declared for the treaty of partition; the king affected a kind of neutrality. The dauphin spoke for his son, with an air of resolution he had never assumed before; Pontchartrain seconded his argument: Madame de Maintenon asked what the Duke of Anjou had done to provoke the king, that he should be barred of every thing that was his by right. Louis answered, nothing could be more reasonable in a council, for preventing the growth of papacy, suppressing vice and immorality, encouraging piety and virtue, preserving and securing personal liberty, regulating and advancing trade, retrieving the losses and promoting the interest of their African colonies, and those of their companies. He expressed his conviction that he could not assert the company's right of establishing a colony at Barren, without disturbing the peace of Christendom, and entailing a ruinous war on that ancient kingdom. He recommended unanimity and dispatch in raising competent taxes for their own defence; and told them he had thought fit to continue the Duke of Queensberry in the office of high-commissioner. Notwithstanding this soothing address, the national resentment continued to rage, and the parliament seemed altogether intractable. By this time the company had received certain tidings of the entire surrender of their settlement; and at the close of the session they represented to the parliament, that for want of due protection abroad, some persons had been encouraged to break in upon their privileges even at home. This remonstrance was succeeded by another national address to the king, who told them he could not comply any further, since the parliament was now assembled; and he had already made a declaration with which he hoped all his faithful subjects would be satisfied. Nevertheless, he found it absolutely necessary to practise other expedients for allaying the ferment of that nation. His ministers and their agents bestowed themselves so successfully, that the heats in parliament were entirely cooled, and the outery of the people subsided into unwavering murmurs. The parliament, with some solicitude, on the consideration of their great delinquency by his majesty, and as, next under God, their safety and happiness wholly depended on his preservation and that of his government, they would support both to the utmost of their power, and maintain such forces as should be requisite for those ends. They passed an act for keeping on foot three thousand men for two years, to be maintained by a land-tax. Then the commissioner produced the king's letter, desiring to have eleven hundred men on his own account to the first day of June following: they forthwith complied with his request, and were prorogued to the sixth of May. The supernumerary troops were sent over by the States-general; and this archduke was honour'd with the title of duke, as a recompence for having concurred with the commissioners in managing the session of parliament.

§ XXXVIII. When the will was accepted, the French minister, de Turcy, endeavoured to justify his master's conduct to the Earl of Mancheater, who resided at Paris in the character of ambassador from the court of London. He urged the necessity and propriety of the king's resolution, and the answer for which it had been communicated: That the emperor had refused to accede: That it was relished by none of the princes to whom it had been communicated: That the people of England and Holland had expressed their discontent at the prospect of France's being in possession of Naples and Sicily: That if Louis had rejected the will, the archduke would have had a double title derived from the former will, and that of the latter: That the Spaniards were so averse to the division of their monarchy, there would be a necessity for conquering the whole kingdom before the treaty could be executed: That the ships to be furnished by Great Britain and Holland would not be sufficient for the purposes of such a war; and it was doubtful whether England and the States-general would engage themselves in a greater expense. He concluded with saying, That the treaty would have been more advantageous to France than the will, which the king accepted purely from a desire of preserving the peace of Europe. His master hoped, therefore, that a good understanding would subsist between him and the king of Parma: and in the same letter was expressed an intention to be actuated by the same principles as he was actuated by: That he would be guided by the advice of his council; and that in the case of any collision with the Council of ministers, he would communicate it to the French court. This was according to the custom of the ministers of France and the States-general, who only depart from the words, that he might the better adhere to the spirit of the treaty.

§ XXXIX. With this answer he sent a letter to the States, giving them the intelligence that the king of Spain was no longer to be considered as the master of his kingdom, as he had not appeared at the court of Madrid, stipulated by the will of his grandson, that he did not doubt their approbation of his succession to the Spanish crown. The States observed, That they could not declare themselves pleased upon the subject, and that the case was now become one of negotiation between their respective provinces. Louis admitted the excuse, and assured them of his readiness to concur with whatever they should desire for the security of the Spanish crown. The next day the minister of foreign affairs was sent to the States, who presented them with a letter from his new master, who likewise notified his accession to all the powers of Europe, except the King of England. The emperor loudly exclaimed against the will, as being more iniquitous than the treaty of partition; and threatened to do himself justice by force of arms. The Spaniards apprehending that a league would be formed between his imperial majesty and the maritime powers, for setting aside the successors of Ferdinand and his issue, and conscious of his inability to defend their dominions, resigned themselves entirely to the protection of the French monarch. The towns in the Spanish Netherlands and the duchy of Milan admitted French garrisons; a French squadron occupied the port of Cadiz; and another was detached to the Spanish settlements in the West Indies. Part of the Dutch army that was quartered in Luxembourg, Mons, and Namur, were moved to Antwerp, on the turn of the King of Spain, whom their masters had not yet acknowledged. The States were overwhelmed with consternation by this event, especially when they considered their own naked situation, and reflected that the Spanish garrisons might fall upon them before they could assemble a body of troops for their defence. The danger was so imminent, that they resolved to acknowledge the King of Spain without further hesitation, and wrote a letter to the French king for peace and friendship. It was not sooner received, than orders were issued for sending back their battalions.

§ XI. How warmly sooner King William resented the conduct of the French king, in accepting the will so disadvantageous to his people, as was so often insisted upon his new ministry. He now seemed to resume his chief confidence in the Earl of Rochester, whom he had undertaken for the tonics, and was declared Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Lord Rochester being at that time minister of the treasury, Lord Tankerville succeeded Lord Lovelace, lately deceased, as keeper of the privy seal, and Sir Charles Hedges was declared secretary of state, in the room of the Earl of Jersey; but the management of the Commons was intrusted to Mr. Robert Harley, who had hitherto opposed the measures of the court with equal virulence and ability. These new undertakers, well knowing they should find it very difficult, if not impossible, to secure a majority in the house of commons in order to carry their bills, and were afraid of being rendered impossible of passage, it was resolved to dissolve it by proclamation; then the sheriffs were changed according to their nomination, and writs issued for a new parliament to meet on the sixth day of February, 1720. This was thought an ill-timed day for the conclusion of peace with France, as ambassador from the emperor, to explain Leopold's tute to the Spanish monarch, supported by repeated entreaties and representations, confirmed in the most solemn treaties. This minister met with a very cold reception from those who stood at the helm of affairs. They sought to avoid all connexions that might engage their country as a principal in another war upon the continent; snarling as they were from the losses and encumbrances which the last had imputed upon them and their posterity.

They seemed to think that Louis, rather than involve himself in fresh troubles, would give all the security that could be desired for maintaining the peace of Europe; or even, should this be refused, he was willing to reason his Britannia's exhausting her wealth and strength to support a chimerical balance, in which her interest was but remotely concerned. It was their opinion, that, by keeping aloof, she might render herself more respectable. Her reserve would overawe contending powers: they would in their turn sue for her assistance, and improve her good offices; and, instead of declaring herself a party, she would have the honour to decide as arbiter of their disputes. Perhaps they extended this idea too far; and in all probability, their notions were inflated by a spirit of faction. They hated the wags as their political adversaries, and detested the war, because it had been countenanced and supported by the interests of that party. The conjuncton of the two monarchs of France and Spain would prove fatal to the liberties of Europe; and that this could not be prevented by any other method than a general union of the other European powers. He certainly was an enthusiast in this argument, and fully convinced that he himself, of all the potentates in Christendom, was the only prince capable of adjusting the balance. The imperial ambassador could not, therefore, he long upon this purpose, as he conversed with the Dutch favourites, who knew and approved of their master's design, though he avoided a declaration, until he should have rendered his ministers more propitious to his aim. The true secret, however, of that reserve with which Count Wratislaw was treated at his first arrival, was a private negociation which the king had set on foot with the regency of Spain, touching a barrier in the Netherlands. He proposed, that certain towns should be garrisoned with English and Dutch troops, by way of security against the ambitious designs of France; but the regency were so devoted to the French interest, that they refused to listen to any proposal of this nature. While this affair was in agitation, Sir William's residence, for which the ambassador maintained a wary distance from the emperor; and, when his effort miscarried, the ambassador found him much more open and accessible.

§ XII. The parliament meeting on the sixth, was pro¬ gaged to the tenth day of February, when Mr. Harley was chosen speaker by a great majority in opposition to Sir Richard Oswald. The king had previously told Sir Thomas Gladstone, that he would be for his own part, that he should yield his pretensions to Harley at this juncture; and that gentleman agreed to absent himself from the House on the day of election. The king observed, in his speech, that the nation's loss, in the death of the Duke of Gloucester, had been so severely felt by the ministry, as to make further provision for the succession of the crown in the Protestant line: that the death of the King of Spain had made such an alteration in the affairs of the continent, as required their mature deliberation. The rest of his harangue turned upon the usual topics of demanding supplies for the ensuing year, remitting them of the deficiencies and public debts, recommending to their inquiry the state of the navy and fortifications, exhorting them to encourage every plan that would employ the poor, and to decline with vigour and unanimity in all their deliberations. Though the elections had been generally carried in favour of the Tory interest, the ministry had secured but one part of the commons, and in that they were compelled to make further provision for the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, as the Duke of Leeds, the Marquis of Normandy, the Earls of Nottingham, Seymour, Musgrave, How, Finch, and Shrewsby, had been either neglected, or found refractory, and resolved to oppose the court measures with all their influence. Besides, the French king, knowing that the peace of Europe would in a great measure depend upon the resolutions of the English parliament, is said to have distributed great sums of money in England, by means of his minister Tallard, in order to strengthen the opposition in the House of Commons. Certain it is, the nation abounded at this period with the French coins called Louis-d'or and pistoles; but whether this redundancy was owing to a below of trade in favour of England, or to the largesse of Louis, we shall not pretend to determine. We may likewise observe, that the infamous practice of bribing electors had never been so flagrant as in the choice of representatives for this parliament, and that scandalous traffic had been chiefly carried on by the whig party, and, therefore, their antagonists resolved to spare no pains in detecting their corruption. Sir Edward Seymour distinguished himself by his zeal and activity; he brought some of these practices to light, and, in particular, stigmatized the new East India company, for having been deeply concerned in this species of venality. An inquiry being set on, a report was made to the House, that certain of the directors were declared void; and divers persons who had been illegally returned, were first expelled the House, and afterwards detained in prison. Yet these prosecutions were carried on with such partiality, as plainly indicated the connexion of the judges with the party in power. A considerable majority, had not one bold and lively expression given such a turn to the debate, as induced the misconducters to desist. One Mr. Morenet, in the heat of his declamation against this measure, said, he expected the next vote would be for owning the pretended Prince of Wales. Though there was little or no connexion between these two subjects, a great many members were startled at the information, and deserted the measure, which was dropped accordingly. The king's speech being taken into consideration, the House resolved to support his majesty and his government; to take such effectual measures as might best conduce to the interest and safety of England, and the preservation of the Protestant religion. This resolution was presented in an address to the king, who received it favourably. At the same time, he laid before them a memorial he had received from the States-general, and desirous of opening a correspondence with them, that he might stipulate the necessary conditions for securing the peace of Europe; and that they were firmly resolved to do nothing without the concurrence of his majesty and their other allies. They therefore begged he would send a minister to the Hague, with full powers and instructions to enter into a negotiation with them in this negotiation; they told him that, in case it should prove ineffectual, or Holland be suddenly invaded by the troops which Louis had ordered to advance towards their frontiers, they relied on the assistance of England, and hoped his majesty would prepare the succours stipulated by treaty, to be used, should occasion require. The memorial was likewise communicated to the House of Lords. Meanwhile, the Commons desired that the treaties between England and the States-general should be laid before the House. These being persued, they resolved upon an address, to desire his majesty would enter into a negotiation with the States-general, and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to the mutual safety of Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to the preservation of the peace of Europe, and to assure him of their support and assistance, in performance of the treaty subsisting between England and the States-general. This resolution, however, was not carried without great opposition from those who were averse to the nation's involving itself in another war upon the continent. The king professed himself extremely well pleased with this address, and told them he would immediately order his ministers abroad to act in concert with the States-general and other powers, for the attainment of those ends then proposed.

§ XI. He communicated to the Commons a letter written by the Earl of Melfort to his brother the Earl of Perth, governor to the pretended Prince of Wales. It had been intercepted by accident, and came to London in the French mail. It contained a scheme for another invasion of England, together with some reflections on the character of the Earl of Middleton, who had supplanted him at the court of St. German. Melfort was a mere projector, and in this letter, besides saying nothing of recommending himself to King James, and bringing his rival into disgrace. The House of Lords, to whom the letter was also imparted, ordered it to be printed. Next day the bill for the subscription of the king for the care of the protestant religion; desiring all the treaties made since the last war might be laid before them; requesting him to engage in such alliances as he should think proper for preserving the balance of power in Europe; assuring him of their concurrence, expressing their acknowledgment for his having communicated Melfort's letter; desiring him in the meantime to provide for the removal and safe conduct of arms and persons of disaffected persons; for removing papists from London; and for searching after those arms and provisions of war mentioned in the letter: finally, they requested him to equip speedily a sufficient fleet for the defence of his majesty, and from the king's house his gracious answer to this address, which was a further encouragement to the king to put his own private designs in execution; towards the same end the letter contributed not a little, by giving the fears and resentment of the nation against France, which in vain declared the Earl of Melfort a fantastical schemer, to whom no regard was paid at the court of Versailles. The French ministry complained of the publication of this letter, as an attempt to sow jealousy between the two crowns; and, as a convincing proof of their sincerity, banished the Earl of Melfort to Angers.

§ XI. The credit of exchequer-bills was so lowered by the charge of the ministry, and the lapse of the time allotted for their circulation, that they fell near twenty per cent. to the prejudice of the revenue, and the discredit of the government in foreign countries. The Commons proposed that this deficiency should be made up by the following resolution should be made from time to time for making good the principal and interest due on all parliamentary funds; and afterwards pass a bill for renewing the bills of credit, with a testimonial to the king, and a declaration to the Lords on the sixth day of March, and on the thirteenth received the royal assent. The next object that engrossed the attention of the Commons was the settlement of the succession to the throne, which the king had recommended to their consideration in the beginning of the session. Having deliberated on this subject they resolved, that for the preservation of the peace and happiness of the kingdom, and the security of the protestant religion, it was absolutely necessary to co-operate with them in this negotiation; they told him that, in case it should prove ineffectual, or Holland be suddenly invaded by the troops which Louis had ordered to advance towards their frontiers, they relied on the assistance of England, and hoped his majesty would prepare the succours stipulated by treaty, to be used, should occasion require. The memorial was likewise communicated to the House of Lords. Meanwhile, the Commons desired that the treaties between England and the States-general should be laid before the House. These being persued, they resolved upon an address, to desire his majesty would enter into a negotiation with the States-general, and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to the mutual safety of Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to the preservation of the peace of Europe, and to assure him of their support and assistance, in performance of the treaty subsisting between England and the States-general. This resolution, however, was not carried without great opposition from those who were averse to the nation's involving itself in another war upon the continent. The king professed himself extremely well pleased with this address, and told them he would immediately order his ministers abroad to act in concert with the States-general and other powers, for the attainment of those ends then proposed.

§ XI. He communicated to the Commons a letter written by the Earl of Melfort to his brother the Earl of Perth, governor to the pretended Prince of Wales. It had been intercepted by accident, and came to London in the French mail. It contained a scheme for another invasion of England, together with some reflections on the character of the Earl of Middleton, who had supplanted him at the court of St. German. Melfort was a mere projector, and in this letter, besides saying nothing of recommending himself to King James, and bringing his rival into disgrace. The House of Lords, to whom the letter was also imparted, ordered it to be printed. Next day the bill for the subscription of the king for the care of the protestant religion; desiring all the treaties made since the last war might be laid before them; requesting him to engage in such alliances as he should
and their salaries ascertained and established: but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament, it may be lawful to remove them: That no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in Parliament. Having settled these points, they resolved, That the princess Sophia, Duchess Dowager of Hanover, be declared the next in succession to the crown of England, in the protestant line, after his majesty and the present king. This resolution was opposed to the present party, and, That the further limitation of the crown be to the said Princess Sophia and the heirs of her body, being protestants. A bill being formed on these resolutions, was sent up to the Lords, who would not withdraw it, and would not give a vote from the Marquis of Normandy: a protest was likewise entered against it by the Earls of Huntington and Plymouth, and the Lords Guilford and Jeffries. Nevertheless, it passed without amendments, and on the twelfth day of June received the royal assent: the king was extremely mortified at the preliminary limitations, which he considered as an open insult on his own conduct and administration: not but that they were necessary precautions, naturally suggested by the experience of those evils to which the nation had been already exposed, in consequence of raising a foreign prince to the throne of England. As the stories lay under the imputation of favouring the late king's interest, the party which supported him made this occasion, to wipe off the aspersions, and insinuate themselves into the confidence of the people; hoping, that in the sequel they should be able to restrain the nation from entertaining such fears, as they had created themselves against the Protestant succession, without incurring the evil consequences apprehended. The act of settlement being passed, the Earl of Macclesfield was sent to notify the transaction to the Electress Sophia, who likewise received from his hands the royal commission.

§ XLVI. The act of succession gave umbrage to all the puppy princes who were more nearly related to the crown than this lady, whom the parliament had preferred to all others. Their attempts to interest their Prince Charles I by her mother, ordered her ambassador, Count Maffei, to make a protestation to the parliament of England, in her name, against all resolutions and decisions contrary to her title, as sole daughter to the Princess Anna, next in succession to the crown of England, after King William and the Princess Anne of Denmark. Two copies of this protest Maffei sent in letters to the lord-keeper and the speaker of the lower House, by two of his generals, who had no power to give them any answer, as no notice was taken of the declaration. The Duke of Savoy, while his minister was thus employed in England, engaged in an alliance with the crowns of France and Spain, that he might have an ally for his own designs, and should expose his youngest daughter without a dowry. That he himself should command the allied army in Italy, and furnish eight thousand infantry, with five-and-twenty hundred horse, in consideration of a monthly subsidy of fifty thousand crowns.

§ XLVII. During these transactions, Mr. Stanhope, envoy extraordinary to the States-general, was empowered to treat with the ministers of France and Spain, according to the addresses of both Houses of Parliament. He represented, that though his most christian majesty had thought fit to derive from the partition treaty, it was not reasonable that the King of England should lose the effect of that conference. Nor had his majesty any intention out of the power of the treaty. But for that purpose insisted upon certain articles, importing, that the French king should immediately withdraw his troops from the Spanish Netherlands: that, for the security of England, the cities of Ostend and Neckport should be delivered into the hands of his Britannic majesty: that no kingdom, provinces, cities, lands, or places, belonging to the crown of Spain, should ever be yielded, or ceded, to the present prince or any of his heirs: that the parity whatever: that the subjects of his Britannic majesty should retain all the privileges, rights, and immunities, with regard to their navigation and commerce in the dependencies of Spain. He was engaged at the death of his late catholic majesty; and all his rights, liberties, immunities, and franchises, as the subjects of France, or any other power, either possess for the present, or may enjoy for the future: that all treaties of peace and conventions between England and Spain should be renewed; and, that a treaty formed on these demands should be guaranteed by such powers as one or other of the contractors should solicit and prevail upon to accede. Such likewise were the proposals made by the States-general, with this difference, that they demanded, as cautionary towns, all the strongest places in the Netherlands. Count D'Avax, the French minister, said he was so engaged with the demands, that he could not help saying, They could not have been harder, if his master had lost four successive battles. He assured them, that his most christian majesty would not be so easy a sexton, as soon as the King of Spain should have forces of his own sufficient to guard the country: with respect to the other articles, he could give no other answer, but that he would immediately transmit them to Versailles. Louis was filled with indignation at the insolent strum of those proposals, which he considered as a sure mark of William's hostile intentions. He refused to give any other security for the peace of Europe, than a renewal of the treaty of Wissick; and he is said to have tampered, by means of his agents and emissaries, with the members of the English parliament, that they might oppose all steps tending to a new war on the continent.

§ XLVII. King William certainly had no expectation that France would close with such proposals; but he was not without hope, that her refusal would warm the English nation into a concurrence with his designs. He commanded Count de Bussy, the French minister at the Hague, which had been made by him and the States-general; and by them to understand, that he would from time to time make them acquainted with the progress of the negotiation. The Commons, suspecting that his intention was to make them parties in a negociation to which they had not had a different end from that which they proposed, resolved to signify their sentiments in the answer to this message. They called for the treaty of partition, which being read, they voted an address to his majesty, in which they disapproved of most gracious declaration, that he would make them acquainted with the progress of the negociation: but they signified their disapprobation of the partition treaty, signed with the great seal of England, without the advice of the parliament, which was then sitting, and productive of all consequences to the kingdom, as well as to the peace of Europe, as it assumed over to the French king such a large portion of the Spanish dominion. Nothing could be more mortifying to the king than this open attack on his own conduct: yet he suppressed his resentment, and without taking the least notice of their sentiments with respect to the partition treaty, assured them, that he should never betray their advice; and in the business on which he had set foot, according to their desire. The debates in the House of Commons upon the subject of the partition treaty rose to such violence, that divers members in declaring against it, transmitted the bounds of decency. Sir Edward Seymour compared the division which had been made of the Spanish territories to a robbery on the highway; and Mr. Howe did not scruple to say it was a felonious treaty: an expression which the king resented to such a degree, that he declared he would have demanded personal satisfaction with his sword, had he not been restrained by the disparity of condition between himself and the person who had offered such an outrageous insult to his honour: when he called it a conspiracy of all the minds of the nation from all foreign connexions, or to wreak their vengeance on the late ministers, whom they hated as the chiefs of the whig party, certain it is, they now raised a universal outcry against the partition treaty, which was not only condemned in public pamphlets and private conversation, but even brought into the House of Lords as an object of parliamentary censure. In the middle of the month of March, a petition on this subject was begun by Sheffield Marquis of Normandy, and carried on with great vehement by other noblemen of the same faction. They exclaimed against the article by which so many territories were added to the crown of France: they complained that the emperor had not acceded: that the treaty was not communicated to the privy council or ministry, but clandestinely transacted by the Earls of Portland and Jersey: that the sanction of the great seal had been unjustly and irregularly applied, first to blank powers, and afterwards to the treaty itself. The courtiers replied, that the king had engaged in a treaty of partition at the desire of the emperor, who had agreed to every article, except that relating to the duchy of Milan, and afterwards desired, that his majesty would procure for him the best terms he could, on all the points of finding security, that he might not forfeit his interest in Spain, by seeming to consent to the treaty: that foreign negociations being intrusted to the care of the crown, the king lay under no legal obligation to communicate such secrets of state to his courtiers; and that he desired of her advice, and that the keeper of the great seal had no authority for refusing to apply it to any powers or treaty which the king should grant or conclude, unless they were contrary to law, which had made no provision for such emergency.

The Earl of Portland apprehending that this tempest would burst upon his head, declared on the second day of the debate, that he had by the king's order communicated the treaty, before it was concluded, to the Earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the Lords Lonsdale, Somers, Hallifax, and Secretary Vernon. These noblemen owned, that they had been acquainted with the substance of the negociations, when they exchanged some particular; they were told, his majesty had carried the matter as far as it could be advanced, and that he could obtain no better terms; thus assured that every article was already settled, they said no longer insisted upon particular, but gave the king full power to engage himself and the crown of England in any measure that would produce a new war, seeing the nation had been so uneasy under the last. After long debates, and great variety as well of violence of altercation, the House agreed to an address, in which they disapproved of the partition treaty, as a scheme inconsistent with the peace and safety of Europe, as well as prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain. They complained, that neither the negotiations given to his placitaments, nor the draft of the treaty itself, had been laid before his majesty's council. They humbly besought him that, for the future, he would in all matters of importance, require and admit the advice of his council, to the subjects of his throne, and foreigner, and that he would constitute a council of such persons, to whom he might impart all affairs which should in any way concern him and his dominions. They observed, that interest and natural affections to their country would incline them to every measure that might tend to its welfare and prosperity; whereas strangers could not be so much influenced by these considerations: that their knowledge of the empire should render them more capable than foreigners could be of advising his majesty touching the true interests of his kingdom: that they had exhibited such repeated demonstrations of their duty and affection, as must establish them in the real trust and confidence; nor could they want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in all his secret and arduous affairs: finally, as the French king appeared to have violated the treaty of partition, they advised his majesty, in future negociations with that prince, to proceed with such caution as might imply a real security.

§ XLVIII. The king received this severe remonstrance with his usual phlegm; saying, it contained matter of very great moment: and he would take care that all treaties he made should be for the honour and safety of England. Though he deeply felt this affront, he would not alter his conduct towards the new ministers: but he plainly perceived their intention was to thwart him in his favourite measure, and humbly put himself into a dependence upon their interest in parliament. On the last day of March, he imparted to the Commons the French king's declaration, that he would grant no other support but the seal of the crown to the treaty of Lysanes; so that the negotiation seemed to be at an end. He likewise communicated two resolutions of the States-general, with a memorial from their envoy in England, relating to the ships they had equipped with a view to join the English fleet, and the succours stipulated, in the treaty concluded in the year 1677, which they desired might be sent over with all convenient expedition. The House having considered this message, unanimously resolved to desire his majesty would carry on the negociations in concert with the States-general, and take such measures therein as might most conduct to their safety: they assured him, they would effectually conciliate the emperor, and by the treaty of 1677, by which England was bound to assist them with ten thousand men, and twenty ships of war, in case they should be attacked. Though the king was nettled at that part of this address, which, by confining him to one treaty, implied his desertion of his friends, he could not, after the show of his adherence, and that the keeper of the great seal had no authority for refusing to apply it to any powers or treaty which the king should grant or conclude, unless they were contrary to law, which had made no provision for such emergency.

The Earl of Pembroke apprehending that this tempest would burst upon his head, declared on the second day of the debate, that he had by the king's order communicated the treaty, before it was concluded, to the Earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the Lords Lonsdale, Somers, Hallifax, and Secretary Vernon. These noblemen owned, that they had been acquainted with the substance of the negociations, when they exchanged some particular; they were told, his majesty had carried the matter as far as it could be advanced, and that he could obtain no better terms; thus assured that every article was already settled, they said no longer insisted upon particular, but gave the king full power to engage himself and the crown of England in any measure that would produce a new war, seeing the nation had been so uneasy under the last. After long debates, and great variety as well of violence of altercation, the House agreed to an address, in which they disapproved of the partition treaty, as a scheme inconsistent with the peace and safety of Europe, as well as prejudicial to the interest of Great Britain. They complained, that neither the negotiations given to his placitaments, nor the draft of the treaty itself, had been laid before his majesty's council. They humbly besought him that, for the future, he would in all matters of importance, require and admit the advice of his council, to the subjects of his throne, and foreigner, and that he would constitute a council of such persons, to whom he might impart all affairs which should in any way concern him and his dominions. They observed, that interest and natural affections to their country would incline them to every measure that might tend to its welfare and prosperity; whereas strangers could not be so much influenced by these considerations: that their knowledge of the empire should render them more capable than foreigners could be of advising his majesty touching the true interests of his kingdom: that they had exhibited such repeated demonstrations of their duty and affection, as must establish them in the real trust and confidence; nor could they want the knowledge of persons fit to be employed in all his secret and arduous affairs: finally, as the French king appeared to have violated the treaty of partition, they advised his majesty, in future negociations with that prince, to proceed with such caution as might imply a real security.

§ XLIX. The French king consented to a renewal of the negociations at the Hague; but, in the mean time, tampered with the Dutch deputies, to engage them in a separate treaty. Finding them determined to act in concert with the King of England, he protracted the conferences, in order to gain time, while he erected fortifications, and drew lines on the frontier. On the hundredth day of April, the Marquis de Torcy delivered to the Earl of Manchester, at Paris, a letter from the new king of Spain to his Bourbon majesty, inviting his accession to that throne, and expressing a desire of cultivating a mutual friendship with the king and crown of England. How severe soever William might have been to any correspondence of this sort, the Earl of Rochester and the new ministers imperturbed; they wrote to the Marquis de Torcy, that he be at length composed with their entreaties, and wrote a civil answer to his most catholic majesty. This was a very alarming incident to the emperor, who was bent upon a war, and by having made peace with France, who had concluded to send Prince Eugene with twenty thousand men, to the assistance of the duchy of Milan, as a sieve of the empire. The new Pope, Clement XI. who had succeeded to the papacy in the preceding year, was attached to the French interest: the Vicar Apostolic was a friend of the emperor, but they refused to declare themselves at this juncture.

The French king was not only to be respected, but likewise to be feared, a very loud reply. "He hoped no man in England need be afraid of the French king; much less the peer who spoke last, who was too much a friend to that monarch to fear any thing from his remembrance."
kingsdom and allies had been exposed, were chiefly owing to the fatal counsels that prevented his majesty's sooner meeting his people in parliament.

That whereby large territories of the Houses could not but be very agreeable to the king, who expressed his satisfaction in his answer to each part. They were the more remarkable, as at this very time considerable progress was made in a treaty of partition. That division, therefore, from the tenour of their former conduct, could be owing to no other motive than a sense of their own danger, and resentment against France, which, even during the negociation, had been secretly employed in making carriers of the French to cross the States in general. The Commons having expressed their sentiments on this subject, resumed the consideration of the partition treaty. They had appointed a committee to examine the journals of the House of Lords, and to report their proceedings in relation to the treaty of partition. When the report was made by Sir Edward Seymour, the House resolved itself into a committee, to consider the state of the nation: after warm debates they resolved, That William Earl of Portland, by negociating and concluding the treaty of partition, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. They ordered Sir John Leveson Gower to impeach him at the bar of the House of Lords; and no particular reason was so necessary at that impeachment. Thence, in a conference with the Lords, they desired to know the particulars of what had passed between the Earl of Portland and Secretary Vernon, in relation to the partition treaty; also, and a violation of the two articles they had obtained concerning negociations or treaties of partition of the Spanish monarchy. The Lords demurring to this demand, the lower House resolved to address the king, that copies of both treaties of partitions, together with all the powers and instructions for negotiating those treaties, should be laid before them. The copies were accordingly produced, and the Lords sent down to the Commons two papers, containing the powers granted to the Earls of Portland and Jewson to carry on the negociation, and a detail of what they had obtained concerning negociations or treaties of partition of the Spanish monarchy. The Lords demanding to this demand, the lower House resolved to address the king, that copies of both treaties of partitions, together with all the powers and instructions for negotiating those treaties, should be laid before them. The copies were accordingly produced, and the Lords sent down to the Commons two papers, containing the powers granted to the Earls of Portland and Jewson to carry on the negociation, and a detail of what they had obtained concerning negociations or treaties of partition of the Spanish monarchy. The Lords demanding to this demand, the lower House resolved to address the king, that copies of both treaties of partitions, together with all the powers and instructions for negotiating those treaties, should be laid before them.

§ Li. Lord Somers, understanding that he was accused to the House of Commons of having consented to the treaty of partition, desired that he might be admitted and heard in his own defence. His request being granted, he told the House, that when he received the king's letter containing the treaty, with an order to conciliate the necessary powers in the most secret manner, he thought it would have been taking too much upon him to put a stop to a treaty of such consequence, when the life of the King of Spain was so precarious; for had the king died before the treaty was finished, and he been blamed for delaying the necessary powers, he could not have justified his own conduct, since the king's letter was really a warrant for effect for his majesty's own safety. He then stated, that, as Lord Somers, he had entertained no confidence in the conduct of the king, having applied to his majesty, objecting to several particulars in the treaty, and proposing other articles which he thought were for the interest of his country; that he thought himself bound to put a great seal to the treaty when it was concluded: that as Lord Somers he had been employed for the king, and as chancellor, executed his office according to his duty. After he had withdrawn, his justification gave rise to a long debate, which ended in a resolution carried by a majority of seven voices, That John Lord Somers, by advising his majesty to conclude the treaty of partition, in which the King of Spain was to be delivered up to France, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour. Votes to the same effect were passed against Edward Earl of Orford, and Charles Lord Hallifax; and all three were placed at the bar of the Upper House. But the Commons knowing that those impeachments would produce nothing in the House of Lords, where the opposite interest predominated, they resolved to proceed against the accused noblemen in a more expedient manner of-branding them as traitors. They voted and presented an address to the king, desiring he would remove them from his councils and presence for ever, as advisers of a treaty so pernicious to the trade and welfare of England. They concluded, by repeating their assurance, that they would always stand by and support his majesty to the utmost of their power, against all his enemies both at home and abroad. The king in his answer, artfully overlooked the first part of the remonstrance. He thanked them for their repeated assurances; and told them he would employ none in his service but such as should be thought most likely to improve that mutual trust and confidence between him and his people, which was necessary for the preservation of their own security and the preservation of their allies.

§ LII. The Lords, inaccessed at this step of the Commons, which they considered as an insult upon their transactions of common justice, and that the Commons had delivered a counter-address, humbly beseeching his majesty, that he would not pass any censure upon the accused lords until they should be tried on the impeachments, and judgments be given according to the usage of Parliament. The king was so perplexed by these opposite representations, that he knew not well what course to follow. He made no reply to the counter-address; but allowed the names of the impeached lords to remain in the council, and gave the Commons a commission, which was to stigmatise those noblemen, and prevent their being employed for the future, suffered the impeachments to be neglected, until they themselves moved for trial. On the fifth day of May the House of Lords sent a message to the Commons, importing, That no articles had as yet been exhibited against the noblemen whom they had impeached. The charge was immediately drawn up against the Earl of Orford: him they accused of having received exorbitant grants from the crown: of having been concerned with Kidd the pirate: of having committed abuses in managing and victualling the fleet, when it lay on the coast of Spain: and lastly, of having advised the Earl of Kent against his own interest, when he had received no grant from the king, except a very distant reversion, and a present of ten thousand pounds, after he had defeated the French at La Hogue: that in Kidd's affair he had acted legally, and with a good intention towards the public, though to his own loss: that his accounts with regard to the fleet which he commanded had been examined and passed: yet he was ready to wave the advantage, and justify himself in every particular; and he absolutely denied that he had given any advice concerning the treaty of partition. Lord Somers was accused of having set the seals to the powers, and afterwards to the treaties: of having accepted some grants: of having acted the part of an accomplice with Kidd, and of having some guilt of partial and dilatory proceedings in chancery. He answered every article in the charge; but no replication was made by the Commons, either to him or to the Earl of Orford. When the Commons were stimulated by another message from the Peers, relating to the impeachments of the Earl of Portland and Lord Hallifax, they declined exhibiting articles against the former on pretence of receiving the latter's message, and took up the charge against Hallifax was sent up to the Lords. They was taxed with possessing a grant in Ireland, without paying the produce of it, according to the law lately enacted concerning those grants; and having enjoyed the forest of Downe to the waste of the timber and the prejudice of the navy: with having held places that were incompatible, by being at the same time commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; and with having advised the two treatises of partition. It is answered, that this grant in Ireland was of debts and sums of money, and that the fact or context concerned no rent or dues; that he had ever received from it did not exceed four hundred pounds, which, if he was bound to repay, a common action would lie against him; but every man was not to be immediately pressed and sued in another part until he obtained the king's leave to withdraw from the treasury: that he never saw the first treaty of partition, nor was his advice asked upon the subject: that he had never heard of the second but once before it was concluded; and then he spoke his sentiments freely on the subject. This an-tswer, like the others, would have been neglected by the Commons, whose aim was now to evade the trials, had not the Lords pressed them by messages to expedite the suits.
They even appointed a day for Oxford's trial, and signified their resolution to the Commons. These desired that a committee of both Houses should be named for settling preliminaries, one of which was, That the lord to be tried should not sit as a peer; and the other reported, That those Lords impeached for the same matter should not vote on the trial of each other. They likewise desired, that Lord Somers should be first tried. The Lords made him the first of the last demand; they rejected the proposal of a committee consisting of both Houses, alleging, that the Commons were parties, and had no title to sit in equality with the judges, or to settle matters relating to the trial: that this was a demand contrary to the principles of law and rules of justice, and never practised in any court or nation. The Lords, indeed, had yielded to this expedient in the popish plot, because it was a case of emergency in which the king's life and safety of the kingdom were concerned, while the people were jealous of the court, and the whole nation was in a ferment; but at present the times were quiet, and the charge amounted to nothing more than misdemeanours; therefore, the Lords could not assent to such a proposal as was derogatory from their jurisdiction. Neither would they agree to the preliminaries; but on the twelfth day of June, resolved, That no peer impeached for high crimes and misdemeanours, should, upon his trial, be without the bar; and, That no peer impeached could be precluded from voting on any occasion, except in his own trial. Divers messages passed between the two Houses; the Commons still insisting upon settling preliminaries: at length the dispute was brought to a free conference.
§ LII. Meanwhile the king going to the House of Peers gave the royal assent to the bill of succession. In that time he disclosed his warm acknowledgments of their repeated assurances of supporting him in such alliances as should be most proper for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and for the security of England and the States-general. He observed, that the session of the year was advanced; that the posture of affairs absolutely required his presence abroad: and he recommended despatch of the public business, especially of those matters which were of the greatest importance. The Commons thanked him in an address for having approved of their proceedings: they declared they would support him in such alliances as he should think fit to make in conjunction with the emperor and the States-general, for the peace of Europe, and to prevent the revolution of France. Then they resumed their dispute with the upper House.
In the free conference, Lord Haversham happened to tax the Commons with partiality, in impeaching some peers, against whom, as he supposed, it was guilty of same misdemeanours. Sir Christopher Minsho, and the managers for the Commons, immediately withdrew: this unguarded sally being reported to the House, they immediately resolved, That John Lord Haversham had uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting upon the honour and justice of the House of Commons, tending to a breach in the good correspondence between the two Houses, and to the interruption of the disputes of the nation: that the said Lord Haversham should be charged before the Lords for the said words: that the Lords should be desired to proceed in justice against him, and to inflict upon him such punishment as so much against the Commons and desire.
The Commons had now a pretence to justify their delay; and declared they would not renew the conference until they should have received satisfaction. Lord Havers-ham denied them a right to make use of their power at the very last moment of the payment. He observed, that as his grant in the forest of Deane extended to Weddings only, it could occasion no waste of timber, nor prejudice to the navy; that the auditors were not prepared by another party until he obtained

prosecution. Each House ordered a narrative of these proceedings to be published; and their mutual animosity had proceeded to such a degree of rancour, as seemed to preclude all possibility of reconciliation. The Commons, in the mean time, were engaged only against the House of Lords, from motives of faction and revenge: for nothing could be more unjust, frivolous, and partial, than the charge exhibited in the articles of impeachment, their anticipatory adress to the king, and their assertions in the proceedings. Their conduct on this occasion was so flagrant as to attract the notice of the common people, and inspire the generality of the nation with disgust. This the whigs did not fail to augment by the arts of calumny, and in particular, they endeavoured to reconcile the aversion, which they had found means to engage the majority of the Commons in its interest.

§ LIV. This faction bad, since the beginning of this session, employed their emissaries in exciting a popular aversion to the Tory ministers and members, and succeeded so well in their endeavours, that they formed a scheme of obtaining petitions from different counties and corporations, that should induce the Commons to alter their conduct, on the supposition that it was contrary to the sense of the nation. In execution of this scheme, a petition signed by the deputy-lieutenants, above twenty justices of the peace, and the grand juries of the county of Kent, had been presented to the House of Commons on the eighteenth day of May, by five gentlemen of fortune and distinction. The porpoit of this remonstrance was, to recommend union among themselves and confidence in his majesty, and to the grand juries of the county of Kent, had been presented to the House of Commons on the eighteenth day of May, by five gentlemen of fortune and distinction. The porpoit of this remonstrance was, to recommend union among themselves and confidence in his majesty, and to their own rulers. This aecorded to the arguments, and his majesty's sacred and unsullied character, which had been so often forgotten without the blackest ingratitude: to beg they would have regard to the voice of the people; that their religion and safety might be effectually provided for; that their loyal addresses might be turned into bills of supply, and that his most sacred majesty might be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it should be too late. The House was so incensed at the petulance of the petition, that they ordered an address, in partibus, acquiescent of the gentlemen who had presented it, to be taken into custody. They were afterwards committed to the Gatehouse, where they remained till the prorogation of parliament; but they had no reason to repine at their imprisonment, which recommended them to the notice and esteem of the public. They were visited and caressed by the chiefs of the whig interest, and considered as martyrs to the liberties of the people. Their confinement gave rise to a spirit of popular importunity, which the gentlemen, freeholders, and inhabitants, of the counties of — in behalf of themselves, and many thousands of the good people of England. It was signed Legion, and in the names of two hundred thousand Englishmen, to deliver it to the House of Commons. In this strange expostulation, the House was charged with illegal and unwarrantable practices, in fifteen particulars; a new claim of right was raised on seven heads; and the Commons were admonished to act according to their duty, as specified in this memorial, on pain of incurring the resentment of an injured nation. It was concluded in these words: For Englishmen are no longer to be slaves to parliaments than to kings—our name is Legion, and we are many. The Commons were equally provoked and intimidated by this libel, which was the production of one Daniel de Foe, a scorner of party writing, in a very little pamphlet. They would not, however, deign to take notice of it in the House; but a complaint being made of endeavours to raise tumults and seditions, a committee was appointed to look into his address, informing him of those solemn proceedings, and beseeching him to provide for the public peace and security.

§ LV. The House, however, perceiving plainly that they had incurred the odium of the nation, which began to clamour for their sovereign, and to demand redress from the popular resentment, thought fit to change their measures with respect to this object, and present the address we have already mentioned, in which they promised to support him in the whole course of his government, and beseeching him to provide for the public peace and security.

Mareschal Catonat and the Prince of Vaudemont, who did not think proper to hazard an engagement; but Mareschal Villeroi arriving in the latter end of August with orders to attack the imperialists, Catonat retired to disguise. The new general marched immediately towards Chiari, where Prince Eugene was entrenched, and attacked his camp; but met with such a reception that he was obliged to retire to the Nape. Several thousands of troops, with the camp followers, the campaign the prince took possession of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua itself, and Gosto, the blockade of which he formed. He reduced all the places on the Oder, and marched into the whole of Saxony, exhibiting repeated marks of the most irritable conscience, indefatigable vigilance, and extensive capacity in the art of war. In January he had well nigh surprised Cremona, by introducing a body of men through an old aqueduct. They forced open the gates, by which the prince and his followers entered; Villeroi being weakened by the noise, ran out into the street, where he was taken; and the town must have been irreparably reduced, had Prince Eugene been joined by another body of troops, which he had ordered to march from the Parmesan, and secure the bridge.

These not arriving at the time appointed, an Irish regiment in the French service took possession of the bridge, and the Prince of Condé was obliged to retire, without proving any very considerable damage.

§ LVII. The French king, alarmed at the activity and military genius of the imperial general, sent a reinforcement to his army in Italy, and the Duke of Vendome to conciliate the Spaniards in that country. He likewise summoned the Duke of Savoy to assist him effectually; but that prince having obtained all he could expect from France, became cold and backward. His second daughter was by this time married to the new King of Spain, whom he introduced into his dominions, and involved in disputes with the states of Catalonia, who refused to pay a tax he had imposed, until their privileges should be confirmed; and he was obliged to gratify them in that particular. The Duke of Savoy was also engaged to rage in the same matter.

The young King of Sweden routed the Saxons upon the river Danube: thence he marched into Courland, and took possession of Miltau without opposition; while the King of Poland retired into East Prussia. In Hungary the French emissaries endeavoured to sow the seeds of a new revolt. They excited themselves with indefatigable industry in almost every court of Christendom. They had already gained the Elector of Bremen, and his brother, the Elector of Cologne, together with the Dukes of Wolfsbomth and Saxa-Gotha, who professed neutrality, while they leaved troops, and made such preparations for war, as plainly indicated that they had received subsidies from France. He had also entered into a treaty of alliance with the King of Portugal, who was personally attached to the Austrian interest; but this weak prince was a slave to his ministers, whom the French king had corrupted. During this summer the French king consolidated his combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir George Rooke, who sailed down the Channel in the latter end of August, and attacked Vice-Admiral Benlow with a strong squadron to the West Indies. In order to deceive the French king, with regard to the destination of this fleet, King William demanded the free use of the Spanish harbours, as if his design had been to send a squadron to the Mediterranean; but he met with a refusal, while the French ships were at anchor, and could not be admitted. About this period the king revoked his letters-patent to the commissioners of the admiralty, and constituted the Earl of Pembroke lord high admiral of England, in order to avoid the frigates, the disputes, and divided counsels of a board. The earl was no sooner promoted to this office, than he sent Captain Loads with three frigates to Cadiz, to bring home the sea stores and effects belonging to the English in that place, before the war should commence; and this piece of service was successfully performed. The French king, in order to enjoy all the advantages that could be derived from his union with Spain, determined to form with a company of Genoese and Pemi; and concluded a new Assiento treaty, for supplying the Spanish plantations with negroes. At the same time, he sent a strong squadron to the port of Cadiz. The French dress was introduced into the court of Spain; and, by a formal edict, the grandees of that kingdom and the peers of France were put on a level in each nation. There was no vigour left in the councils of Spain; her finances were exhausted, and her former spirit seemed to be quite extinguished; the nobility were beggars, and the common people overwhelmed with indigence and distress. The condition of France was not much more prosperous. She had long shut up her ports towards the sea, and clung on the eve of another, which in all probability would render her completely miserable.

§ LVIII. These circumstances were well known to the emperor, who attended the whole of the negociations for another grand alliance. Conferences were opened at the Hague; and, on the seventh day of September, a treaty was concluded between his imperial majesty, England, and the States-general. The objects proposed were to procure satisfaction to Spain in the Spanish succession, and sufficient security for the dominions and commerce of the allies. They engaged to use their endeavours for recovering the Spanish Netherlands, as a barrier between Holland and France; and for putting the emperor in possession of the duchy of Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with the lands and islands upon the coast of Tuscany belonging to the Spanish dominions. They agreed, that the war was to be maintained, till Spain should keep and possess whatever lands and cities they should conquer from the Spaniards in the Indies; that the confederates should faithfully communicate their designs to the emperor; and that, in case of his failing to concur with the rest: that they should concur in preventing the union of France and Spain under the same government; and hinder the French from possessing the Spanish Indies: that, in concluding a peace, the confederates should in all things be on the present footing. The prince-regent, and his allies, in the Treaty of Ryswick, was completely. They determined to employ two months, to obtain, by amicable means, the satisfaction and security which they demanded; and stipulated, that within six weeks the treaty should be ratified.

§ LX. On the sixteenth day of September, King James expired at St. Germain's, after having laboured under a tedious misposition. This unfortunate monarch, since his family had lost all the advantages promised to them by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, had had aside all thoughts of worldly grandeur, and devoted his whole attention to the concerns of his soul. Though he could not prevent the busy gomus of his queen from plotting his overthrow, he was too much occupied in the best possible way to which confusedly projects. Hunting was his chief diversion; but religion was his constant care. Nothing could be more harmless than the life he led; and, in the course of it, he subjected himself to uncommon penance and mortifications. He frequently visited the poor monks of La Trappe, who were much edified by his humble and pious deportment. His pride and arbitrary temper seem to have vanished with his greatness; he became affable, kind, and easy; and his dependants; and his religion certainly opened and improved the virtues of his heart, though it seemed to impair the faculties of his soul. In his last illness he conjured his son to profess his religion to every worldly advantage, and even to renounce all thoughts of a crown, if he could not enjoy it without offering violence to his faith. He recommended to him the practice of justice and Christian forgiveness. Before his death he forgave the Prince of Orange, the emperor, and all his enemies. He died with great marks of devotion, and was interred, at his own request, in the church of the English Benedictines in Paris, without any funeral ceremonies. The French were engaged in the French war, and there was no public lamentation at his death. His body was carried to Westminster, and interred with all the ceremonies of state.
They reviled each other in words and writing with all the falsehood of calumny, and all the bitterness of rancour; so that truth, candour, and temperance, seemed to be banished by consent of both parties. The king had found himself deceived in his new ministries, who had opposed his measures with all their influence. He was particularly displeased with the deportment of the Earl of Rochester, who proved altogether impetuous and untractable; and, instead of moderating, inflamed the violence of his party. The king declared, the year in which that nobleman directed his counsels, he perceived that he could not help expressing his displeasure in such a coldness of reserve, that Rochester told him he would serve his Majesty no longer, since he did not enjoy his confidence. William made no answer to this expostulation, but resolved he should see him no more. The Earl, however, at the desire of Mr. Harley, became more placid and submissive; and, after the king's departure for Holland, repaired to his government of Ireland, in which he now remained, exerting all his endeavours to acquire popularity. William, foreseeing nothing but opposition from the present spirit of the House of Commons, closeted some of their leaders, with a view to bespeak their compliance: but finding them determined to pursue their former principles, and to insist upon their impeachments, he resolved, with the advice of his friends, to dissolve the parliament. This step he was the more easily induced to take, as the Commons were become extremely hostile to the nation, had breathed nothing but war and defiance against the French monarch. The parliament was accordingly dissolved by proclamation, and another summoned to meet on the 5th of April, 1702.

§ LXIII. Never did the two parties proceed with such heat and violence against each other, as in their endeavours to influence the new elections. The whigs, however, obtained the victory, as they included the money-interest, which will always be more powerful among them. Corruption was now reduced into an open and avowed commerce; and, had the people been so universally virtuous and provident, that no sense of shame remained, the victors must have blushed for their success. Though the majority thus obtained was staunch to the measures of the court, the choice of speaker fell upon Mr. Harley, contrary to the inclination of the king, who favoured Sir Thomas Lyttleton; but his Majesty's speech was received with universal applause. It was so much admired by the well-wishers to the revolution, that they printed it with decorum, in the English, Dutch, and French languages. It appeared as a peculiar guarantee of all that the king's last legacy to his own and all protestant people. In this celebrated harangue, he expatiated upon the indignity offered to the nation by the French king's acknowledging the pretended Prince of Wales: he explained the danger to which it was exposed, by his personal invasions and that to the throne of Spain: he gave them to understand he had conclusion several alliances, according to the encouragement given him by both Houses of parliament, which alliances should be laid before them, together with other treaties still depending. He observed, that the eyes of all Europe were upon this parliament; and all matters at a stand, until their resolution should be known; therefore, no time ought to be lost. He told them, they had yet an opportunity to secure for themselves and their posterity the quiet enjoyment of their religion and liberties, if they were not wanting to themselves, but would exert the ancient and natural instinct of the nation. He promised the commons to support the public credit, which could not be preserved without keeping sacred that maxim, That they shall never be losers who trust to the parliamentary security. He declared, that he never asked aid from his people without regret; what he desired was, that they should enjoy peace and safety and honour, at such a critical time; and that the whole should be appropriated to the purposes for which it was intended. He expressed his willingness that the accounts should be set, and the free election of the parliament. He again recommended despatch, together with good bills for employing the poor, encouraging trade, and suppressing vice. He expressed his hope that they were determined to avoid disputes and differences, and to act with a hearty concurrence for promoting the common cause. He said, he should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if they were as much inclined to lay aside those unwise animosities which divided and weakened them, as he was disposed to make all his subjects safe and easy, as to any, even the highest, offences committed against his person. He conceived that so long as they deserved the hopes of their unity. As he had always shown, and always would show, how desirous he was to be the common father of all his people, he desired they would lay aside parties and divisions, so as that no distinction should be heard of amongst them, but of those who were friends to the protestant religion and present establishment, and of those who wished for a popish prince and a French government. He concluded by affirming, that if they, in good earnest, desired to see England hold the balance of Europe, and be indeed at the head of the protestant interest, it would appear by their improving the present opportunity. The Lords immediately drew up a warm and affectionate address, in which they expressed theirsentiment of the proceedings of the French king, in enoowing the pretended Prince of Wales for King of England. They assured his majesty, they would assist him to the utmost of their power, and when it should please God to deprive them of his majesty's protection, they would vigorously assist and defend against the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders whatever, and protect, and preserve the person and estate of his majesty. They were, by virtue of the acts of parliament for establishing and limiting the succession. On the fifth day of January, an address to the same effect was presented by the Commons, and both met with a very gracious reception from his majesty. The Lords, as a further proof of their zeal, having taken into consideration the dangers that threatened Europe, from the accession of the Duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, drew up another address, explaining their sense of that danger; stating to the French king as a violator of treaties; declaring their opinion that his majesty, his subjects, and allies, could never be safe and secure, until the House of Austria should be restored to their rights, and the invaders of the Spanish monarchy brought to reason; and assuring his majesty that no time should be lost, nor any thing wanting on their parts, which might answer the reasonable expectations of his majesty's friends in England, in thus supporting the reputation of the English name, when engaged under so great a prince, in the glorious cause of maintaining the liberty of Europe. The Commons, in order to acquire the confidence of the Commons, ordered Mr. Secretary Vernon to lay before them copies of the treaties and conventions he had lately concluded, which were so well approved, that the House unanimously voted the supply. By another vote, they authorized the exchequer to borrow six hundred thousand pounds at six per cent. for the service of the fleet, and fifty thousand pounds for the subsistence of guards and garrisons. They deliberated upon the state of the navy, with the debt due upon it, and examined an estimate of what would be necessary for extraordinary repairs. They called for an account of that part of the national debt for which no provision had been made. They ordered the steps to be taken in order to pay the dividends in the United Estates in Ireland, to attend the House with a full detail of their proceedings in the execution of that act of parliament. On the ninth day of January, they unanimously resolved, That the motions to be made with respect to his majesty, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their open and secret abettors. They resolved to address his majesty, that he would insert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing That no peace should be made with France, until his majesty and the nation have resolution for a declaration to be made, in owning and declaring the pretended Prince of Wales, according to the proportions settled by the contract. The supplies were raised by an imposition of four shillings in the pound upon lands, annuities, pensions, and stipends, and on the profits arising from the different professions. They imposed an annual tax of two per cent. on stocks and trade, and money at interest; of five shillings in the pound on all salaries, fees, and perquisites; a capitation tax of four shillings; an imposition of one per cent. on all articles delivered to their enemies or their company which should be bought, sold, or bargained for; a duty of sixpence per bushel on malt, and a further duty on mium, cider, and perry.

§ XV. The Commons seemed to vie with the Lords in zeal for the government. They brought in a bill for attaining the pretended Prince of Wales, which being sent up to the other House, passed with an additional clause of attaining against the queen, who acted as regress for the pretender. Thus, however, was not carried without great opposition in the House of Lords. When the bill was sent back to the Commons, they excepted to the amendment as irregular. They observed, that attainers by bill constituted the most rigorous part of the law; and that the straining of it ought to be avoided. They proposed, that the queen should be attained by a separate bill. The Lords assented to the proposal, and the bill against the queen passed another for attaining the queen; however, it was neglected in the House of Commons. But the longest and warmest debates of this session were produced by a bill, which the Lords had passed to enable the pretended Prince of Wales, and swearing to the king by the title of rightful and lawful king, and his heirs, according to the act of settlement. It was proposed, that this oath should be voluntary, tendered to all persons, and the refusal of it should be with no penalty, provided no other penalty. This article was violently opposed by the Earl of Nottingham, and other lords of the fiery interest. They observed, that the government was first settled with another oath, which was like an original contract; so that there was no occasion for a new imposition: that oaths relating to men's opinions had been always considered as severe impositions; and that a voluntary oath was in its own nature unlawful. During these disputes, another bill of abjuration was brought into the House of Commons by Sir Charles Hedges, that should be obligatory on all persons who enjoyed employment in church or state; it likewise included a clause, which was objected to, for attending the Lords, and Commons, and to maintain the church of England, together with the toleration for dissenters. Warm debates arose upon the question, Whether the oath should be voluntary, or voluntary; and whether it should be carried for imposition, by the majority of one vote. They agreed to insert an additional clause, declaring it equally penal to compass or imagine the death of her royal highness the Princess Anne of Denmark, as it was to compell or imagine the death of the king's eldest son and heir. In the House of Peers this bill was strenuously opposed by the peers; and, when after long debates it passed on the twenty-fourth day of February, ten lords entered a protest against it, as an unnecessary and severe imposition.

§ XVI. The whole nation now seemed to join in the cry for a war with France. Party heats began to abate; the factions in the city of London were in a great measure moderated by the recovery of the United Estates in the East Indies, which found their mutual interest required a coalition. The troops in the House of Commons, having concurred so heartily with the inclinations of the people, were at length resolved, and the Lords agreed, for their own account, to support the conduct of their party in the preceding parliament. They complained of some petitions and addresses which had reflected upon the proceedings of the last House of Commons, and the conduct of the King's petitioners. But the majority, however, determined, that it was the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or address the king, for the calling, sitting, or dissolving of parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances, and for all cases of subject and nation; without being imposed upon or otherwise had a right to be brought to a speedy trial. A complaint being likewise made, that the Lords had denied the Commons justice in the matter of the late impeachments, a furious debate ensued; and it was carried by a very small majority that justice had not been denied. In some parts of the House a suggestion was thrown out to the effect that an election at Maidstone, between Thomas Blisse and Thomas Culpepper, the House resolved, That the latter had been not only guilty of corrupt, scandalous, and indi ratory manners, and that he procured himself to be re-elect ed a burgess; but likewise, being one of the instruments in presenting and promoting the scandalous, insolent, and seditious petition, commonly called the Kentish petition, for being a medley of scandalous, vicious, and promoting a scandalous, villainous, and groundless reflection upon that House, by aspiring the members with receiving French money, or being in the interest of France; for which offence he was ordered to be committed to Newgate, and to be prosecuted by his majesty's attorneys general. They also resolved, That to assert that the House of Commons is not the only representative of the Commons of England, tends to the subversion of the rights and privileges of the House the trustees appointed to the fundamental constitution of the government of this kingdom: That to assert, that the House of Commons have no power of commitment, but of their own members, tends to the subversion of the fundamental constitution of this country. That to print or publish any books, or libels, reflecting upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, or any member thereof, for or relating to his service therein, is a high vio riated to the several uses of the war, they presented a se cked of the people, as well as to the court, and their deportment was arbitrary and improper. Several in instances it appeared that he had ordered the expenses of the trustees on one hand, and encouraged by the coun nance of the courtiers on the other, endeavoured, by a cir icular letter, to stop up the grand jury of Ireland against the trustees. This occasioned a great deal of clamour, that king, coughed in very strong terms, affirming, that it was injurious to the protestant interest, and had been obtained by gross misinformations. The king having communi cated these addresses to the House, they were immedi ately voted scandalous, false, and groundless; and the Commons resolved, That, notwithstanding the complaints and clamours against the trustees, it did not appear to the House but those complaints were groundless; nevertheless they afterwards received several petitions, implying relief against the said act; and they ordered that the petitioners should be relieved accordingly. Proposals were delivered in for recouping such petitioners for the expenses of the estates, on certain terms therein specified, according to the rent-roll, when verified and made good to the purchaser; but, whereas in this rent-roll, the value of the estates had been estimated at something more than seven hundred and sixteen thousand pounds, those who under took to make the purchase affirmed, they were not worth five hundred thousand pounds; and thus the affair re mained.

§ LXVII. With respect to Scotland, the clamours of that kingdom had not yet subsided. When the bill of abjuration passed in the House of Peers, the Earl of Notting ham declared, that although he differed in opinion from the majority in many particulars relating to that bill, yet he was a friend to the design of it: and in order to secure a protestant succession, he thought a union of the whole island was absolutely necessary. He therefore moved for an address to the king, that he would dissolve the parliament; and that if another convoca tion might be called in question, on account of its having been originally a convention; and that a new parliament should be summoned, that they might treat about a union of the two kingdoms. The king declared, that it was his wish at heart, that even when he was disabled from going to the parliament in person, he sent a letter to the Commons, expressing an eager desire that a treaty for this purpose might be set on foot, and earnestly recommending this affair to the consideration of the House; but, as a new parliament in Scotland could not be called without a great risk, while the nation was in such a ferment, the project was disposed to a more favourable opportunity.

§ LXIX. Before the king's return from Holland, he had concert with his allies the operations of the ensuing campaign. He had engaged in a negotiation with the Prince of Hesse-D'Armstadt, who assured him, that if he would bestow some money, he could procure a large body of men, and divers other grandees of Spain, would declare for the House of Austria. The allies had also determined upon the siege of Reuserswaert, which the Elector of Cologne had delivered into the hands of the United Provinces. Neither of Hanover had resolved to disarm the Princes of Wolfen buttel: the King of the Romans, and Prince Louis of Baden, undertook to invest Landau: and the emperor promised to send some troops to reinforce the Commons. Notwithstanding these transactions, they did not neglect the vigorous prosecution of the war. They ad ressed his majesty to interpose with his allies, that they might take measures to recall their soldiers; but out on board the fleet in proportion to the numbers his majesty should embark. When they had settled the sums appro

viciss: he delivered to Lord Albermarle the keys of his closet and privy-chamber, telling him he knew what to do with them. He urged for the Earl of Portland; but, being speechless before that nobleman arrived, he grasped his hand, and laid it to his heart, with free and tender affection. On the eighth day of March he expired, in the fifty-second year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years. The Lords Lexington and Scarborough, who were about to wait on the King for his undivided crown, was introduced to the King who died, the thatch-roofed Roof to unite from his left arm a black ribbon, to which was affixed a ring, containing some hair of the late Queen Mary. The body, being opened and examined, lay in state at Saint James's from time to time. A veil was deposited in a vault of Henry's chapel in Westminster-abbey. In the beginning of May, a will which he had interested with Monsieur Schavilenberg was opened at the Hague. In this he had declared his cousin Prince Frans of Nassau, Statholder of Friesland, his sole and universal heir, and appointed the States-general his executors. By a codicil annexed, he had bequeathed the Lordship of Brevetti, and a legacy of two hundred thousand guilders, to the Earl of Albermarle.

who, on the eleventh day of March, went to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, where, in a speech to both Houses, she expressed her satisfaction at their unanimous concurrence with her opinion, that too much could not be done for the encouragement of their allies in humbling the power of the enemy. She assured the Commons, that proper methods towards obtaining a union between England and Scotland. She observed to the Commons, that the revenue for defraying the expenses of the civil government was so much increased, and to exertion, that on the affection for its being supplied in such a manner as should be most suitable to the honour and dignity of the crown. She declared it should be her constant endeavour to make them reflect that they were, by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all her subjects. As and as I know my own heart to be entirely English, (continued she,) I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England, and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word. These assurances were extremely agreeable to the parliament; and good effects of it; but that, if the King, and ministers, the Dutch, and Germans, for their support, could be in time obtained, was doubted, but by Mr. Hills. Addresses of congratulation were presented by the bishop and clergy of London; by the dissenters in and about that city; and by all the counties, cities, towns, and corporations of England, and Ireland. The queen promised her protection to the dissenters; and received the compliments of all her subjects with such affability as insured their affection.

§ II. The death was no sooner known at the Hague, than all Holland was filled with consternation. The States immediately assembled, and, for some time, gazed at each other in silent fear and astonishment. They suspected their minister, and interchanged suspicions. The English, the States, and the French, had promised, that they would act with unanimity, and expend their dearest blood in defence of their country. Then they despatched letters to the cities and provinces, informing them of this unfortunate event, and desiring them to support the queen. The express from England having brought the queen's speech to her privy council, it was translated and published, to revive the drooping spirits of the people. Next day Pensionsary Farel imported to the States of Holland a letter which he had received from the elder Earl of Marlborough, containing assurances, in the queen's name, of union and assistance. In a few days, the queen wrote a letter in the French language to the States, confirming the assurances; it was deputed by Mr. Hills, whom she had furnished with fresh credentials as envoy from England. Thus animated, the States resolved to prosecute vigorous measures; their resolutions were still more determined by the intimation of orders from the queen, to whom the queen honoured with the order of the Garter, and invested with the character of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States-general; he was likewise declared captain-general of her forces both at home and abroad. He assured the States, that her Britannic majesty would maintain the alliances which had been concluded by the late king, and do every thing that the common concerns of Europe required. The speech was answered by Dickwell, president of the week, who, in the name of the States, expressed their hearty thanks to her majesty, and their resolutions of concurring with her in a vigorous prosecution of the common interests.

§ IIII. The days of William's life was envied by the joy that diffused itself through the kingdom of France at the news of his decease. The people who first brought the tidings to Calais was imprisoned by the government, until his inquest was held. However, the French consuls could hardly restrain their transports so as to preserve common decorum: the people of Paris openly rejoiced at the event; all decency was laid aside at Rome, where this invidious and odious event was considered as a public misfortune. Cardinal Ge di, the imperial minister, complained of them to the Pope, as an insult on his master the emperor, who was William's friend, confidante, and ally. The French king despatched secret notes to Buxiie, where the Count d'Arras had left at the Hague to manage the affairs of France, together with instructions to renew the negotiation with the States, in hope of detaching them from the alliance. This minister presented a memorial implying severe reflections on King William, and the past conduct of the Dutch; and insinuating, that now they had recovered their liberty, the court of France hoped they would consult their true interest. The Count de Goes, envoy from the emperor, animadverted on these passages, and the imperial government was likewise published; the States produced in public an answer to the same remonstrance, expressing their resentment at the insolence of such insinuations, and their veneration for the venerable character of their late sovereign. The Earl of Marlborough succeeded in every part of his negociation. He animadverted the Dutch to a full exertion of their vigour; he concerted the operations of the campaign; he agreed to settle all the disputes with the States-general, by a just and careful administration for the good of all her subjects. As and as I know my own heart to be entirely English, (continued she,) I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word. However, the French consuls could hardly restrain their transports so as to preserve common decorum: the people of Paris openly rejoiced at the event; all decency was laid aside at Rome, where this invidious and odious event was considered as a public misfortune. Cardinal Gedo, the imperial minister, complained of them to the Pope, as an insult on his master the emperor, who was William's friend, confidante, and ally. The French king despatched secret notes to Buxiie, where the Count d'Arras had left at the Hague to manage the affairs of France, together with instructions to renew the negotiation with the States, in hope of detaching them from the alliance. This concerned to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unless the English would enter as principals in the quarrel. This allegation was supported by the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, the Earl of Pembroke, and the majority of the council. The queen being resolved to declare war, communicated her intention to the House of Commons, by whom it was approved; and on the fourth day of this declaration, she publicly proclaimed it. The king of France was, in this proclamation, taxed with having taken possession of great part of the Spanish dominions; with design ing to invade the liberties of Europe, and obstruct the freedom of navigation and commerce; with the tyranny and usurpation unjustly inflicted to the queen and her throne, by taking upon him to declare the pretended Prince of Wales King of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The three declarations of the emperor, England, and the states-general, which were published in one day, did not fail to disconcert, as well as to provoke, the French monarch. When his minister De Torcy recited them in his hearing, he spoke of the queen with some animity; but with respect to the States-general, he declared with great emotion, that "Messieurs the Dutch merchants should one day repent of their insensibility and presumption, in declaring war against so powerful a monarch;" he did not, however, preface his declaration till the third day of July.

VI. The House of Commons, in compliance with the queen's desire, brought in a bill, empowering her majesty to name commissioners to treat with the Scots for a union of the two kingdoms. It met with warm opposition from several gentlemen of the court, and other members, who disapproved of the measure and the discharges of disabuse of state and ridicule upon the Scottish nation; but the measure seemed so necessary at that juncture, to secure the protestant succession against the Irish incursions, and the danger of the present war, that the majority espoused the bill, which passed through both Houses, and on the sixth day of May received the royal assent, together with some bills of less importance. The emperor had so inconsiderately proceeded, that it began to gain credit all over the kingdom. Several peers interested themselves in William's character; and a motion was made in the upper House, that the truth of that report should be inquired into. The House immediately resolved that the commission for this purpose should be to be appointed by the House. The Commons resolved, that the report was groundless, false, villainous, and scandalous; to the dishonour of the late king's memory, and highly tending to the disservice of her majesty. They formed a bill, and the House resolved, that the authors or publishers of such scandalous reports should be prosecuted by the attorney-general. The same censure was passed upon some libels and pamphlets, tending to inflame the factions of the kingdom, and to propagate a spirit of sedition. On the twenty-first day of May, the Commons, in an address, advised her majesty to engage the emperor, the States-general, and her other allies, to join with her in prohibiting all intercourse with France and Spain; and to consequent, that the acts of the States-general might most effectually secure the trade of her subjects and allies. The Lords presented another address, desiring the queen would encourage her subjects to equip privateers, as the preparations of the enemy seemed to be made for a piratical war, to the interruption of commerce: they likewise exhorted her majesty to grant commissions or charters to all persons who should make such acqui-sitions in the Indies, as she in her great wisdom should judge most expedient for the good of her kingdoms. On the twenty-fifth day of May, the queen having passed several public and private bills, dismissed the parliament by prorogation, after having, in a short speech, besought them for their real, recommended unanimity, and declared she would carefully preserve and maintain the act of toleration.

VII. In Scotland a warm contest arose between the revolutionaries and those in the opposition, concerning the existence of the present parliament. The queen had signified her accession to the throne, in a letter to her privy council for Scotland; desiring that the officers of that council, in that office, until she should send a new commission. Meanwhile she authorized them to publish a proclamation, ordaining all officers of state, councillors, and magistrates, to act in all things conformably to the commissions and instructions of her late majesty, until new commissions should be prepared. She likewise assured them of her firm resolution to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties, and in the established government of the church. She had already, in presence of twelve Scottish counsellors, taken the coronation-oath for that kingdom; but those who wanted to embroil the affairs of their country affirmed that this was an irregular way of proceeding, and that the oath ought to have been tendered by persons appointed for that purpose, either by the parliament or the privy-council of the kingdom. The present ministry, consisting of the Duke of Queensberry, the Earls of Marnholm, Melvil, Seafield, Hynford, and Selkirk, were devoted to revolution principles, and thought it necessary that a new parliament should continue, in pursuance of a late act for continuing the parliament that should be then in being, six months after the death of the king; and that it should assemble in twenty days after the death of the king. This resolution was deferred the meeting almost three months after the king's decease; and therefore the anti-revolutionaries affirmed that it was dissolved. The Duke of Hamilton was at the head of the council of magistrates, and of the part of the present parliament. This nobleman, together with the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earls Marshall and Rothes, and many other noblemen, required to London, in order to make the queen acquainted with the object of the commission of the present parliament. She admitted them to her presence, and calmly heard their allegations; but she was determined by the advice of her privy council for that kingdom, who were of opinion that the nation was in too great a ferment to be moved by the broken precedent. According to the queen's last adjournment, the parliament met at Edinburgh on the ninth day of June, the Duke of Queensberry having been appointed high-commissioner.

Before the tenth day the Duke of Hamilton, for himself and his adherents, declared their satisfaction at her majesty's accession to the throne, not only on account of her undoubted right by descent, but likewise because of her many personal virtues and royal qualities. He said they were resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of her majesty's right against all her enemies whatever: but, at the same time, they thought themselves bound in duty to give their opinion, that they were not warranted by law to sit and act as a parliament. He then read a paper to the following effect: that forsooth, as by the fundamental laws and constitution of this kingdom, all parliaments do dissolve on the death of the king, the parliament was dissolved, and the act in the preceding reign, that the parliament in being at his majesty's decease should meet, and act what might be needful for the defence of the true protestant religion as by law established, and for the maintenance of the succession to the crown, as settled by the claim of right, and for the preservation and security of the public peace; and seeing these ends are fully answered by her majesty's succession to a In their hours of debauch they drank to the health of sorrel, meaning the horse that fell with the king, and under the appellation of the little green horse. The queen had been informed that the horse had stumbled. As the beast had formerly belonged to Sir John Giffard, one of the queen's household, by whom it was presented to the queen for her charity to that gentleman; and a Latin epigram was written on the event of the fall, by a gentleman named Mathew, in the following words: "Vesperi sacri, cor et anima, magna viri,fecit resurgere foedera, prorupit ante, alteriusque generis lux; et egenis oris ad impedimenta, munera venit; et omnia nobis, qui haec omittere, docebit animus, et memoria virtuti."

b Doctor Robins, in a sermon preached before the congregation on the thirteenth day of January, drew a parallel between the sufferings of Christ and those of King Charles, to which last he gave the preference, in point of right, character, and passion. c During the five years before the queen gave her assent to an act for laying a duty upon land, to another for encouraging the Greenland trade; and the third year of her reign, it was reported that William of Orange had fled with a large fleet of privateers to the inferiored estates of Ireland; in a sixth engaging the town of the mouth of the Great River, under the command of Lord Colborne; to a seventh obliging the Jews to maintain and provide for their protestant children. the throne; we conceive ourselves not now warranted by law to meet, sit, or act; and therefore do dissent from any thing that shall be done or acted. The duke having recited this paper, and formally protested against the proposed measures, was joined by twenty-nine members amidst the acclamations of the people.

§ VIII. Notwithstanding their secession, the commissioner, who retained a much greater number, produced the queen's letter, signifying her resolution to maintain and preserve the established laws, liberties, and the presbyterian discipline. She informed them of her declaring war against France; she exhorted them to provide sufficient supplies for maintaining several garrisons; and she was disappointed of the enemy's designs, and preserving the present happy settlement; and she earnestly recommended to their consideration a union of the two kingdoms. The Duke of Queenberry and the Earl of Marchmont having enforced the different articles of this letter, committees were appointed for the security of the kingdom, for counter-verted elections, for drawing up an answer to her majesty's letter, and for revising the minutes. Meanwhile, the Duke of Athlone, and his adherents sent the Lord Blantyre to London, with an address to the queen, who refused to receive it, but wrote another letter to the parliament, expressing her resolution to maintain their dignity and authority. Of this letter, the former, had assured her, that the groundless secession of some members should increase and strengthen their care and zeal for her majesty's service. They expelled Sir A. Maitland from the university, to prevent his communications against presbytery. The lord advocate prosecuted the faculty of advocates before the parliament, for having passed a vote among themselves in favour of the protesta-tion and address of the dissenting members. The faculty was severely reprimanded: but the whole notion seemed to resent the prosecution. The parliament passed an act for recognising her majesty's royal authority: another for adjourning the court of judicature called the session; a third declaring this meeting of parliament legal: and forbidding any person to disown, quarrel with, or impugn the dignity and authority thereof, under the penalty of high treason: a fourth for securing the true protestant religion and presbyterian church government: a fifth for a land-tax: and a sixth enabling her majesty to appoint commissions for a union between the two kingdoms.

§ IX. The Earl of Marchmont, of his own accord, and even contrary to the advice of the high-commissioners, brought in a bill for altering the pretended Prince of Wales: but this was not supported by the court party, as the commissioner had no instructions how to act on the occasion. Perhaps the queen and her English ministry resolved to make its imprudence a ground of check upon the wags and house of Hanover. On the thirtieth day of June, the commissioner adjourned the parliament after having thanked them for their cheerfulness and unanimity in their proceedings; and the chiefs of the opposite parties hastened to London, to make their different representations to the queen and her ministry. In the mean time she appointed commissioners for treating about the union; and they met at the Cockpit on the twenty-second day of October. On the twentieth day of the next month, they adjusted preliminaries, importing, that nothing agreed on among themselves should be bind-ing until an act of the two kingdoms of both nations: and that, unless all the heads proposed for the treaty agreed to, no particular thing agreed on should be binding. The queen visited them in December, in order to quicken their mutual endeavours. They agreed, that the two kingdoms should be insepara-bly united into one monarchy, under her majesty, her heirs, and successors, and under the same limitations, according to the acts of settlement: but, when the Scott-ish commissioners represented, that the interests of the two col-leges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, should be preserved and maintained, such a difficulty arose as could not be surmounted, and no further progress was made. The question of the union was not interrupted by any new commission. That king-dom was ruled by justices whom the Earl of Rochester had appointed; and the trustees for the forfeited estates maintained their authority.

§ X. While Britain was engaged in these civil trans-actions, her allies were not idle on the continent. The old Duke of Zell, at the head of the Italians, with the Earl of Bridg-water, surprised the Dukes of Wolfenbuttel and Sax-Gotha, whom they compelled to renounce their attachments to France, and concur in the common councils of the empire. Thus the north of Germany was re-united to the interests of the empire; and it appeared they had been in a condition to assist them effectually, had not the neighbourhood of the war in Poland deterred them from parting with their forces. England and the States-General resolved to mediate the disputes between the Kings of Sweden and Poland. Charles was become enamoured of war, and ambitious of conquest. He threatened to invade Saxony through the dominions of Prussia. Augustus retired to Cracow, while Charles penetrated to Warsaw, and even ordered the cardinal-primate to summon a diet for choosing a new king. The situation of affairs at this juncture was far from being favourable to the allies. The court of Vienna had tarried vain with the Elector of Bavaria, who made use of this negotiation to raise his terms with Louis. His brother, the Elector of Cologne, admitted French garrisons into Liege, and all his places on the Rhine. The Elector of Saxony was too hard pressed by the enemy to secure his provinces; and the Saxons had been for a long time冈en by a garrison, and the Swedes were overrun by the victory of the Swedish conqueror: the Duke of Saxony had joined his forces to those of France, and overran the whole province of Meissen. Augustus, though he professed a neutrality, evinced himself strongly biased to the French interests.

§ XI. The war was begun in the name of the elector-palatine war between the siege of Dusseldorf, which was invested in the month of April by the Prince of Nassau-Saar-burgh, mariscal-du-camp to the emperor: under this officer the Dutch troops served as auxiliaries, because war had not yet been declared by the States-general. The French garrisons made a desperate defence. They worsted the besiegers in divers sallies, and maintained the place until it was reduced to a heap of ashes. At length the allies made a general attack upon the countess and ravelin, which they carried after a very obstinate engagement, with the loss of two thousand men. Then the garrison capitulated on honourable terms, and the fortifi-cations were razed. During this siege, which lasted from the sixteenth day of April to the middle of June, Count Tallard posted himself on the opposite side of the Rhine from whence he supplied the town with fresh troops and ammunition, and annoyed the besiegers with his artillery; but finding it impossible to save the place, he joined the second army, commanded by the Duke of Alken, to the assistance of the States of the Netherlands. The siege of Keizerswaert was covered by a body of Dutch troops under the Earl of Athlone, who lay encamped in the Duchy of Cleve. Meanwhile General Cohorn, at the head of another detachment, entered Flanders, demolished the French lines between the forts of Donat and Isabell, and laid the countenance of Burgers under contribution: but a considerable body of French troops advancing under the Marquis de Redimier, and the Count de la Motte, he overthrew the country, and retired under the walls of Sluis. The Duke of Burgundy, who had taken the command of the French army under Bou Qui-Ant, encamped at the mouth of the Durno, and marched into the country, and besieged the citadel of Bruges, and Great Nieuwen; in which, however, he was baffled by the vigilance and activity of Athlone, who, grasping his design, marched thither, and encamped under the cannon of the town. In the beginning of June, Landau was invested by Prince Louis of Baden: in the month of June the King of the Romans arrived in the camp of the besiegers, with such pomp and magnificence as exhausted his father's treasury. On the ninth day of September, the citadel was taken by assault: but the town surrendered.

§ XII. When the Earl of Marlborough arrived in Hol-land, the Earl of Athlone, in quality of Veldt mariscal, insisted upon an equal command with the English general: but the States-General would not yield to the request of Marlborough, whom they declared generalissimo of all their forces. In the beginning of July he repaired to the
The Duke of Burgundy, finding himself obliged to retreat before the allied army, rather than expose himself longer to such a mortifying indignity, returned to Versailles, leaving the command to Boufflers, who lost the confidence of Louis by the ill success of this campaign. The deputies of the States-General having represented to the Earl of Marlborough the advantages that would accrue to Holland, from his despoiling the enemy of the places they maintained in the Spanish Guelderland, by which the navigation of the Maas was obstructed, and the important town of Maestricht in a manner blocked up, he resolved to deliver them from such a troublesome neighbourhood. He detached General Schultz with a body of troops to reduce the town and castle of Venlo, which were surrendered after a very obstinate defence. In the meantime, he undertook the siege of Venlo, which capitulated on the twenty-fifth day of the month, after St. Michael had been stormed and taken by Lord Cutts and the English volunteers, among whom the young Earl of Huntington distinguished himself by very extraordinary acts of valour.

Then the general invested Remoninde, which he reduced after a very obstinate defence, together with the fort of Stedum, a redoubt at Liege. Boufflers, ever founded at the rapidity of Marlborough's success, retired towards Liege, in order to cover that city; but, at the approach of the confederates, he retired with precipitation to Tongern, from whence he directed his route towards Brabant, with a view to defend such places as the allies had no design to attack. When the Earl of Marlborough arrived at Liege, he found the suburbs of St. Walburg had been set on fire by the French garrison, who had retired to the citadel and the Châteaux. They immediately possessed the city; and in a few days opened the trenches against the citadel, which was taken by assault. On this occasion, the hereditary Prince of Condé, who had advanced the head of the enemies, was the first person who mounted the breach. Violating the governor, and the Duke of Charenton, were made prisoners. Three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver were found in the citadel, besides notes for above one million, drawn upon substantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. Immediately after this exploit, the garrison of the Châteaux capitulated on honourable terms, and were conducted to Antwerp. By the success of this campaign, the Earl of Marlborough raised his military character above all censure, and confirmed himself in the entire confidence of the States-General; who in the beginning of the season had trembled for Niemegen, and now saw the enemy driven from Flanders and Brabant.

§ XIII. When the army broke up in November, the general repaired to Maestricht, from whence he proposed to return to the Hague by water. Accordingly he embarked in a large boat with five-and-twenty soldiers, under the command of a lieutenant. Next morning he was joined at Remondine by Coehorn, in a large vessel with sixty men; and they were moreover escorted by fifty troopers, who followed in the wake of the boat. Their large boat outsailed the other, and the horsemen mistook their way in the dark. A French partisan, with five-and-thirty men from Guelders, who lurked among the rushes in wait for prey, seized the rope by which the boat was drawn, hauled it home, and set fire to their small arms and baggage; but they then rushing into it secured the soldiers before they could put themselves in a posture of defence. The Earl of Marlborough was accompanied by General Opdam, and Mynteer Gueldermans, one of the deputies, who were provided with passports. The Earl had neglected this precaution; but recollecting he had an old passport for his father's time, and another that he had obtained from Lord Marlborough, wrote the information that the Earl was surprised by a party, and conveyed to Guelders, immediately marched out with his whole garrison to invest that place. The same imperfect workmen, the French, as usual, were at a loss to reverse the enemy, content with the information that the Earl who was surprised by a party, and conveyed to Guelders, immediately marched out with his whole garrison to invest that place. The same imperfect workmen, the French, as usual, were at a loss to reverse the enemy, content with the § XIV. The French arms were not quite so unfortunate on the Rhine as in Flanders. The Elector of Bavaria surprised the city of Ulm in Swabia, by a stratagem, and then declared for France, which had by this time compassed all the advantages the French general had desired. The attack on Ratisbon, were so incensed at his conduct in seizing the city of Ulm by perfidy, that they presented a memorial to his imperial majesty, requesting he would proceed against the elector, according to the constitutions of the empire. They resolved, by an edict of September, to change the name of the empire against the French king and the Duke of Anjou, for having invaded several fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbishop of Cologne, and the duke of Lorraine; and they forbade the ministers of Bavaria and Cologne to appear in the general diet. In vain did these powers protest against their proceedings. The emperor's declaration of war was published and notified, in the name of the apex of the general diet and the emperor's commissioner. Meanwhile the French made themselves masters of Neuburgh, in the circle of Swabia, while Louis Prince of Baden, being weakened by sending off detachments, was obliged to retreat in his camp near Freddingeun. The French army was divided into two bodies, commanded by the Marquis de Villars and the Count de Guiscard; and the prince thinking himself in danger of being enclosed by the enemy, resolved to decamp. Villars is said to have been very desirous of falling upon his retreat, and an obstinate engagement ensuing, the imperialists were overpowered by numbers. The prince, having lost two thousand men, abandoned the field of battle to the enemy, and the French army, after having looted and murdered, retired towards Stauften, without being pursued. The French army, even after they had gained the battle, were unaccountably seized with such a panic, that if the imperial general had faced them with two regiments, he would have snatched the victory from Villars, who was upon this occasion saluted Marschal of France by the soldiers; and next day the town of Freddingen surrendered. The prince being joined by some troops under General Zhugden, and other reinforcements, resolved to give battle to the enemy; but Villars declined an engagement, and repulsed the Rhine. Towards the latter end of October, Count Tallard, and the Marquis de Lorraine, the latter of whom possessed the bank of eighteen miles of Turin and Tannau; on the other hand, the Prince of Hess-Cassel, with a detachment from the allied army at Liege, retook from the French the towns of Zinz, Lintz, Brussel, and Ansbach.

§ XV. In Italy, Prince Eugene laboured under a total neglect of the imperial court, where his enemies, on pretext of supporting the King of the Romans in his first campaign, had the effect of the army and money of the Emperor Philip of Spain, being inspired with the ambition of putting an end to the war in this country, sailed in person for Naples, where he was visited by the cardinal-legate, with a compliment from the Pope; yet he could not obtain the investiture of the kingdom from his holiness. The emperor, however, was so disgusted at the embassy which the Pope had sent to Philip, that he ordered him to be arrested and imprisoned. He proceeded from Naples to Finali, under convoy of the French fleet, which had brought him to Italy: here he had an interview with the Duke of Savoy, who began to be alarmed at the prospect of the French king's being master of the Milanese: and, in a letter to the Duke of Vendome, he forbad him to engage Prince Eugene until he himself should arrive in the camp. Prince Eugene, understanding that the French army intended to attack Luzzara and Guastalla, passed the Po, with an army of about half the number of the enemy, and posted himself behind the dyke of Zero, in such a manner that the French were ignorant of his situation. He concluded, that on their arrival at the ground they had chosen, the horse would march out to forage, while the rest of the army would be employed in pitching tents, and providing for their refreshment. His design was to seize that opportunity of attacking them, not ambushed at Rome, which he obtained a complete victory, but he was disappointed by mere accident. An adjutant, with an advanced guard, had the curiosity to ascend the dyke, in order to view the country, when he discovered the imperial infantry lying in the rear, and ordered a discharge of musketry, which the prince attacked with them great vivacity, in hopes of disordering their line, which gave way in several places; but night interposing, he was obliged to desist: and in a few days the French reduced Luzzara and Guastalla. The prince, however, maintained his post, and Philip returned to Spain, without having obtained any considerable advantage.

The French king employed all his artifice and intrigues in raising up new enemies against the confederates. He is said to have bribed Count Mansfield, president of the council of war at Vienna, to withhold the supplies from Prince Eugene in Italy. At the Ottoman Porte he had actually gained over the vizir, who engaged to new the war with the emperor. But the success and all the other great officers were averse to this design, and the vizir fell a sacrifice to their resentment. Louis continued to employ the king of Spain, and the latter was of a very different disposition. The young King of Sweden advanced to Lusin, where he defeated Augustus. Then he took possession of Cracow, and raised contributions: nor could he be disheartened by the disastrous conclusion of the naval combat of Lissa, where the French and English, under Admiral Hovs and Lieutenant General Amoufour, had ravaged Livonia, and even made an irruption into Sweden.

The operations of the combined squadrions at sea did not fully answer the expectation of the public. On the twelfth day of May, Sir John Munden sailed with twelve ships to intercept a French squadron appointed as a convoy to a new victory of Mexico, from Corunna to the West Indies. On the twenty-eighth day of the month, he chased fourteen sail of French ships into Corunna. Then he called a council of war, in which it was agreed, that as the place was strongly fortified, and that seventeen of the enemy's ships of war rode at anchor in the harbour, it would be too hazardous for them to follow the latter part of their instructions, by which they were directed to cruise in soundings for the protection of the trade. They returned accordingly, and being distressed by want of provisions, anchored off the town of Galicia. For the satisfaction of the people, Sir John Munden was tried by a court-martial, and acquitted; but as this miscarriage had rendered him very unpopular, Prince George dismissed him from the fleet. While they were bickering, that King William had projected a scheme to reduce Cadiz, with intention to act afterwards against the Spanish settlements in the West Indies. This design Queen Anne resolved to put in execution. Sir George Cooke commanded the fleet, and the Duke of Ormond was appointed general of the land-forces destined for this expedition.

The combined squadrions amounted to fifty ships of the line, exclusive of frigates, fire-ships, and smaller vessels; and the number of soldiers embarked was not far short of fourteen thousand. In the latter end of June the fleet sailed from St. Helen's: on the twelfth of August they had arrived between the Ormond and the Horse. On this day the Duke of Ormond summoned the Duke of Brancaco, who was governor, to submit to the house of Austria; but that officer answered, he would acquiesce himself in the trust in posed in him by the king. On the fifteenth the Duke of Ormond landed with his forces in the bay of Bulls, under cover of a smart fire from some frigates, and repulsed a body of Spanish cavalry; then he summoned the governor of Fort St. Catherine's to surrender; and received an answer, importing, that the garrison was prepared for his reception. A declaration was published in the Spanish languages, intimating, that the allies did not come as enemies to Spain; but only to free them from the yoke of France, and assist them in establishing themselves under the government of the house of Austria. These professions produced very little effect among the Spaniards, who were more cooled in their attachment to that family, or provoked by the excesses of the English troops. These having taken possession of Fort St. Catherine, and Port St. Mary's, instead of protecting, plundered the natives, notwithstanding the strict orders issued by the Duke of Ormond to prevent such acts: even some general officers were concerned in the pilage. A battery was raised against Montaguport fort opposite to the Puntal: but the attempt miscarried, and the troops were re-enjoined.

§ XVIII. Captain Hardy having been sent to water in Laoro bay, received intelligence that the galleons from the West Indies had put into Vigo, under convoy of a French squadron. He sailed immediately in quest of Sir George Cooke's squadron, who was now on his voyage back to England, falling in with him on the sixth day of October, communicated the substance of what he had learned. Cooke immediately called a council of war, in which it was determined to allay their fears, and attack. He forthwith detached some small vessels for intelligence, and received a confirmation, that the galleons, and the squadron commanded by Chateau Renaut, were actually in the harbour. They sailed thither, and appeared before the place on the eleventh day of October. The entrance into the harbour was narrow, secured by batteries, forts, and breast-works on each side: by a strong boom, consisting of iron chains, topmasts, and cables, moored at each end to a several islands, and the earth at the bases of ships of the same strength lying athwart the channel, with their broad-sides to the olling. As the first and second rates of the combined fleets were too large to enter, the design was to force the English, and four-and-twenty English and Dutch ships of the line with their frigates, fire-ships, and ketches, were destined for the service. In order to facilitate the attack, the Duke of Ormond landed with five-and-twenty hundred men, at the distance of six miles from Vigo, and took by assault a fort and platform of forty pieces of cannon, at the entrance of the harbour. The British ensign was no sooner seen flying at the top of this fort, than the ships advanced to the attack. Vice-Admiral Hopson, in the Torbay, crowing all his sail, ran directly against the boom, which was broken by the first shock; then the whole squadron entered the harbour, through a prodigious fire from the enemy's ships and batteries. These last, however, were soon stunned and taken by the grenadiers who had been landed. The great ships lay against the forts at each side of the harbour, which in a little time they silenced; though Vice-Admiral Gage, on the Looe, was so much excited, which he was boarded. After a very vigorous engagement, the French, finding themselves unable to cope with such an adversary, resolved to destroy their ships and galleons, that they might not provide the hands and practices. They accordingly burned and ran ashore eight ships and as many advice-boats; but ten ships of war were taken together with eleven galleons. Though they had secured the best part of their plate and merchandise before the English fleet was in sight, the loss of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, was de-strayed in six galleons that perished; and about half that value was brought off by the conquerors; so that this was a dreadful blemish to the enemy, and a noble acquisition to the allies. Immediately after that exploit, Sir George Rooke was joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who had been sent out with a squadron to intercept the galleons. This officer was left to bring home the prizes, and dispose of the fortifications, while Rooke returned in triumph to England.

§ XIX. The glory which the English acquired in this expedition was in some measure tarnished by the conduct of the allies. Immediately after that exploit, Sir George Benbow had been detached with a squadron of ten sail, in the course of the preceding year. At Jamaica he received intelligence, that Monsieur Du Casse was in the neighbourhood of Hispaniola, and resolved to beat up to that island. At Leogane he fell in with a French ship of fifty guns, which her captain ran ashore and blew up. He took several other vessels, and having alarmed Petit-Guavas, bore away for Donna Maria bay, where he understood that Du Casse had sailed for the coast of Carthagena. Benbow resolved to follow the same course, and on the nineteenth of August discovered the enemy’s squadron near St. Martha, consisting of ten sail, steering along shore. He found no engagements, and as it appeared, in which it was very ill seconded by some of his captains. Nevertheless, the battle continued till night, and he determined to renew it next morning, when he perceived all his ships at the same distance as for four or five hours. He was commanded by Captain George Walton, who joined him in plying the enemy with chase-guns. On the twenty-first these two ships engaged the French squadron; and the Ruby was so disabled, that the admiral was obliged to send her to the wind. He sailed away, having been commanded by Wad, was five leagues astern; and the wind changing, the enemy had the advantage of the weather gage. On the twenty-third the admiral renewed the battle, which was single, and was sustained by the returning fires of his squadron. On the 24th his leg was shattered by a chain-shot; notwithstanding which accident, he remained on the quarter-deck in a cradle, and continued the engagement. One of the largest ships of the enemy lying like a wreck upon the water, four sail of the English squadron poured their broadsides into her and then ran to leeward, without paying any regard to the signal for battle. Then the French began to draw down upon the admiral with their whole force, shot away his main top-sail-yard, and damaged his rigging in such a manner, that he was obliged to lie by and rest, while they took their disabled ship in tow. During this interval, he called a counsel of his captains, and entered into consideration with them of the behaviour of the French. He observed, that the French were very strong, and advised him to desist. He plainly perceived that he was betrayed, and with the utmost reluctance returned to Jamaica, having lost a leg, but having gained a large way in on his face, and another on his arm, while he in person attempted to board the French admiral. Exasperated at the treachery of his captains, he granted a commission to Rear-Admiral Whetten, and other officers, to hold court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudson of the Pendennis died before his trial: Kirby and Wade were convicted, and sentenced to be shot: Constable, of the威尔士, was cashiered and imprisoned: Vincent, of the Falmouth, and Ford, against the admiral’s own captain of the Breda, were convicted of having signed a paper, that they would not fight under Benbow’s command; but, as they beheld gallantly the action, the court inflicted upon them no other punishment than that of a provisional suspension. Captain Walton had likewise joined in the conspiracy, while he was handled with the fumes of intoxication; but he afterwards renounced the engagement, and fought with admirable courage in his place. The boisterous manner of Benbow had produced this base confession. He was a rough seaman; but remarkably brave, honest, and experienced. He took this miscarriage so much at heart that he became melancholy, and his grief co-operating with the fever occasioned by his wounds, put a period to his life. Wade and Kirby were sent home in the Bristol; and on their arrival at Plymouth, shot on board of the ship, by virtue of a dead warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for some time. The same preoccupation had been taken in all the western ports, in order to prevent applications in their favour.

§ XX. During these transactions, the queen seemed to be happy in the affection of her subjects. Though the continuance of the parliament was limited to six months after the king’s departure, the House of Commons, in the formality of the term was expired: and issued writs for electing another, in which the tory interest predominated. In the summer the queen gave audience to the Count de Platins, envoy extraordinary from the Elector of Hanover; then she made a progress with her husband to Oxford, Bath, and Bristol, where she was received with all the marks of the most genuine affection. The new parliament meeting on the twentieth day of October, Mr. Harley was chosen speaker. The queen in her speech declared, she had summoned them to assist her in carrying on the just and necessary war in which the nation was engaged. She desired the Commons would inspect the accounts of the public receipts and disbursements, and not allow the expenditure of the monies of the nation, without a proper account of the benefit they produced. Mr. Harley promised, that the funds assigned in the last parliament had not produced the sums granted; and that the receipts except the House of Commons, were commanded by Captain George Walton, who joined him in plying the enemy with chase-guns. On the twenty-first these two ships engaged the French squadron; and the Ruby was so disabled, that the admiral was obliged to send her to the wind. He sailed away, having been commanded by Wad, was five leagues astern; and the wind changing, the enemy had the advantage of the weather gage. On the twenty-third the admiral renewed the battle, which was single, and was sustained by the returning fires of his squadron. On the 24th his leg was shattered by a chain-shot; notwithstanding which accident, he remained on the quarter-deck in a cradle, and continued the engagement. One of the largest ships of the enemy lying like a wreck upon the water, four sail of the English squadron poured their broadsides into her and then ran to leeward, without paying any regard to the signal for battle. Then the French began to draw down upon the admiral with their whole force, shot away his main top-sail-yard, and damaged his rigging in such a manner, that he was obliged to lie by and rest, while they took their disabled ship in tow. During this interval, he called a counsel of his captains, and entered into consideration with them of the behaviour of the French. He observed, that the French were very strong, and advised him to desist. He plainly perceived that he was betrayed, and with the utmost reluctance returned to Jamaica, having lost a leg, but having gained a large way in on his face, and another on his arm, while he in person attempted to board the French admiral. Exasperated at the treachery of his captains, he granted a commission to Rear-Admiral Whetten, and other officers, to hold court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudson of the Pendennis died before his trial: Kirby and Wade were convicted, and sentenced to be shot: Constable, of the威尔士, was cashiered and imprisoned: Vincent, of the Falmouth, and Ford, against the admiral’s own captain of the Breda, were convicted of having signed a paper, that they would not fight under Benbow’s command; but, as they beheld gallantly the action, the court inflicted upon them no other punishment than that of a provisional suspension. Captain Walton had likewise joined in the conspiracy, while he was handled with the fumes of intoxication; but he afterwards renounced the engagement, and fought with admirable courage in his place. The boisterous manner of Benbow had produced this base confession. He was a rough seaman; but remarkably brave, honest, and experienced. He took this miscarriage so much at heart that he became melancholy, and his grief co-operating with the fever occasioned by his wounds, put a period to his life. Wade and Kirby were sent home in the Bristol; and on their arrival at Plymouth, shot on board of the ship, by virtue of a dead warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for some time. The same preoccupation had been taken in all the western ports, in order to prevent applications in their favour.

§ XXI. The strength of the tories appeared in nothing more conspicuous than in their inquiry concerning controverted elections. The borough of Hindon, near Salisbury, was convicted of bribery, and a bill brought in for disfranchising the town; yet no vote proceeded from that borough, and none were taken there. The queen, on being informed that at the last elections the representaber to move the father from the office of lord-almoner; and they ordered the attorney-general to prosecute the son, after his privilege as member of the convocation should be expired. A counter address was immediately voted, and presented by the Lords, beseeching her majesty would not remove the Bishop of Worcester from the place of lord-almoner, which he had already found guilty of a due course of law; as it was the undoubted right of every lord of parliament, and of every subject of England, to have an opportunity to make his defence before he suffers any punishment or loss. These remonstrances were not yet received any complaint against the Bishop of Worcester: but she looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or displace any servant attending upon her own person, when she thought fit. And the Peers had received this answer, unanimously resolved, That no lord of their House ought to suffer any sort of punishment by any proceedings of the House of Commons, otherwise than according to privilege, custom, and ancient rules and methods of parliament. When the Commons attended the queen with their address against the bishop, she said she was sorry there was any occasion for such a remonstrance, and that the Bishop of Worcester should no longer continue to supply the place of her almoner. This regard to their address was a flagrant proof of her partiality to the Tories, who seemed to justify her attachment by their compliance and liberality.

§ XXIII. In deliberating on the supplies, they agreed to all the demands of the ministry. They voted forty thousand seamen, and the like number of land forces, to act in conjunction with those of the allies. For the maintenance of these last, they granted eight hundred and thirty thousand eight hundred and twenty-six pounds; besides three hundred and fifty thousand pounds for guards and garrisons; seventy thousand nine hundred and seventy-three pounds for ordnance; and fifty-one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight pounds for provisions. The Lord Shannon arriving with the news of the success at Vigo, the queen appointed a day of thanksgiving for the signal success of her arms under the Earl of Marlborough, the Duke of Ormond, and Sir George Rooke; and on that day, which was the twelfth of November, she went in state to St. Paul's church, attended by both Houses of parliament. Next day the Peers voted the thanks of their House to the Duke of Ormond for his services at Vigo, and, at the same time, drew up an address to the queen, desiring she would order the Duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, what expenses they had incurred, and what matters comprised. Those two officers were likewise thanked by the House of Commons: Vice-Admiral Hopson was knighted, and granted with a considerable pension. The Duke of Ormond, on his return from the expedition, complained openly of Rooke's conduct, alleging that he had given the enemy to a public accusation; but that officer was such a favourite among the Commons, that the court was afraid to disoblige them by an impeachment, and took great pains to mitigate the duke's resentment. This nobleman was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and Rooke was admitted into the privy council. A motion, however, being made in the House of Lords, that the admiral's instructions and journals relating to the last expedition might be examined, a committee was appointed for that purpose, and prepared an unfavourable report: but it was rejected by a majority of the House; and they voted, that Sir George Rooke had done his duty, and possessed the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honour of the British nation.

§ XXIV. On the twenty-first day of November, the queen sent a message to the House of Commons by Mr. Secretary Hedges, recommending further provisions for the prince her husband, in case he should survive her. This message being considered, Mr. Howe moved, that the yearly sum of one hundred thousand pounds should be settled on the prince, in case he should survive her majesty. No opposition was made to this, nor was the house satisfied with the clause related only to those who should be naturalized to a future reign; and indeed was calculated as a restriction upon the house of Hanover. Many members argued against the clause of exemption, because it seemed to imply, from employments in the next reign, though already possessed of the right of natural-born subjects, a consequence plainly contradictory to the meaning of the act. Others opposed it, because the Lords pressed it to be resolved by a vote. That they would not pass any bill sent up from the Commons, to which a clause foreign to the bill should be tacked; and this clause they affirmed to be a tack, as an insupportable, if not to hold employment, the clause of exemption was resolved upon. The queen expressed uncommon eagerness in behalf of this bill; and the court influence was managed so successfully, that it passed through both Houses, though it met with an obstinate opposition, and a formal protest by seven-and-twenty Peers.

§ XXV. The Earl of Marlborough, arriving in England about the latter end of November, received the thanks of the Commons for his great and signal services, which were so acceptable to the queen, that she created him a duke, gratified him with a pension of five thousand pounds upon the revenue of the post-office, during his natural life; and, in a message to the Commons, expressed a desire that they would find some method to settle it on the heir-male of his body. This intimation was productive of warm debates, during which Sir Christopher Musgrave observed, that he would not derogate from the duke's eminent services, nor should the Commons have it well paid for them, by the profitable employments which he and his duchess enjoyed. The duke, understanding that the Commons were hesitated by the subject, begged her majesty would not force her gracious message in her behalf, than create any uneasiness on his account, which might embarrass her affairs and be of ill consequence to the public. Then she went another message to the House, signifying, that the Duke of Marlborough had declined the duke's grants, and reduced the latter. The Commons in a body presented an address, acknowledging the eminent services of the Duke of Marlborough, yet expressing their apprehension of making a precedent to alienate the revenue of the crown, which had been so much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the late reign, and so lately settled and secured by her majesty's unparalleled grace and goodness. The queen was satisfied with their apology, but she refused to listen to the protestations of those who desired to alienate the duke from the tories, with whom he had been hitherto connected.

§ XXV. In the beginning of January, the queen gave the House of Commons to understand, that the attorney-general had pressed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffective the great and early preparations of the enemy. The Commons immediately resolved, that ten thousand men should be hired, as an immediate service in the event of the allies advancing against the kingdom; but on condition that an immediate stop should be put to all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain on the part of the States-general. The Lords presented an address to the queen on the same subject, and to the same effect; and she owned that the condition was absolutely necessary for the good of the whole alliance. The Dutch, even after the declaration of war, had carried on a traffic with the French, and, at this very juncture, Louis found it impossible to make remittances of money to the Elector of Bavaria in Germany, and to his forces in Italy, except through the channel of English, Dutch, and Geneva merchants. The States-general, though shocked at the impious manner in which the parliament of England prescribed their conduct, complied with the demand without hesitation, and published a prohibition of all commerce with the subjects of France and Spain. considered them as enroaching schematics that disgraced and endangered the hierarchy; and those of their own communion who recommended moderation, they branded with the epithets of lukewarm Christians, betrayers, and apostates. They now resolved to improve the themselves zealous sons of the church, by seizing the first opportunity that was in their power to distress the dissenters. In order to pave the way to this persecution, sermons were preached explicitly, most plain, to blacken the character of the sect, and inflame the popular resentment against them. On the fourth day of November, Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Annesley, were ordered by the House to bring in a bill for preventing occasional congregation. In the preamble, all persecution for conscience-sake was condemned: nevertheless, it enacted, That all those who had taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust, or the magnificacy of corporations, and afterwards frequented any meeting of dissenters, should be disqualified from holding their employments, pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and five pounds for every day in which they continued to act in their employments after having been at any such meeting: they were also rendered incapable of holding any other employment, till after one whole year's consecration; and, upon a relapse, the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled. The promoters of the bill, to make it more plausible and satisfying the church, were absolutely necessary, when so many impious men pretended to inspiration, and deluded such numbers of the people: that the most effectual way to preserve this superstition was to be the most absolute power in the hands of those who expressed their regard to the church in their principles and practice: that the parliament, by the corporation and test acts, thought they had raised a sufficient banner to the holy cause, never imagining that a set of men would rise up, whose conscience would be too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them: that, as the last reign began with an act in favour of dissenters, so the Commons were determined to carry the present House's ascent of the English government, an act should pass in favour of the church of England: that this bill did not intermingle on the act of toleration, or deprive the dissenters of any privileges they enjoyed by law, or add any thing to the legal rights of the church of England: that occasional consecration was an evasion of the law, by which the dissenters might insinuate themselves into the management of all corporations: that a separation from the church, to which a man's conscience will allow him occasionally to conform, is a mere schism, which in itself was sinful, without the superaddition of a temporal law to make it an offence: that the toleration was interfered with tender conscience, and not to give a licence for occasional conformity: that conforming and non-conforming were contradictions; for nothing but a firm persuasion that the terms of consecration required are sinful and unlawful could justify the one; and this plainly condemns the other. The members who opposed the bill argued, that the dissenters were generally well affected to the present constitution: that to bring any real hardship upon them, or give rise to jealousies and fears at such a juncture, might be attended with dangerous consequences: that the toleration had greatly contributed to the security and reputation of the church, and plainly proved, that liberty of conscience and gentle measures were the most effectual means for increasing the威力 of the church, and diminishing the number of dissenters: that the dissenters could not be termed schematics without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not tolerated such schism, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were more severe than those which the laws imposed on papists, for assisting at the most solemn act of their religion: in a word, that toleration had brought peace and union, whereas persecution had never failed to excite discord, and extend superstition. Many attentions and mitigations were proposed, without effect. In the course

§ XXVII. The Lords, apprehensive that the Commons would take it to some money bill, voted, That the annexing any clause to a money bill was contrary to the constitution of the English government, and the usage of parliament. The bill met with a very warm opposition in the upper House. It was a preparatory step towards a repeal of the toleration; and others concluded that the promoters of the bill designed to raise such disturbances at home as would discourage the allies abroad, and render the prosecution of the war impracticable. The majority of the bishops, and among those Barnet of Sarum, objected against it on the principles of moderation, and from motives of conscience. Nevertheless, as the court supported this measure with its own power and influence, the bill made its way through the House, though without alterations and amendments, which were rejected by the Commons. The lower House pretended, that the Lords had no right to alter any fines and penalties that the Commons had imposed. The Commons, however, on the supposition, that those were matters concerning money, the peculiar province of the lower House: the Lords ordered a three minute inquiry to be made into all the proceedings of the Commons, that a roll of parliamentary transactions might be made, and a great number of instances were found, in which the Lords had laid the clauses imposing fines and penalties, altered the penalties which had been fixed by the Commons, and even that the fines to which they were applied. These precedents were entered in the books: but the Commons resolved to maintain their point without engaging in any dispute upon the subject. After warm debates, and a free conference between the two Houses, the Lords resolved, or, in the Commons's asuse of a phrase, an act should pass in favour of the church of England; that this bill did not intermingle on the act of toleration, or deprive the dissenters of any privileges they enjoyed by law, or add any thing to the legal rights of the church of England: that occasional consecration was an evasion of the law, by which the dissenters might insinuate themselves into the management of all corporations: that a separation from the church, to which a man's conscience will allow him occasionally to conform, is a mere schism, which in itself was sinful, without the superaddition of a temporal law to make it an offence: that the toleration was interfered with tender conscience, and not to give a licence for occasional conformity: that conforming and non-conforming were contradictions; for nothing but a firm persuasion that the terms of consecration required are sinful and unlawful could justify the one; and this plainly condemns the other. The members who opposed the bill argued, that the dissenters were generally well affected to the present constitution: that to bring any real hardship upon them, or give rise to jealousies and fears at such a juncture, might be attended with dangerous consequences: that the toleration had greatly contributed to the security and reputation of the church, and plainly proved, that liberty of conscience and gentle measures were the most effectual means for increasing the威力 of the church, and diminishing the number of dissenters: that the dissenters could not be termed schematics without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not tolerated such schism, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were more severe than those which the laws imposed on papists, for assisting at the most solemn act of their religion: in a word, that toleration had brought peace and union, whereas persecution had never failed to excite discord, and extend superstition. Many attentions and mitigations were proposed, without effect. In the course of the debates, the dissenters were mentioned and reviled with great animosity; and the bill passed the lower House by virtue of a considerable majority.

§ XXVIII. No object engaged more time, or produced more violent debates, than did the inquiry into the public accounts. The commissioners appointed for this purpose pretended to have made great discoveries. They charged the Earl of Ranalegh, pay master-general of the army, with flagrant mismanagement. He acquitted himself in such a manner as screened him from all severity of punishment: notwithstanding, they expelled him from his office of paymaster, and his place was given to one who had been in the House a high council, and misdemeanor, in mislaying several sums of the public money; and he thought proper to resign his employment. A long address was prepared and presented to the queen, attributing the national debt to mismanagement of the funds; complaining that the old methods of the exchequer had been neglected; and that iniquitous frauds had been committed by the commissioners of the taxes. Previous to this remonstrance, the House, sitting in the character of a committee, had passed several severe resolutions, particularly against Charles Lord Halifax, auditor of the receipt of the exchequer, as having neglected his duty, and been guilty of a breach of the common hangman, and the author to be prosecuted. He was accordingly committed to Newgate, tried, convicted to pay a fine of two hundred pounds, and stand in the pillory.

While this bill was depending, Daniel de Foe published a pamphlet entitled, 'The Present State of the Dissenters,' in which he advanced the opinion, that the House of Commons was a faction, and that the members, particularly those of the two parties, were devoted to the interest of the party. The Commons ordered it to be burned by the
of trust. For these reasons they actually besought the queen, in an address, that she would give directions to the attorney-general, to prosecute him for the said offences; and she promised to comply with their request. On the other hand, the Lords appointed a committee to examine all the observations which the commissioners of accounts had offered to both Houses. They ascribed the national debt to an unwise expenditure on the part of the former, and discovered that Lord Halifax, the lords of the treasury, and their officers, whom the Commons had accused; and represented these circumstances in an address to the queen, which was afterwards to depart from the archbishop's right of revising the whole conviction with consent of his suffragans. The lower House proposed to refer the controversy to the queen's decision. The bishops declined this expedient, as inconsistent with the episcopal authority, and the prejudice of the archbishop. The lower House having cured the imputation of favouring presbytery, by this opposition to the bishops, entered in their books a declaration, acknowledging the order of bishops as superior to presbyters, and to be a divine instituted office. Then they desired the bishops, in an address, to concur in settling the doctrine of the divine apostolical right of episcopacy, that it might be a standing rule of the church. They likewise proposed to ordain, that in the case of convocation, that in the convocation called in the year 1700, after interruption of ten years, several questions having arisen concerning the rights and liberties of the lower House, the bishops conferred a conference, and after the bishops had declined a proposal to submit the dispute to her majesty's determination: they, therefore, fled for protection to her majesty, begging she would call the question into her own royal audience. The queen promised to consider their request by the bill not having been ordered of an accommodation. The Lords ordered their proceedings to be printed, and the Commons followed their example. On the twenty-seventh day of February the queen, having passed the bills for an additional revenue, intimated to the lower House by the speaker that the business was then adjourned, and ordered the lord-keeper to prorogue the parliament, after having pronounced a speech, in the usual style. She thanked them for their zeal, affection, and dispatch; declared she would encourage and maintain the church as by law established; desired they would consider some further laws for restraining the great licence assumed for publishing scandalous pamphlets and libels; and assured them that all her share of the prizes which might be taken in the war should be applied to the public service. By this time the Earl of Rochester was entirely removed from the queen's councils. Finding himself out-weighted by the interest of the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Godolphin, he proposed to the Houses, to make a representation to his majesty, to have permission to repair to his government of Ireland, chose to resign the office, which, as we have already observed, was conferred upon the Duke of Ormond, a distinguished nobleman, who professed, revolution was the only way to prevent the attack of the neighbouring provinces; the queen declined to ac- cept him, and no answer was made to their address. The archbishop replied to their request presented to the upper House, concerning the divine right of presbytery, that the prejudice to the form of ordination contained a declaration of the titles of ministers from the times of the apostles; namely, bishops, presbyters, and deacons, to which they had subscribed; but he and his brethren conceived, that, without a royal licence, they had not authority to attempt, enact, promulge, or exercise any canon, which should concern either doctrine or discipline. The lower House answered this declaration in very petulant terms; and the dispute subsisted when the parliament was prorogued. But these contests proceeded in the present body, the members having changed themselves in different factions, distinguished by the names of high-church and low-church. The first consisted of ecclesiastical tories; the other included those who were principal in council, and maintained a violent conten- tion towards the dissenters. The high-church party re- pealed the other as time-servers, and presbyterians in disguise; and were, in their turn, stigmatized as the friends and adherents of tyranny and persecution. At present, however, the tories both in church and state triumphed in the favour of their sovereign. The right of parliaments, the memory of the late king, and even the act limiting the succession of the house of Hanover, became the subjects of ridicule. The queen was flattered as possessor of the prerogatives of the ancient monarchy; the history written by her grandfather, the Earl of Clarendon, was now for the first time published, to decorate the principles of obedience, and inspire the people with an adherence of opposition to an anomalous sovereignty. Her majesty's hereditary right was deduced from Edward the Confessor, and, as heir of his pretended sanctity and virtue, she was persuaded to touch the crown. The persons afflicted with the arbitrary evil, according to the office inserted in the liturgy for this occasion.

§ XXX. The change of the ministry in Scotland seemed favourable to the episcopalian and anti-revolutionists of that kingdom. The Earls of Malmouth, Melvil, Selkirk, (in the county of Kincardine, added Baron Granville of Potterside in the county of Devon, Hon. Mr. Earl, Baronet of Constable in the county of York, and 2d. of Lewes, created Earl of Selkirk, Baronet of St. Michael's, and Lord of the manors of Normandy in the county of Yorkshire, and Francis Seymour, youngest son of Sir Edward Seymour, made Baron Cowley of Ragley in the county of Warwick. At the same time, however, John Harvey of the opposite faction, was created Baron Newcomen of Newcomen in the county of Warwick, and Lord of the manors of Normandy. The title of Duke of Buckingham was bestowed on the Marquis of Queensberry, by the earl of Selkirk, and the earl of Malmouth, and the earl of Selkirk. These were John Granville, created Baron Granville of Potterside in the county of Devon, Hon. Mr. Earl, Baronet of Constable in the county of York, and 2d. of Lewes, created Earl of Selkirk, Baronet of St. Michael's, and Lord of the manors of Normandy in the county of Yorkshire, and Francis Seymour, youngest son of Sir Edward Leven, and Hyndford, were laid aside: the Earl of Seafield was appointed chancellor: the Duke of Queensberry, and the Lord Viscount Tarbat, were declared secretaries of state: the Marquis of Annandale was made president of the council, and the Earl of Tullibardine lord privy-seal.

A new parliament having been summoned, the Earl of Seafield employed his influence so successfully, that a great number of anti-revolutioners were returned as members.

The Duke of Hamilton believed it necessary to write a letter to the privy council in Scotland, in which he expressed his desire that the presbyterian clergy should live in brotherly love and communion with such dissenting ministers as might be reformed and restored in possession of their old benefices, and lived with decency, and submission to the law. The episcopal clergy, encouraged by these expressions in their favour, drew up an address to the queen, imploring her protection; and humbly beseeching her to allow those parishes in which there was a majority of episcopal freeholders, to bestow the benefice on ministers of their principles. This petition was presented by Dr. Sken and Dr. Scott, who were introduced by the Duke of Queensberry to her majesty. She assured them of her protection and endeavours to supply their necessities; and exhorted them to live in peace and Christian love with the clergy, who were by law invested with the church-governments of the kingdom. A strong declamation of indemnity having been published in March, a great number of Jacobites returned from France and other countries, pretended to have changed their sentiments; of such acts as might be qualified to sit in parliament. They formed an access to the strength of the anti-revolutioners and episcopalian, who now hoped to outnumber the presbyterians, and outweigh their interest. But this confidence was composed of distant parts, from which no harmony could be expected. The presbyterians and revolutioners were headed by the Duke of Argyll. The country party of malcontents, consisting of the Marquis of Annandale, the Earl of the Darien settlement, acted under the auspices of the Duke of Hamilton and Marquis of Tweedale; and the Earl of Hume appeared as chief of the anti-revolutioners.

The different parties, who now united, pursued the most opposite ends. The majority of the country party were friends to the revolution, and sought only redress of the grievances which the nation had sustained to the late reign. The anti-revolutioners considered the accession and government of King William as an extraordinary event, which they were willing to forget, believing the crown safe under the protection of her majesty's general indemnity. The Jacobites submitted to this new state as a tutrix or regent for the Prince of Wales, whom they firmly believed she intended to establish on the throne.

The whigs under Argyll, alarmed at the coalition of all the Presbyterian parties, resolved to procure a parliamentary sanction for the revolution.

SECTION XXXI. The parliament being opened on the sixth day of May at Edinburgh, by the Duke of Queensberry as commissioner, the queen's letter was read, in which she demanded a supply for the maintenance of the forces, advised them to encourage trade, and exhorted them to proceed with wisdom, prudence, and unanimity. The Duke of Hamilton immediately offered the draft of a bill for recognising her majesty's undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the estates of Scotland, containing the claim of right. It was immediately received; and, at the second reading, the queen's advocate offered an additional clause, denouncing the penalties of treason against any person who should question her majesty's right and title to the crown, or her execution of the government, from her access to the throne. This, after a long and warm debate, was carried by the concurrence of the anti-revolutioners. Then the Earl of Hume produced the draft of a bill for the supply: immediately it was read, the parliament made an ouvert, that, before all other business, the parliament would proceed to make such conditions of government, and regulations in the constitution of the kingdom, to take place after the decease of her majesty and the heirs of her body, as should be necessary for the preservation of their religion and liberty. This overture and the bill for the supply, being discussed, the king, in the meantime, the commissioner found himself involved in great perplexity. The Duke of Argyll, the Marquis of Annandale, and the Earl of Marchmont, gave him to understand in private, that they were resolved to move for the supply of the kingdom, in order to secure the preservation of the Presbyterian government: that they would insist upon their being discussed before the bill of supply, and that they were certain of carrying the points at which they proposed to alter the constitution. There appeared to be a very disagreeable alternative. There was a necessity for relinquishing all hope of a supply, or abandoning the anti-revolutioners, to whom he was connected by promises of concurrence. The whigs were determined to oppose all schemes of supply that should come from the cavaliers; and these last resolved in exert their whole power in preventing the confirmation of the revolution and the Presbyterian discipline. He foresaw that on this occasion the whigs would be joined by the Duke of Hamilton and his party, so as to preponderate against the cavaliers. He endeavoured to cajole both parties: but found the task impracticable. He desired in parliament, that the act for the supply of the kingdom might be considered. A full time afterwards to deliberate on other subjects. The Marquis of Tweedale insisted upon his overture: and after warm debates, the House resolved to proceed with the bill for the supply, and that the revolution, the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and all acts of liberty, and trade of the nation, before any bill for supply or other business should be discussed. The Marquis of Atholl offered an act for the security of the kingdom, in case of her majesty's decease; but, before it was read, the Duke of Argyll presented his draft of a bill for ratifying the revolution, and all the acts following thereupon. An act for limiting the succession after the death of her majesty, and the heirs of her body, was produced by Mr. St. Locket or the Duke of Hamilton. The Duke of Argyle, importing, that, after her majesty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no person coming to the crown of Scotland, being at the same time King or Queen of England, should, as King or Queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the consent of parliament. The Earl of Marchmont recited the draft of an act for securing the true Protestant religion and Presbyterian government; one was also suggested by Sir Patrick Johnson, allowing the importation of wines, and other foreign liquors. All these bills were ordered to lie on the table. Then the Earl of Strathmore produced an act for toleration to all prostandats in the exercise of their religion, or another, importing, that, after her majesty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no person coming to the crown of Scotland, being at the same time King or Queen of England, should, as King or Queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the consent of parliament. The Earl of Marchmont recited the draft of an act for securing the true Protestant religion and Presbyterian government, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only government of Christ's church within the kingdom. The same party enjoyed a further triumph in the success of Argyll's act, for ratifying and perpetuating the first act of King William's parliament: for declaring it high treason to disown the authority of that parliament, or to alter or remove the claim of right, or the laws thereof. This last clause was strenuously opposed; but at last the bill passed, with the concurrence of all the ministry, except the Marquis of Atholl and the Viscount Tarbat, who began at this period to correspond with the opposite party.

SECTION XXXII. The cavaliers thinking themselves betrayed by the Duke of Queensberry, who had assented to these acts, first expostulated with him on his breach of promise, and then brought against him their action to the court, and jointly pursue such measures as might be for the interest of their party. But of all the bills that were produced in the course of this revolution, the most remarkable was the bill of Tweeddale: the reason of the alteration was the act of security, calculated to abridge the prerogative of the crown, limit the successor, and throw a vast additional power into the hands of the paramount authority.
lament. It was considered paragraph by paragraph; many additions and alterations were proposed, and some adopted; inflammatory speeches were uttered; bitter sarcastic remarks from party to party, diversified the scene. At length, in spite of the most obstinate opposition from the ministry and the cavaliers, it was passed by a majority of fifty-nine voices. The commissioner was importuned to give it the royal assent; but his answer was, "I am toogreat a man to associate with the very meanest." The ministry then adjourned, and the committee was raised. The earl offered the question of a vote, whether they should first give a reading to Fletcher's act or to the act of subsidy. The country party moved that the question might be, "Overtures for subsidies, or overtures for liberty." Fletcher disapproved of it, rather than people should pervert the meaning of laudable designs. The House responded with the cry of Liberty or Subsidy. Bitter invective was uttered against the short adjournment of die day. Should be made by the parliament themselves, as in England; and no officer in the army, customs, or excise, nor any gratuitous pensioner, should sit as an elective member. The commissioner being apprised of their proceedings, called for such acts as he was empowered to pass, and having given the royal assent to them, prorogued the parliament to the twelfth day of October. Such was the issue of this remarkable session of the Scottish parliament, in which the Duke of Ormond had been so long a member of the ministry; and such a spirit of ferocity and opposition prevailed, as threatened the whole kingdom with civil war and confusion. The queen conferred titles upon those who have indubitably brought about the throne, and attachment to her government, and revived the order of the thistle, which the late king had dropped.

XXXIV. Ireland was filled with discontent, by the behavioir and conduct of the trustees for the forfeited estates. The Earl of Rochester had contributed to foment the troubles of the kingdom, by encouraging the faction which had been imported from England. The Duke of Ormond was received with open arms, as heir to the virtues of his ancestors, who had been the bulwarks of the protestant interest in Ireland. He opened the parliament on the twenty-first day of September, with a speech to both Houses, in which he told them, that his inclination, his interest, and his example of hard labor, had insuperable obligations upon him, to improve every opportunity to the advantage and prosperity of his native country. The Commons having chosen Allen Brodofek to be their speaker, proceeded to draw up very offensive ad supplies, when they found themselves frustrated of all their labour and expense for these several months; and when the whole kingdom saw that supplies served for no other use but to gratify the avarice of some unsuitable ministers. Mr. Fletcher explained, and observed, that the most objectionable part of that which would arise from the act which he had proposed. The chancellor answered, that such an act was laying a scheme for a commonwealth, and tending to innovate the constitution of the monarchy. It destroyed the idea of a vote, whether they should first give a reading to Fletcher's act or the act of subsidy. The country party moved that the question might be, "Overtures for subsidies, or overtures for liberty." Fletcher disapproved of it, rather than people should pervert the meaning of laudable designs. The House responded with the cry of Liberty or Subsidy. Bitter invective was uttered against the short adjournment of the day. Dresses to the queen and the lord-lieutenant. In that to the queen they complained, that their enemies had misrepresented them, as desirous of being independent of the crown; and that, they, therefore, neither repudiate themselves from such false aspersions, declared and acknowledged, that the kingdom of Ireland was annexed and united to the imperial crown of England. In order to express their hatred of the forfeited estates, they resolved, that all the Protestant freeholders of that kingdom had been falsely and maliciously misrepresented, traduced, and abused, in a book entitled, "The Report of the Commissioners appointed to inspect the Forfeited Estates." 1 France, Annesley, member of the House, John Trenchard, Henry Langford, and James Hamilton, were authors of that book, they further resolved, That these persons had scandalized, and injured the Protestant freeholders of that kingdom, and endeavoured to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the people of England and the Protestants of Ireland. Annesley was expelled the House, Hamilton was dealt, and Trenchard had returned to England. They had finished the inquiry before the meeting of this parliament; and sold, at an under-value, the best of the forfeited estates to the sword-blade company of England. Thus, in a petition to the sword-blade company of England, they brought in for enabling them to take conveyance of lands in Ireland; but the parliament was very little disposed to confirm the bargains of the trustees, and the petition lay neglect of the Table. The House of Commons, who, as agent to the sword-blade company, had offered to lend money to the public in Ireland, on condition that the parliament would pass an act to confirm the company's purchases of the forfeited estates. His constituents disapproved his proposal; and when he was summoned to appear before the House, and answer for his prosecution, he pleaded his privilege, as member of the English parliament, in respect of the grievances of the nation, gave her Majesty to understand, that the constitution of Ireland had been of late greatly shaken; and their lives, liberties, and estates called into question, and tried in a sentence unknown to their ancestors; that the expense to which they had been unnecessarily exposed by the late trustees for the forfeited estates, in defending their just rights and titles, had exceeded in value the current cash of the kingdom; that their trade was decayed, their money exhausted; and that they were hindered from maintaining their own manufactures; that many Protestant families had been constrained to quit the kingdom, in order to earn a livelihood in foreign countries: that the army, now in the Highlands, was supported, from the expense of their arms and money; and to maintain a correspondence with the disaffected in England. The House immediately resolved, that the patent of the crown should be conveyed, and all hopes of the accession of the person known by the name of the Prince of Wales in the life-time of the late King James, and now by the name of James III. In the midst of this zeal against popery and the pretender, they were suddenly adjourned by the command of the lord-lieutenant, and broke up in great animosity against that nobleman. 2

§ XXXVI. The attention of the English ministry had been for some time chiefly engrossed by the affairs of the continent. The emperor agreed with the allies, that his son the Archduke Charles should assume the title of King of Spain, demand the Infanta of Portugal in marriage, and undertake something of importance, with the assistance of the monarch of England. King William, of Ireland; had endeavored to force a man to oppress the subjects: that many civil officers had acquired great fortunes in that impoverished country, by the exercise of corruption and oppression. The minister, in his employments, resolved in another kingdom, neglecting personal attendance on their duty, while their offices were ill-executed, to the detriment of the public, and the failure of justice. They declared, that it was from her Majesty's gracious interposition alone they proposed to themselves relief from those many manifold grievances and misfortunes. The Commons afterwards voted the necessary supplies, and granted one hundred and fifty thousand pounds to make good the deficiencies of the necessary branches of the establishment.

§ XXXV. They appointed a committee to inspect the public accounts, by which they discovered, that above one hundred thousand pounds had been falsly charged and debited upon the nation. The committee was thanked by the House for having saved this sum, and ordered to examine what persons were concerned in such a misrepresentation, which was generally imputed to those who acted under the Duke of Ormond. He himself was a nobleman of honour and generosity, addicted to pleasure, and fond of popular applause; but he was surrounded by people of more social principles, who had ingratiated themselves into his confidence by the arts of adulation. The Commons voted a provision for the half-pay officers; and aboli- 1 They had besides the bills already mentioned passed an act for an additional excise on beer, ale, and other liquors; another encouraging the importation of iron and slaves a third for preventing popish priests from battle; then he marched against the Saxen troops which guarded the artillery; and attacked them with such impetuosity, that they were entirely defeated. In a few days after these actions he took Newburgh on the Inn by capitulation. He obtained another advantage over an advanced post of the imperialists near Burglenfent, commanded by the young Prince of Brandenburg Anspach, who was mortally wounded in the engagement. He advanced to Hatzabon, where the diet of the empire was held, and demanded the unconditional surrender of the bridge and gate of the city. The burghers immediately took to their arms, and planted cannon on the ramparts; but when they saw a battery erected against their city walls, they suspended the attack, which they thought proper to capitulate, and comply with his demands. He took possession of the town on the eighth day of April, and signed an instrument obliging himself to withdraw his troops, as soon as the emperor should ratify the diet’s resolution for the neutrality of Hatzabon. Marce- schal Villars having received orders to join the elector at all events, and being reinforced by a body of troops under Count Tylland, resolved to break through the lines which the Prince of Baden had made at Stolboffen. This general had been luckily joined by eight Dutch battalions, and received the French army, though double his number, with but little advantage; for they retired in perfect retreat with great loss, and directed his rout towards Offingen. Nevertheless, he penetrated through the Black Forest, and effected a junction with the elector. Count Strurim endeavoured to join Prince Louis of Baden; but being attacked near Schwemmingen, retired under the cannon of Nortingen.

§ XXXVII. The confederates were more successful on the lower Rhine and in the Netherlands. The Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Trarim, Count de Ramecourt, and assembling the allied army, resolved that the campaign should be begun with the siege of Bonne, which was accordingly invested on the twenty-fourth day of April. The siege was to be conducted under the command of one by the hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel; another by the celebrated Coehorn; and a third by Lieutenant-general Fagel. The garrison defended themselves vigorously till the fourteenth day of May, when the fort having been taken by assault, and the breaches rendered practicâble, the Marquis d’Alegre, the governor, ordered a parley to be beat; hostages were immediately exchanged; on the six¬teenth the capitulation was signed; and in three days the garrison was completely reduced. The Duke of Marlborough, to annoy the army of the Dutch, having formed a plan of laying siege to Antwerp, the Dutch being informed of it, drew off to Louvain, and then proceeded to Namur, where they were invested by the Duke of Marlborough. Villars, who had been present at the siege, returned to the confederate army in the Netherlands, now amounting to one hundred and thirty squadrons, and fifty-nine bat¬talions. On the twenty-fifth day of May, the Duke having passed the River Jeker, in order to be conducted to the enemy, they marched with precipitation to Boeckern, and abandoned Tongeren, after having blown up the walls of the place with gunpowder. The duke continued to follow them to Tysis, where he encamped; while they retreated to Hannev, retiring as he advanced. Then he resolved to force their lines; this service was effectually performed by Coehorn, at the point of Callo, and by Baron Spaar, in the night, such obstructions, near Tongeren, that Villars was obliged to the design of reducing Antwerp, which was garrisoned by Spanish troops under the command of the Marquis de Bedmar. He intended with the grand army to attack the enemy on the left, to obtain another advantage over an ad¬vance post of the imperialists near Burselen, commanded by the young Prince of Brandenburg Anspach, which was guarded by the Spanish forces.

§ XXXVIII. The French generals, in order to frustrate the scheme of Marlborough, resolved to cut off the retreat of Opdam. Bouillours, with a detachment of twenty thousand men from Villersoy’s army, surprised him at Eckeren, where the Dutch garrison of Opdam and Marlborough, believing all was lost, fled to Breda. Nevertheless, Marlborough, rallying under General Schlangenhouthe, maintained their ground with the most obstinate valor, till night, when the enemy was obliged to retire, and left the communica¬tion free with Friesland, to which place he marched without further molestation, having lost about fifteen hundred men in the engagement. The damage sus¬tained by the French was more considerable. They were frustrated in their design, and had actually abandoned the field of battle: yet Louis ordered Te Deum to be sung for the victory; nevertheless, Bouillours was censured for his conduct on this occasion, and in a little time, totally dis¬graced. Opdam presented a justification of his conduct to the States-general; but by this oversight he forfeited the fruits of a long service, during which he had exhibited repeated proofs of courage, zeal, and capacity. The States-bourghed Schlangenhouthe with a letter of that valor and skill he had manifested in this engagement: but in a little time they dismissed him from his employment, on account of his having given umbrage to the Duke of Marlborough, by censuring his Grace for exposing such a small number of men to the disaster. The States-general would have Villers, who lay encamped near St. Job, declared he would wait for the Duke of Marlborough, who forthwith advanced to Hoogstraten, with a view to give him battle; but, at his approach, the French generals, the Elector, and Marlborough, having taken possession of the Bissendorf, expected his camp, retired within his lines with great precipitation. Then the Duke invested Huy, the garrison of which, after a vigorous defence, surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on the twenty-fourth of July. The whole of the army, which was held in the camp of the confederates, the duke pro¬posed to attack the enemy’s lines between the Meaigne and Louwe, and was seconded by the Danish, Hanoe¬rian, and Hessian generals: but the scheme was opposed by the Dutch officers, and the deputies of the States, who alleged that the success was dubious, and the consequences of forcing the lines would be inconsiderable: they there¬fore recommended the siege of Limburg, by the reduction of which they would acquire a whole province, and establish their own country, as well as Juliers and Guelders, from the designs of the enemy. The siege of Limburg was ac¬cordingly undertaken. The trenches were opened on the five-and-twenty of September, and the town surrendered, which was the place surrendered; the garrison remaining prisoners of war. By this conquest the allies secured the country of Li¬ege, and the electorate of Cologne, from the incursions of the enemy; before the end of the year, they remained the masters of the whole Spanish Gueldeland, by the reduc¬tion of Guelders, which surrendered on the seventeenth day of September, after having been long blockaded, bom¬barded, and reduced to a heap of ashes by the Prussian general, Letum. Such was the campaign in the Nether¬lands, which in all probability would have produced events of greater importance, had not the Duke of Marlborough been restricted by the deputies of the States-general, who began to be influenced by the views of the Louvain faction, ever averse to a single dictator.

§ XXXIX. The French king redoubled his efforts in Germany. The Duke of Vendome was ordered to march from the Milaneese to Tyrol, and join the Elector of Bavaria, who had already made himself master of Innspruck. But the boors rising in arms, drove him out of the country before he could be joined by the French general, who was, therefore, obliged to retire. The Dutch, Emperor, and Genoese - realists in Italy were so ill supplied by the court of Vienna, that they could not pretend to act offensively. The French invested Ostiglia, which, however, they could not reduce: but the fortress of Bariallo, in the duchy of the Elector of Bavaria, was taken; the duchy of Modena was occupied; and the Elector of Bavaria remaining, Villars, resolved to attack Count Strurin, whom Prince Louis of Baden had detached from his army. With this view, they passed the Danube at Donaustadt, and disengaged six guards as a signal for the Marquis D'Usson, whom they had left in the camp at Lavrug, to fall upon the rear of the imperialists, while they should charge them in front. Strum no sooner perceived the signal, than he guessed the intention of the enemy, and instantly resolved to attack them, before the messenger and the maintainers should advance. He accordingly charged him at the head of some select squadrons with such impetuosity, that the French cavalry were totally defeated; and all his infantry were either killed and taken by the elector, his brother Villars, who came up in time to turn the fate of the day. The action continued from six in the morning till four in the afternoon, when Strum being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to retire to Norlingen, with the loss of twelve thousand men, and all his baggage and artillery. In the mean time the Duke of Burgundy, assisted by Tillyard, undertook the siege of Old Brissac, with a prodigious train of artillery. The place was very strongly fortified, though the garrison was small, and ill provided with necessaries. In fourteen days, the governor surrendered the place, and was condemned to lose his head, for having made such a slender defence. The Duke of Burgundy returned in triumph, and the French forces were in readiness ordered to march upon Landau. The Prince of Hesse-Cassel being detached from the Netherlands, for the relief of the place, joined the Count of Nassau-Weilburg, general of the palatine forces, and the emperor's troops, where they intended to attack the French in their lines. But by this time Mons. Pracoental, with ten thousand men, had joined Tillyard, and enabled him to strike a stroke which proved decisive. He suddenly commenced his lines, and surprised the prince at Spirebach, where he obtained a complete victory, after furious, obstinate and bloody engagement, in which the Prince of Hesse distinguished himself by uncommon marks of courage and presence of mind. Three horses were successively killed under him, and he slew one with his own hand. After incredible efforts, he was fain to retreat with the loss of some thousands. The French paid dear for their victory, Pracoental having been slain in the action. Nevertheless, they resumed the siege, and the place was surrendered by capitulation. The campaign in Germany was finished with the reduction of Augsburg by the Elector of Bavaria, who took it in the month of December, and agreed to its being secured by a French garrison.

§ X.L. The emperor's affairs at this juncture were a very unpromising aspect. The Hungarians were fleeced, and barbarously oppressed, by those to whom he intrusted the governorship of his country. They yielded to despair. They seized this opportunity, when the emperor's forces were divided, and his counsels distracted, to exert themselves in defence of their liberties. They ran to arms, under the insufficiency of Prince Eugenio. They despaired of the guarantees which their grievances should be redressed, and their privileges restored. Their resentment was kept up by the massacres of France and Bavaria, who likewise encouraged them to persevere in their revolt, by repeated promises of protection and assistance. The emperor's prospect, however, was soon mended, by two incidents of very great consequence to his interest. The Duke of Savoy, foreseeing how much he should be exposed to the mercy of the French king, should that monarch become master of Milan, engaged in a secret negotiation with the emperor, which, notwithstanding all his caution, was discovered by the court of Versailles. Louis immediately reformed the Duke of Vendôme to disarm the troops of Savoy that were in his army, to the number of two and twenty thousand men: to insist upon the duke's putting him in possession of four considerable fortresses; and demand that the number of his troops should be reduced to the establishment stipulated in the treaty of 1696. The duke, exasperated at these insults, ordered the French ambassador, and several officers of the same nation, to be arrested, and endeavored to intimidate him by a menacing letter, in which he gave him to understand, that, since neither religion, honour, interest, nor alliances, had been able to influence his conduct, the Duke de Vendome should make known the intentions of the French monarch, and allow him four-and-twenty hours to deliberate on the measures he should pursue. This letter was answered by a manifesto: in the meantime, the duke was concluded. The Marquis D'Usson, engaged by the Archbishop of Seville as King of Spain, and sent envoys to England and Holland. Queen Anne, knowing his importance, as well as his selfish disposition, assured him of her friendship and assistance. But when he applied to Turin, he was received with the utmost friendliness, and the court of Savoy was supplied with the most respectable men, which maintained the empire of the sea; and they were allured by the splendour of a match between their infanta and the Archduke Charles, to whom the French were so kind as to surrender their pretensions to the Spanish crown. By this treaty, concluded at Lysben, between the emperor, the Queen of Great Britain, the King of Portugal, and the States-general, it was stipulated, that King Charles should be confirmed in his sovereignty, as head of the board twenty thousand soldiers, with a great supply of money, arms, and ammunition; and that he should be joined immediately upon his landing by an army of eight-and-twenty thousand Portuguese. The duke received a very little advantage from the naval operations of this summer. Sir George Rooke cruised in the channel, in order to alarm the coast of France, and protect the trade of England. On the first day of July, Sir Cloudesley Shovel sailed from St. Helen's, with the combined squadrons of England and Holland; he directed his course to the Mediterranean, and being opposed by a great fleet, by want of water, proceeded to Altea, on the coast of Valencia, where Brigadier Seymour landed, and encamped with five-and-twenty hundred men. The admiral published a short manifesto, signifying that he was not come to disturb, but to protect, the provincials. Lord Sandwich, who had observed the course of the English ships, desired them to hover near the coast, and to endeavour to intercept the trade. The duke was assisted by the Cevennians, who had in the course of the preceding year been persecuted into a revolt on account of religion, and implored the assistance of England and the States-general. The admiral detached two ships, into the gulf of Narbonne, with some refugees and French pilots, who had concerted signals with the Cevennians; but the Mareschal de Montmorency having received intimation of their design, took such measures as prevented all communication with the English; not having proper signals to no purpose, rejoined Sir Cloudesley at Léghorn. This admiral, having renewed the peace with the prudential states of Barbary, returned to England, without having taken one effectual step for annoying the enemy, or attempted any thing that looked like the result of a concerted scheme for that purpose. The nation naturally murmured at the fruitless expedition, by which it had incurred such an expensive expense. The merchants complained that they were ill supplied with conveyes. The ships of war were victualled with damaged provision; and every article of the marine being mismanaged, the blame fell upon those who acted as council to the lord high admiral.

§ X.LII. Nor were the arms of England by sea much more successful in the West Indies. Sir George Rooke, in the preceding year, had detached from the Mediterranean Captain Hovenden Walker, with six ships of the line and transports, having on board four regiments of soldiers, for the Leeward Islands. Being joined at Antigua by some troops under Colonel Codrington, they made a descent upon the island of Guadaloupe, where they razed the fort, burned the town, ravaged the country, and reembarked with precipitation, in consequence of a report that the French had landings in front of an attack of the island.
They returned to Naples, where they must have perished by famine, had not they been providentially relieved by Vice-Admiral Graydon, in his way to Jamaica.
This officer had been sent out with three ships to succeed Belcher in India, on the fourth of January, and it is probable he was met by Prince George of Denmark. The queen's departure towards him was equally noble and obliging; and he expressed the most profound respect and veneration for this illustrious princess. He spoke little; yet what he said was judicious; and he behaved with politeness and affability as connected the affection of the English nobility. After having been magnanimously entar-tained for three days, he returned to Portsmouth, from which to London, he sailed for Portugal, with a great fleet commanded by Sir George Rooke, having on board a body of land-forces, under the Duke of Schomberg. When the admiral had almost reached Cape Finis-terres, he was detected by the men of war to Newhead, where he was obliged to remain till the middle of February.
Then being favored with a fair wind, he happily performed the voyage to Lisbon, where King Charles was received with great splendor, though the course of Portugal was over-spread with sorrow, excited by the death of the infants, whom the King of Spain intended to expel. In Portugal, all hope of peace seemed to vanish. The cardinal-primate, the instigation of the Swedish king, whose army lay encamped in the neighborhood of Lisbon assembled a diet at Waraw, which solemnly deposèd Augustus, and declared the throne vacant. Their intention was to elect young Sobeski, son of their late monarch, who resided at Preslai, in Silesia; but a scheme for the restoration of Augustus, who retired hastily into his Saxons dominions, and seizing Sobeski, with his brother, secured them as prisoners at Dresden.

§ 1. When the parliament met in October, the queen in her speech took notice of the declaration by the Duke of Savor, and the treaty with Portugal, as circumstances advantageous to the alliance.
She told them, that for the sake of peace, she prayed the expedition to Lisbon, and the augmentation of the land-forces, the funds had answered so well, and the production of prices been so considerable, that the public had not run in debt by those additional services: that she had contributed out of her own revenue to the support of the circle of Stahna, whose firm adherence to the interest of the allies deserved her reasonable assistance. She said, she would not engage in any unnecessary expense of her own, that she might have the more to spare towards the ease of her subjects. She recommended despatch and union, and earnestly exhorted them to avoid any hints or divisions that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and state. Notwithstanding this admonition, and the addresses of both Houses, in which the proposed to avoid all division, a motion was made in the House of Commons for renewing the bill against occasional conformity, and carried by a great majority.

In the new draft, however, the penalties were lowered, and a clause inserted to this purpose, that the court of the crown might be equal to the king's honor, which the court of the crown was, and is, so consequently interested in the success of this measure, the House was pretty equally divided with respect to the speakers, and the debates on each side were maintained with equal spirit and ability; at length it passed and was sent up to the Lords, who handled it still more severely.

It was opposed by a small majority of the bishops, and particularly by Bunet of Sarum, who declared against it, as a scheme of the popish to set the church and prelates at variance. It was successively attacked by the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Pembroke, the Lords Haveraham, Mohun, Ferrers, and Wharton. Prince George of Denmark absented himself from the House; and the question being put for a second reading, it was carried in the negative; yet the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Godolphin entered their dissent against its being rejected, though the former had positively declared, that he thought the bill a good one to take the question. The Commons then had a copy of the treaty with Portugal, voted forty thousand men, including five thousand marines, for the sea service of the ensuing year; and a like number of land-forces, to act with the allies. The bill was then carried by ten thousand; they likewise resolved, that the proportion to be employed in Portugal should amount to eight thousand. Sums were granted for the maintenance of these great armaments, as well as for the subsidies payable to her majesty's allies; and funds required equal to the occasion. Then they assured the queen, in an address, that they would provide for the support of such alliances as she had made, or should make, with the Duke of Soubise.

§ 11. At this period the nation was alarmed by the detection of a conspiracy said to be hatched by the Jacobites of Scotland. Simon Fraser, Lord Lovat, a man of desperate enterprises and profound dissimulation, abandoned morals, and ruined fortune, who had been outlawed for having ravished a sister of the Marquis of Athol, was the person to whom the plot seems to have owed its origin. He repaired to the court of France, accompanied with the address of the Jacobins, wherein he undertook to assemble a body of twelve thousand highlanders to act in favour of the pretender, if the court of France would assist them with a small reinforcement of troops, with officers of commission, and money. The French king seemed to listen to his proposal; but, as Fraser's character was infamous, he doubted his veracity. He was, therefore, sent back to Scotland with two other persons, who were instructed to bore the strength and sentiments of the class, and endeavour to engage some of the nobility in the design of an insurrection. Fraser no sooner returned, than he privately discovered the whole transaction to the Duke of Queenberry, and undertook to make him acquainted with the whole correspondence between the pretender and the Jacobins. In consequence of this service he was provided with a pass, to secure him from all prosecution; and he was ordered to acquaint his master, when he had made overtures that in a different character; so that, in all probability, Fraser had forged the direction, with a view to ruin the marquis, who had prosecuted him for the injury done to his sister. He repaired to the court of France, where he stood himself to be able to discover other more important circumstances: and the Duke of Queenberry procured a pass for him to go to Holland from the Earl of Nottingham, though it was a question under a borrowed name. The duke had communicated his discovery to the king, for the sake of closing his name, which he desired might be concealed:

her majesty believed the particulars, which were confirmed by her spies at Paris, as well as by the evidence of Sir John Maclean, who had lately been conveyed from France to England in an open boat, and apprehended at Folkstone. This gentleman pretended at first, that his intention was to go through England to his own country, but it appears that he was about to take his pardon; and this, in all probability, was his real design; but being given to understand that he would be treated in England as a traitor, unless he should merit forgiveness, he immediately made his escape. As the court of France was by no means interested in the success of the proposed insurrection. From his informations the ministry gave directions for apprehending one Keith, whose uncle had accompanied Fraser from France, and knew all the intrigues of the court of St. Germain's. He declared, that there was no other design on foot, except that of paving the way for the pretender's ascending the throne after the queen's decease. Ferguson, that veteran conspirator, affirmed that Fraser had been employed by the Duke of Queenberry to decoy some persons whom he hated into a conspiracy, that he might have an opportunity to effect their ruin; and by the discovery establish his own credit, which began to totter. Perhaps there was too much reason for this impeachment. Among those who were seized at this time was a gentleman of the name of Lord-say, who had been under-secretary to the Earl of Middle-

tou. He had returned from France to Scotland, in order to take the oath of allegiance, and to appear for the safety of which he came to England, thinking himself secure from prosecution. He protested he knew of no designs against the queen or her government; and that he did not believe she had any mind to suffer the execution of a treaty from the court of St. Germain's. The House of Lords having received intimation of this conspiracy, resolved, That a committee should be appointed to examine into the particulars; and ordered, that Sir John Maclean should be next day brought before their committee, to whom it was shown, that he was far from being pleased with this instance of their officious interposition, gave them to understand by message, that she thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun; and that she would in a short time inform the House of the whole affair. On the seventeenth day of December the queen went to the House of Peers, and having passed the bill for the land-tax, made a speech to both Houses in which she declared, that she had unquestionable information of ill practices and designs carried on by the emissaries of France in Scotland. The Lords persisting in their resolution to bring on another day their own of the motion, chose their select committee by ballot; and, in an address, thanked her majesty for the information she had been pleased to communicate.

§ 111. The Commons, taking it for granted that the queen was informed of these proceedings of the upper house, which, indeed, implied an insult upon her majesty, if not upon herself, presented an address, declaring themselves surprised to find, that when persons suspected of treasonable practices were taken into custody by her majesty's messengers, in order to be examined, the Lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wrested them out of their hands, and arrogated the examination solely to themselves; so that a due inquiry into the evil practices and designs against her majesty's person and government might, in a great measure, be obstructed. They earnestly desired, that she would suffer no diminution of their powers to sound the strength or energy of the address, though the charge against the peers was not strictly true; for there were many instances of their having assumed such a right of inquiry. The upper House deeply resented the accusation. They declared, that by the known laws and customs of the land, an undoubted right to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether those persons were or were not in custody. They resolved, that the address of the Commons, which was presented, without due consideration, highly injurious to the House of Peers, tending to interrupt the good correspondence between the two Houses, to create an all opinion in her majesty of the House of Peers, of dangerous consequence to the liberties of the people, the constitution of the kingdom, and privileges of parliament. They presented a long remonstrance to the queen, justifying their own conduct, explaining the steps they had taken, reiterating upon the Commons, and expressing the most fervent zeal, duty, and affection to her majesty; the whole situation, which was drawn up with elegance, propriety, and precision, she pressed her sorrow for the misunderstanding which had happened between the two Houses of parliament, and the threat of consequences to the crown and the prerogative; which she should never exert so willingly as for the good of her subjects, and the protection of their liberties.

§ IV. Among other persons seized on the coast of Sussex, on their landing from France, was one Boucher, who had been aide-de-camp to the Duke of Berwick. This man, when examined, denied all knowledge of any conspiracy; he said, that being weary of living so long abroad, and having made some unsuccessful attempts to obtain a pass, he had chosen rather to cast himself on the queen's mercy, than to remain longer in exile from his native country. He had, however, continued to declare himself ignorant of the plot. He proved, that in the war of Ireland, as well as in Flanders, he had treated the English prisoners with great humanity. The Lords denounced from the prosecution; he obtained a respite, and was ordered by the seventh of January the Earl of Nottingham told the House, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the papers containing all the particulars hitherto discovered of the conspiracy in Scotland; on which subject his majesty's council and the House of Commons unanimously declared, that communication which could not yet be properly communicated, without running the risk of preventing a discovery of greater importance. They forthwith drew up and presented an address, desiring that all the papers might be immediately submitted to their inspection. The queen said she did not expect to be pressed in this manner immediately after the declaration she had made: but in a few days, she would send for the papers, and her council would then be enabled to act in the proper manner.

Nottingham was suspected of a design to strike the conspiracy. Conspiracy was made in the House of Commons, that he had discharged an officer belonging to the late King James, who had been seized by the governor of Berwick. A warm debate ensued, and at length ended in a resolve, that the Earl of Nottingham, one of the judges in the House of Lords, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his steady adherence to the church of England, should be placed on the bench of the same nature, with the same salary and the same privileges that the office of the queen's bench should be set aside, and judgment pronounced according to the verdict given at the assizes. The Commons considered these proceedings as encroachment on their private right, and passed five different resolutions, importing that the Commons of England in parliament assembled had the sole right to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members: that the practice of determining the qualifications of electors in any court of law would expose all mayors, bailiffs, and returning officers, to a multiplication of vexatious suits, and inapplicable expenses, and subject them to different and independent jurisdictions, as well as to the exercise of a power in the hands of private individuals, and without any general relaxation of relief: that Matthew Ashby was guilty of a breach of privilege, as were all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants-at-law, soliciting prosecuting, or pleading in any of the cases of the commons, because the money paid to them, was not the balance of the clerk, were fixed upon the gate of Westminster-hall. On the other hand, the Lords appointed a committee to draw up a state of the case: and, upon their report, resolved, that every person being wilfully hindered to exercise his right of voting, might maintain an action in the queen's courts against the officer by whom his vote should be refused, to assert his right, and recover damages for the injury: that an assertion to the contrary was destructive of the property of the subjects, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tended to the encouragement of partiality and corruption: that the declaration of Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, was an unpremeditated attempt upon the constitution of parliament, and an attempt to subject the law of England to the votes of the House of Commons. Copies of the case, and these resolutions, were sent by the lords to the House of Commons.

§ V. The select committee of the Lords prosecuted thekeeper to all the papers from the confession of Sir John Maclean, who owned that the court of St. Germain's had listened to Lovat's proposal; that several councils had been held at the pretender's court on the subject of an invasion into England, but which, however, had not been carried into execution. The resolutions passed by the House of Lords, showing some of the nobility in Scotland. But the nature of their private correspondence and negociation could not be discovered. Keith had tampered with his uncle to disclose the whole secret; and this was the circumstance which the queen declined imparting to the Lords, until she should know the success of its endeavours, which proved ineffectual. The uncle stood aloof; and the ministry did not heartily engage in the inquiry. The House of Lords, having finished these examinations, and being warned with violent debates, voted, That there had been dangerous plots between some persons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germain's; and, That the encouragement given for this plotting and designing, which was drawn up with elegance, propriety, and precision, she pressed her sorrow for the misunderstanding which had happened between the two Houses of parliament, and the threat of consequences to the crown and the prerogative: which she should never exert so willingly as for the good of her subjects, and the protection of their liberties. method by which her intentions to the poor clergy might be made more effectual, it would be an advantage to the public, and acceptable to her majesty. The Commons immediately brought in a bill, enabling her to dispose of this branch of the revenue, and create a corporation by charter, to direct the application of it to the uses proposed: they likewise repealed the statute of mortmain, so far as to allow the richer sort of persons to dispose of their estates by deed, but such as they should think fit to give towards the augmentation of benefices. Addresses of thanks and acknowledgment from all the clergy of England were presented to the queen. The clergy was bountyed in a little more than a little regard was paid to Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, although the queen declared that private author of the project. He was generally hated, either as a Sect, a low-churchman, or a mediating partisan.

§ VIII. In March an inquiry into the condition of the navy was begun in the House of Lords. They desired the queen, in an address, to give speedy and effectual orders, that a number of ships sufficient for the home service should be equipped and manned with all possible expedition. They resolved, That Admiral Greydon's not attacking the four French ships in the channel had been a prejudice to the queen's service, and a disgrace to the nation. That his passing men in Jamaica, and his sending men towards masters of merchant vessels and transports, had been a great discouragement to the inhabitants of that island, as well as prejudicial to her majesty's service; and that in their address they would mention the occasion on which he was dismissed. They examined the accounts of the Earl of Orford, against which great clamour had been raised; and taking cognizance of the remarks made by the commissioners of the public accounts, found them false in fact, ill-grounded, and of no importance. The Commons besought the queen to order a prosecution on account of ill practices in the Earl of Harleigh's office: and they sent up to the Lords a bill for continuing the commission on the same. Some alterations were made in the upper House, especially in the nomination of commissioners; but these were rejected by the Commons. The Peers adhering to their amendments, the bill dropped, and the commission expired. No other bill of any consequence passed in this session, except an act for raising recruits, which empowered justices of the peace to impress able-bodied persons for soldiers and marines. On the third day of April the queen went to the House of Peers, and having made a short speech on the usual topics of acknowledgment, unity, and moderation, prolonged the parliament to the fourth day of July. The division still continued between the bills of confinements and the moment was transacted in that assembly, except their address to the queen upon her granting the first-fruits and tenths for the augmentation of small benefices. At the summons of the House of Commons the queen sent her deposition to wait upon the speaker of the House of Commons, to return their thanks to that honourable House for having exposed the interest of the clergy; and to assure them that the confession would pursue such methods as might best conduce in the support, honour, interest, and security of the church as now by law established. They sent up to the archbishop and prelates divers representations, containing complaints, and proposing canons and articles of reformation: but very little regard was paid to their remonstrances.

§ IX. About this period the Earl of Nottingham, after having ineffectually pressed the queen to discard the Duke of Somerset and Devonshire, resigned the seals. The Earl of Jersey and Sir Edward Seymour were dismissed; the Earl of Kent was appointed chamberlain, Harley secretary of state, and Henry St. John secretary of war. But they were not attended by the much sooner known in France, than Louis ordered Fraser to be imprisoned in the Bastille. In England, Lindsay being sentenced to die, for having corresponded with France, was allowed, that he had no sincerity to betake, unless he would discover the conspiracy. He persisted in denying all knowledge of any such conspiracy; and seemed to save his life by giving false information. In order to intimidate him into a confession, the ministry ordered him to be conveyed to Tyburn, where he still rejected life upon the terms proposed: then he was carried back to Newgate, where he remained some years: at length he was hanged, and died of hunger in Holland. The ministers had been so lukewarm and languid in the prosecution of the Scottish conspiracy, that the whigs loudly exclaimed against them as disguised Jacobites, and even whispered insinuations, implying, that the queen herself was to be the instrument by deed, that they the sum they should think fit to give towards the augmentation of benefices. Addresses of thanks and acknowledgment from all the clergy of England were presented to the queen. The clergy was bountyed in a little more than a little regard was paid to Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, although the queen declared that private author of the project. He was generally hated, either as a Sect, a low-churchman, or a mediating partisan.

§ X. The design of the court was to procure in the Scotch parliament the nomination of a successor to the crown, and a supply for the forces, which could not be obtained in the preceding session. Secretary Johnston, in concert with the Marquis of Tweedale, undertook to carry these points, in return for certain limitations on the successor, to which her majesty agreed. The marquis was appointed commissioner. The office of lord-registry was bestowed upon Johnston; and the parliament met on the sixth day of July. The ministers, stamps in hand, expressed their satisfaction that these divisions should have risen to such a height, as to encourage the enemies of the nation to employ their emissaries for deauthorizing her good subjects and luring them away from their allegiance. They added, that whatever could in reason be demanded for quieting the minds of the people. She told them, she had empowered the Marquis of Tweedale to give unquestionable proofs of her determination to maintain the government in the same hands, and state as by law established in that kingdom; to consent to such laws as should be found wanting for the further security of both, and for preventing all encroachments for the future. She earnestly exhorted the lords in that important station, A. D. 1704, as a step absolutely necessary for their own peace and happiness, the quiet and security of all her dominions, the reputation of her affairs abroad, and the improvement of the protestant interest through all Europe. She declared, that she had authorized the commissioners to give the royal assent to whatever could be reasonably demanded, and was in her power to grant, for securing the sovereignty and liberties of her ancient kingdom. The concluding part of the letter turned upon the necessity of their granting a supply, the discouragement of vice, the encouragement of commerce, and the usual recommendation of moderation and peace. A bill that authorized the queen to acquire the power of confinements and the moment was transacted in that assembly, except their address to the queen upon her granting the first-fruits and tenths for the augmentation of small benefices. At the summons of the House of Commons the queen sent her deposition to wait upon the speaker of the House of Commons, to return their thanks to that honourable House for having exposed the interest of the clergy; and to assure them that the confession would pursue such methods as might best conduce in the support, honour, interest, and security of the church as now by law established. They sent up to the archbishop and prelates divers representations, containing complaints, and proposing canons and articles of reformation: but very little regard was paid to their remonstrances.

§ XI. The Duke of Hamilton presented a resolve, that the parliament would not name a successor to the crown, until the Scots should have concluded a previous treaty with England. The Scots were an adherent party. This motion produced a warm debate, in the course of which Fletcher of Saltoun expatiated upon the hardships and miseries which the Scots had sustained since the union of the two crowns under one sovereign, and the impossibility of bettering their condition, unless they take care to anticipate any design that tended to a continuation of the same extremities. Another resolve was produced by the Earl of Rothes, importing, That the parliament should proceed to make such limitations and conditions of the government as might be judged proper for rectifying the constitution; and vindicating and securing the sovereignty and independency of the nation; and that parliament should have the right of nominating the successor of her majesty. This was a step absolutely necessary for their own peace and happiness, the quiet and security of all her dominions, the reputation of her affairs abroad, and the improvement of the protestant interest through all Europe. She declared, that she had authorized the commissioners to give the royal assent to whatever could be reasonably demanded, and was in her power to grant, for securing the sovereignty and liberties of her ancient kingdom. The concluding part of the letter turned upon the necessity of their granting a supply, the discouragement of vice, the encouragement of commerce, and the usual recommendation of moderation and peace.
The Duke of Athol, having, that her majesty should be desired to send down the witnesses and all the papers relating to the conspiracy, that after due examination, those who were unjustly accused might be vindicated, and the guilty punished according to their demerits. The commissioner declared, that he had already written, and would write again, to the queen on that subject. The intention of the cavaliers was to convict the Duke of Queensberry of making him a false and baseless imputation to the good name of his affairs. If they might wreak their vengeance upon him for that instance of his unfitness, as well as for his having deserted them in the former session. He found means, however, to persuade the queen, that they were no material against his honor. If not conducted to the settlement of the succession, and raise such a ferment as might be productive of tragic consequences. Alarmed at these suggestions, she resolved to prevent the examination; and gave no answer to the repeated applications made by her parliament and ministers. Meanwhile the Duke of Queensberry appealed his enemies in Scotland, by directing all his friends to join in the opposition.

§ XII. The Duke of Hamilton again moved, that the parliament should proceed to the limitations, and name commissioners to treat with England, previous to all other business, except an act for a land-tax of two months, necessary for the defense with the forces. The Earl of Marchmont proposed an act to exclude all popish successors; but this was warmly opposed, as unsearchable, by Hamilton and his party. A bill of supply being offered by the Lord Justice Clerk, the advocate general concurred, to give in part of the act of security, to which the royal assent had been refused in the former session. Violent debates arose; so that the House was filled with rage and tumult. The national spirit of independence had been brought up to a dangerous height from internal disorders and internal parties, with people of all ranks, excluding against English influence; and threatening to sacrifice as traitors to their country, all who should embrace measures that seemed to favor the designs of the royal house and its friends were confounded and appalled. Finding it impossible to stem the torrent, he, with the concurrence of the other ministers, wrote a letter to the queen, representing the unanswerable situation of affairs, and advising her majesty to pass the bill, enumerated as it was with the act of security, Lord Godolphin, on whose counsel she chiefly relied, found himself involved in great perplexity. The taxes had devolved him to destruction. He fore-saw that the people of Scotland, the Scots in an affair of such consequence, would furnish his enemies with a plausible pretext to arraign the conduct of her minister; but he chose to run that risk, rather than see the army disbanded for want of pay. The Mosse of Nith, being the last municipal body to pass the act of security, he, therefore, seconded the advice of the Scottish ministers; and the queen authorized the commissioner to pass the bill that was depending. The act provided, That in case of the queen's dying without issue, a parliament should immediately meet, and declare the successor to the crown, different from the person possessing the throne of England, unless before that period a settlement should be made in parliament of the rights and liberties of the nation, independent of English counsels: by another clause, they were empowered to arm and train the subjects, so as to put them in a posture of defence. The Scottish parliament made a general exaction of corn, obviating this act of security, granted the supply without further hesitation; but not yet satisfied with this sacrifice, they engaged in debates about the conspiracy, and the proceedings of the House of Lords in England, which they termed an officious intermeddling in their concerns, and an encroachment upon the sovereignty and independency of the nation. They drew up an address to the queen, desiring that the evidence and papers relating to the plot might be subjected to the immediate scrutiny in the next parliament. Meanwhile, the commissioner, dreading the further process of such an ungovernable ferocity, prorogued the parliament to the seventh day of October. The act of security being thus triumphantly nullified, Lord Godolphin, who represented it as a measure of that minister; and the kingdom was filled with murmurs and discontent. People openly declared, that the two kingdoms were now separated by law, so as never to be rejoined. Reports were spread, that great quantities of arms had been conveyed to Scotland, and that the natives were employed in preparations to invade England. All the blame of these transactions was imputed to Lord Godolphin, whom the tones determined to attack, while the other party resolved to exert their whole influence for his preservation: yet, in all probability, he owed his impeachment and the immediate support to the success of his friend the Duke of Marlborough.

§ XIII. Nothing could be more deplorable than the situation to which the emperor was reduced in the beginning of the session. The king of Hungary had rendered themselves formidable by their success: the Elector of Bavaria possessed all the places on the Danube, as far as Passau, and even threatened the city of Vienna, which must have been infallibly lost, had the Hungarians and Bavarians acted in concert. By the advice of Prince Eugene, the emperor implored the assistance of her Habsburg majesty; and the Duke of Marlborough explained to her the necessity of undertaking his relief. This orderman in the month of January had crossed the sea to Holland, and concerted a scheme with the deputies of the States-general for the operations of the ensuing campaign. They agreed, that General Auverquerque should he upon the Rhine, under the command of the Duke of Marlborough. Such was the pretext under which this consummation of the expedition, was communicated to a few only, in whose discretion he could confide. It was approved by the pensionary and some leading men, who secured its favourable reception with the States-general, when it became necessary to import the secret to that numerous assembly the expedition could not otherwise have been made, on pretence of carrying the war to the banks of the Moselle.

§ XIV. In the month of April, the duke, accompanied by his brother, Colonel Churchill, Lieutenant-General Lenox, the Earl of Orkney, and other officers of distinction, embarked for Holland, where he had a long conference with a deputation of the States, concerning a proposal of sending a large army towards the Moselle. The deputies of Zeoland opposed this measure of sending their troops to such a distance so strenuously, that the duke was obliged to tell them, in plain terms, he had received orders to match thither with the British forces; and accordingly assembled his army at Maestricht; and on the eighth day of May began his march into Germany. The French imagined his intention was to begin the campaign with the siege of Trarbach, and penetrate into Franche Comté, as a preparation to the most pressing undertaking of the Moselle were the French army to be detached to that river; and gave out that they intended to invest Huy, a pretense to which the duke paid no regard. He continued his route by Bedburgh, Kempenhof, Kaldeken; he visited the fortifications of Bone, where he received certain advice, that the recruits and reinforcements for the French army in Bavaria had joined the elector, at Villegen. He redoubled his diligence, passed the Neckar on the third of June, and halted at Ladenburgh; from thence he wrote a letter to the States-general, giving them to understand, that he had the queen's orders to march to the relief of the empire; and expressing his assurance that they would approve the design, and allow the troops to share the honour of the expedition. By the return of a courier he received their approbation, and full power to command their forces. He then proceeded to Mildenheim, where he was visited by Prince Eugene; and these two great minds, whose talents were combined, immediately contracted an intimacy of friendship. Next day Prince Louis of Baden arrived in the camp at Great Hoppach. He told the duke, his Grace was come to save the empire, and to avenge the death of his father: Merkur, his honor, which he knew was at the last stake in the opinion of some people. The duke replied, he was come to learn of him how to serve the empire: that they must jointly think on it, and learn to know the situation of Baden, when his health permitted him, had preserved the empire, and extended its conquests.

§ XV. Those three celebrated generals agreed that the two armies should join: that the command should be alternately vested in the Duke and Prince Louis from day to day, that Prince Eugene should command a general armistice army on the Rhine. Prince Louis returned to his army on the Danube: Prince Eugene set out for Philippsburg; the Duke of Marlborough being joined by the imperial armies of the Duke of Bavaria, at Wartenberg, proceeded his march by Ellingen, Gingen, and Landthaussen. On the first day of July he was in sight of the enemy's entrenchments at Dillingen, and encamped with his right at Amerlenau, and his left at Odenlenau. Understood that the Elector of Bavaria, taking part of his infantry to reinforce the Count d'Arco, who was posted behind strong lines at Schellenberg near Donawert, he resolved to attack their entrenchments without delay. On the second day of July he advanced towards the enemy, and passed the river Wermont: about five o'clock in the afternoon the attack was begun by the English and Dutch infantry, supported by the horse and dragoons. They were very severely handled, and were obliged to give way, when Prince Louis of Baden marching up, at the head of the imperialists, to another part of the line, made a diversion in their favour. After an obstinate resistance they forced his entrenchments, and the losing some of the infantry, before the enemy, already dispersed, that they were rorted with great slaughter. They fled with the utmost trepidation to Donawert and the Danube, leaving six thousand men dead on the field of battle. The enemy lost some pieces of cannon, thirteen pair of colours, with all the tents and baggage. Yet the victory was dearly purchased: some thousands of the allies were slain in the attack, including many gallant officers, among whom were the Generals Coor and Beinheim, and Count Siurn, mortally wounded. Next day the Bavarian garrison abandoned Donawert, of which the confederates took immediate possession, while the elector passed the Danube in his retreat to the river Leche, lest the victors should follow his retreat to his own country. The confederates having crossed the Danube on several bridges of pontoons, a detachment was sent to pass the Leche, and take post in the country of the elector, who had retired under the cannon of Augsburg. The garrison of Neuburg retiring to Ingoldstadt, the place was secured by the confederates; and the Count de Frua was detached with nine battalions and fifteen squadrons to invest the town of Rau. Advice arriving from Prince Eugene, that the Mareschal Villeroi and Taldoll had passed the Rhine at Fort Kehl, with an army of five-and-forty thousand men, to succour the Elector of Bavaria, the generals of the allies immediately detached a maximilian of horse, and three squadrons of horse, as a reinforcement to the prince. In a few days Rau surrendered, and Aicha was taken by assault. The emperor no sooner received a confirmation of this good news, sent Count Winzek, in acknowledgment to the Duke of Marlborough, and ordered Count Wratishku to intimate his intention of investing him with the title of prince of the empire, which the duke declined accepting, until the queen interposed her authority at the desire of Leopold.

§ XVI. The allies advanced within a league of Augsburg, and though they found the Elector of Bavaria too securely posted under the cannon of that city to be dislodged or attacked with any prospect of success, they encamped with Friedburg in their centre, so as to cut off all communication between him and his dominions. The Duke of Marlborough having reduced him to this situation, proposed very advantageous terms of peace, provided he would abandon the French interest, and join the imperialists in Italy. His subjects, seeing themselves at the mercy of the allies, pressed him to comply with these offers rather than expose his country and his desolation. A negotiation was begun, and he seemed ready to sign the articles, when hearing that Mareschal Tallard had passed the Black Forest, to join him with a great body of forces, he declared that since the King of France had made such profuse efforts to support him, he would continue in honour to continue firm in the alliance. The generals of the allies were so exasperated at this disappointment, that they sent out detachments to ravage the country of Bavaria, as far as Munich: upwards of three hundred towns, villages, and castles, were inhumanly destroyed, to the indecency of the Prince Eugene should command a pacific and diminutive army on the Rhine. Prince Louis returned to his army on the Danube: Prince Eugene set out for Philippsburg; the Duke of Marlborough being joined by the imperial armies of the Duke of Bavaria, at Wartenberg, proceeded his march by Ellingen, Gingen, and Landthaussen. On the first day of July he was in sight of the enemy's entrenchments at Dillingen, and encamped with his right at Amerlenau, and his left at Odenlenau. The enemy lost some pieces of cannon, thirteen pair of colours, with all the tents and baggage. Yet the victory was dearly purchased: some thousands of the allies were slain in the attack, including many gallant officers, among whom were the Generals Coor and Beinheim, and Count Siurn, mortally wounded. Next day the Bavarian garrison abandoned Donawert, of which the confederates took immediate possession, while the elector passed the Danube in his retreat to the river Leche, lest the victors should follow his retreat to his own country. The confederates having crossed the Danube on several bridges of pontoons, a detachment was sent to pass the Leche, and take post in the country of the elector, who had retired under the cannon of Augsburg. The garrison of Neuburg retiring to Ingoldstadt, the place was secured by the confederates; and the Count de Frua was detached with nine battalions and fifteen squadrons to invest the town of Rau. § XVII. Notwithstanding these difficulties, the generals resolved to attack them immediately, rather than be inactive until their forage and provision should be consumed. They were moreover stimulated to this hazardous enterprise, by an intercepted letter to the Elector of Bavaria from Marschal Villeroi, giving him to understand, that he had received orders to ravage the country of Wirttemberg, and intercept all communication between the Rhine and the allied army. The dispositions being made for the attack, and the orders communicated to the general officers, the forces advanced into the plain on the thirteenth day of August, and were ranged in order of battle. The cannonading began with sixty large pieces, and was kept up by both sides till one in the afternoon. The French and Bavarians amounted to about sixty thousand men. Mareschal Tallard commanded on the right, and posted seven-and-twenty thousand infantry, with a detachment of the village of Blenheim, supposed that there the allies would make their chief effort; their left was conducted by the Elector of Bavaria, assisted by Marsin, a French general of experience and capacity. The number of the confederates did not exceed five-and-fifty; their right was under the direction of Prince Eugene, and their left commanded by the Duke of Marlborough. At noon the action was begun by a body of English and Hessians under Major-General Wilkes, who having passed the rivulet with difficulty, and siled off to the left to the face of the enemy, attacked the village of Blenheim with great vigour; but were repulsed after three successive attempts. Meanwhile the troops in the centre, and part of the right wing, passed the rivulet on planks in different places; and formed on the other side without any molestation from the enemy. At length, however, they were charged by the French horsemen with such activity, and so equally gallantly in flank by the troops posted at Blenheim, that they fell in disorder, and part of them repassed the rivulet: but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French cavalry were broke in their turn, and driven to the very verge of the town. The Elector of Bavaria, the Bavarian army, supported by the French horsemen, were so completely formed, ascended the bill to a firm compacted body, charging the enemy's horse, which could no longer stand their ground, but rallied let, and form un molested. Certain it is, these circumstances contributed to the success of the Duke of Marlborough, who rode through the hottest of the fire with the calmest Intrepidity, giving his orders with that presence of mud and deliberation which were so peculiar to his character. When he next day visited Tallard, he told that general to make an attack personally to one for whom he had a profound esteem.

The maréchal congratulated him on having vanquished the best troops in the world; a compliment to which the Duke of Marlborough answered, that he had won the world, seeing they had conquered those upon whom the maréchal had bestowed such an encomium.

§ XVIII. The victorious generals having by this decisive stroke saved their house of France from entire ruin, and entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, they summoned their officers to a council and informed them of their proposal to Prince Louis of Baden, that it would be for the advantage of the common cause to join all their forces, and drive the French out of Germany, rather than lose time at the siege of Ingolstadt, which would surrender of course. This opinion was confirmed by the conduct of the French garrison at Augsburg, who quitted that place on the sixteenth day of August. The magistrates sent a deputation craving the protection of the Duke of Marlborough, who forthwith ordered a detachment to take possession of that important city. The duke having sent Mareschal de Tallard under a guard of dragoons to Frankfort, and disposed of the troops, was posted to the adventurers, and in the adjacent places, encamped at Seilingen, within half a league of Ulm. Here he held a conference with the Princes Eugene and Louis of Baden, in which they agreed that, as the enemy retreated towards the Rhine, the confederate army should take the route to Munich, and at the expense of twenty battalions and some squadrons, to be left for the siege of Ulm, under General Thunen. They began their march on the twenty-sixth day of August, by different routes, to the general rendezvous at Brunschied near Philippsburgh. Then they resolved, that Prince Louis of Baden should undertake the siege of Landau, in order to secure the circle of Swabia from the incursions of that garrison. Considering the consternation that prevailed all over France, nothing could be more inopportune than this measure, which gave the enemy time for reconcentration, and recruiting their forces. It was a proposal on which the princes of Baden insisted with uncommon obstinacy. He was even suspected of corruption. He was joined in the glory which the Duke of Marlborough had acquired, and such a bigoted priest, that he returned at the success of an heretical general. On the twelfth day of September he marched towards Munich with the troops under the siege, and the Duke of Marlborough, with Prince Eugene, encamped at Cron Wrensbach, to cover the enterprise. By this time Ulm had surrendered to Thunen even before the arrival of Villeneuve about thirty thousand French army towards Landau, as if he had intended to attack the confederates; but returned without having made any attempt for the relief of the place, which was defended with the most obstinate valour till the twenty-third day of November, when the besiegers having lodged themselves on the counterscarp, the breaches being practicable, and the dispositions made for a general assault, the garrison capitulated upon honourable conditions. The King of the Romans had arrived in the camp, that he might have the credit of taking the place, the command of which he bestowed on the Count de Fize, who had before defended it with equal courage and ability.

§ XIX. The next event which the confederates undertook, was the siege of Trarbach. The hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, being intrusted with the direction of the attacks, invested the castle in the beginning of November. Though it was strongly and laboriously defended, he carried on his operations with such spirit and assiduity, that in about six weeks the garrison surrendered the place on honourable terms. In the mean time the Duke of Marlborough reached Land Berlie, where he negociated for a reinforcement of eight thousand troops to serve under Prince Eugene in Italy during the next campaign. Thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, where, as in all other places, he was received with particular marks of distinction. He then arrived at the Hague, he was congratulated by the States-general on his victories at Schellenberg and Blenheim, and as much considered in Holland as if he had been actually steddholder. He had received a second letter from the emperor, couched in the warmest terms of acknowledgment, and was declared prince of the empire. In December he embarked for England; the peace of the kingdom was a truant of copper, and was welcomed as a hero who had retrieved the glory of the nation.

§ XX. In Flanders, nothing of moment was executed, except the repulse of a French squadron off Spaar, with nine thousand Dutch troops; and two attempts upon the French lines, which were actually protracted by Auverquerque, though he was not able to maintain the footing he had gained. The Elector of Bavaria, who had returned to Brussels after his defeat, formed a scheme for surprising the Dutch general at the end of the campaign, and assembled all his troops at Tielmont: but the French court, apprehensive of his temerity, sent Ville-\n\n\n\n\n\n\ny to watch his conduct, and prevent his hazarding an engagement, except with a fair prospect of advantage. The maréchal, finding him determined to give battle at all events, represented the impropriety of succeeding against an enemy so advantageously posted, and the ill consequences of a repulse: but, finding the elector deaf to all his remonstrances, he flatly refused to march, and produced the king's order to avoid an engagement. In Italy the count of Cavour, with an opposition. The Duke of Savoy was being unable to face the enemy in the field, was obliged to be inactive. He saw the Duke de Vendôme reduce Verselli and Ivrea, and undertake the siege of Verne: while he had little army was at the foot of the Alps, at Crescentino, where he had a bridge of communication, by which he supplied the place occasionally with fresh troops and provisions. The place held out five months, against an army of Maréchal General: at length, by a communication being cut off, the Duke of Savoy retired to Cheras. He bore his misfortunes with great equanimity: and told the English minister, that though he was abandoned by the allies, he would never abandon himself. The emperor had neglected Italy, that he might act with vigour against Ragotski and the Hungarian malcontents, over whom he obtained several advantages; notwithstanding which they continued formidable, from their number, bravery, and determination. The minister of his allies pressed Leopold to enter into a negotiation for a peace with those rebels; and conferences were opened: but he was not sincerely disposed to an accommodation, and Ragotski aimed at the province of Transylvania, which the emperor of Vienna would not easily relinquish. The emperor was not a little alarmed by a revolution at the Ottoman Porte, until the new sultan dispatched a chasms to Vienna, with an assurance that he would give the emperor the contents of Hungary. In Poland, the diet being assembled by the cardinal-primate, Stanislaus Leszinski, Palatine of Posenania, was elected and proclaimed king, and recognized by Charles of Sweden, who still maintained his army by contributions in that country, more intent upon the mind of Augustus than upon the preservation of his own dominions; for he paid no regard to the progress of the Moscovites, who had ravaged Livoun, reduced Narva, and made incursions into Sweden. Augustus retreated into his Saxon dominions, which he impounded, in order to raise a great army, with which he might return to Poland; the Pope espoused the interest of this new convert, so well as to bestow on him the title of Louis, and give an account of the share he had in the Polish troubles. The protests of the Conventoons, deriving courage from despair, became so troublesome to the government of France, that Louis was obliged to treat with leniency: he sent Mareschal Villars against them with a fresh reinforcement; but at the same time furnished him with instructions to treat for an accommodation. This officer immediately commenced a negotiation with Colberg, the chief of the revolters; and a formal treaty was concluded, by which they were indulged with liberty of conscience; but these articles were very ill observed by the French and Spanish troops in the north of Germany.

§ XXI. In Portugal, the interest of King Charles were a very melancholy aspect. When he arrived at Lisbon, he found no preparations made for opening the campaign. The Portuguese ministry favoured the French in secret; the people were actually to revolt; the Duke of Schonen-\n\n\n\n\n\n\nberg was on all terms with Fagel, the Dutch general; the Portuguese forces consisted of raw undisconiplined peasants: and the French ambassador had bought the best horses for the army. The king, in consequence, decided on a premature march, and was mounted. The King of Portugal had promised to enter Spain with Charles by the middle of May: but he was not ready till the beginning of June, when they reached the village of Quien, the entrance of the province of Sevilla. The French were well engaged in the mountains, and the inhabitants of the province of Sevilla were well disposed to the interests of the French; and the king's troops were instantly reinforced by the power of France, as well as to ascertain the right of Charles to that monarchy. The present possessors, whom they mentioned by the name of the Duke of Anjou, had already anticipated their invasion. His general, the Duke of Berwick, entering Portugal, took the town of Segura by streangm. The governor of Salva-terra surrendered at discretion: Céheros was reduced without much opposition; Zafra was abandoned by the inhabitants, and the town of Zanna la Vella was taken by assault. Portugal was at the same time invaded in different parts by the Marquis de Jofeve, Prince Teurces de Jilly, and the Duke of Taxis, with the Spaniards: the latter side of the field was won, and the repulse recouped and taken by the Duke of Berwick at Sodre de Formosa. Then he passed the Tagus, and joined Prince Trevilles. King Philip arriving in the army, invested Lourengo, where the Duke of Anjou, entering Spain with fifteen thousand men, took Feuerse Gimaldo, in Castile, by assault, defeated a body of French and Spaniards commanded by Don Ronquillo, and made himself master of Mansento. The weather growing excessively bad, the Duke of Berwick, in his retreat from Lourengo, would not lose the benefit of the English refreshment: and the allies followed his example. Duke Schomburg finding his advice very little regarded by the Portuguese ministry, and seeing very little prospect of success, desired leave to resign his command, which the queen bestowed upon the Earl of Galway, who, with a re-inforcement of English and Dutch troops, arrived at Lisbon on the thirteenth day of July. About the latter end of Sept-\n\n\n\n\n\n\nember, the two kings repaired to the coast of Alme, and resolving to invade Castile; but they found the river Agueda so well guarded by the Duke of Berwick, that they would not attempt a passage. They, therefore, retired into the mountainous parts of Portugal, and conducted their winter-quarters. The Spaniards were now so weakened, by detachments sent with the Marquis de Villadamaa towards Gibraltar, that the Duke of Berwick could not execute any scheme of importance during the remaining part of the campaign.

§ XXII. The arms of England were not less fortunate by sea than they had been upon the Danube. Sir George Cooke, having landed King Charles at Lisbon, sent a squadron to cruise off Cape Sanetti, under the command of Rear-Admiral Dikkes, who, on the twelfth of March, engaged and took three Spanish ships of war, bound from St. Sebastian to Cadiz. Cooke received orders from the queen to appear at Seville, and give an account of the share he had in the Polish troubles. The protests of the Convenoons, deriving courage from despair, became so troublesome to the government of France, that Louis was obliged to treat with leniency: he sent Mareschal Villars against them with a fresh reinforcement; but at the same time furnished him with instructions to treat for an accommodation. This officer immediately commenced a negotiation with Colberg, the chief of the revolters; and a formal treaty was concluded, by which they were indulged with liberty of conscience; but these articles were very ill observed by the French and Spanish troops in the north of Germany.

entreaties of King Charles, sailed with the transports under his convoy to Barcelona, and on the eighteenth of May appeared before the city. Next day, the troops were embarked, and the French principal and general staff of two thousand, and the Dutch ketches bombarded the place: but by this time the governor had secured the chief of the Austrian party: and the people exhibiting no marks of attachment to King Charles, the prince re-embarked his soldiers, from an apprehension of their being attacked and overpowered by superior numbers. On the sixteenth day of June Sir George Rooke, being joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, of the Manor of the French fleet, which had sailed thither from Brest, and which Rooke had actually discovered, in the preceding month, on their voyage to Toulon. On the seventeenth day of July the admiral called a council of war in the Road of Détain, where they resolved to make an attempt upon Gibraltar, which was but slowly provided with a garrison. Thither they sailed, and on the twenty-first day of the month the Prince of Hesse landed on the isthmus with eighteen hundred marines: then he summoned the governor to surrender, and was answered, that the place would be defended to the last extremity. Next day the admiral gave orders for cannonading the town: perceiving that the enemy were defending it from the south main-head, commanded Captain Whittaker to arm all the boats, and assault that quarter. The Captains Hicks and Jumper, who happened to be nearest the mole, immediately manned their boats, and retaken the mole. The Spaniards sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants, and about a hundred men, were killed or wounded. Nevertheless, the two captains took possession of a platform, and kept their ground until they were sustained by Cap- tain Whittaker, and the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the mole and the town. Then the governor capitulated: and the Prince of Hesse en- tered the place, amid at the success of this attempt, con- sidered the strength of the fort's pretensions, and had been defended by fifty men against a numerous army.

§ XXIII. A sufficient garrison being left with his high- ness, the admiral returned to Toulon, to take in wood and water; and when he sailed, on the ninth day of August, he descried the French fleet, to which he gave chase with all the sail he could spread. On the thirteenth he came up with it, as it lay in a line off M良ag ready to receive him, to the number of two-and-thirty great ships and four- and-twenty galleys, under the command of the Comte de Tholouse, high-admiral of France, with the inferior flags of the white and blue divisions. The English fleet con- sisted of three-and-fifty ships of the line, exclusive of frigates and privateers, to which was added the guns and men, as well as in weight of metal, and alto- gether unprovided of galleys, from which the enemy reap ed great advantage during the engagement. A little after ten in the morning the battle began, with equal fury on both sides, and continued to rage with doubtful success till two in the afternoon, when the van of the French gave way; nevertheless, the fight was maintained till night, when the enemy bore away to leeward. The wind shifting before morning, the French gained the weather-gage; but they made no use of this advantage: for two successive days the English admiral endeavored to renew the engage- ment, which the Comte de Tholouse declined, and at last he broke off his attack, on account of a heavy gale on both sides. This action was fought as though not a single ship was taken or destroyed by either: but the honour of the day certainly remained with the English. Over and above the disadvantages we have enumerated, the bottoms of the British fleet were foul, and several large ships had expended all their shot long before the battle ceased: yet the enemy were so roughly handled, that they did not venture another engagement during the war. Sir George Rooke was in the utmost ex- citing spirits of his people, alarmed the victory, and pub- lished an account of the action, which, at this distance of time, plainly proves that he was reduced to the mean shift of imposing upon his subjects, by false and partial repre- sentations. On the thirtieth of August was made a con- tinued mention of mischief done to French ships by English bombs: though nothing is more certain than that there was not one bomb vessel in the combined fleet. The French academy, actuated by a servile spirit of adula- tion, caused a medal to be struck on the occasion, which instead of perpetuating the memory of the French, never only to transmit their own shame to posterity. After the battle, Sir George Rooke sailed to Gibraltar to refit, and leaving a squadron with Sir John Leake, set sail for Eng- land on the twenty-fourth day of August. He arrived in September, and was received by the ministry, and the people in general, with those marks of esteem and vene- ration which were due to his long services and signal suc- cess: but he was there persuaded by the prime minister to the reduction of Gibraltar, sent the Marquis de Villadarias with an army to retake it. The siege lasted four months, during which the Prince of Hesse exhibited many shaming proofs of courage and ability. The place was supplied with men and provisions by convoys from Lisbon, until Monsieur de Pointis put a stop to that communication, by entering the bay with a strong squadron, but he was obliged to re- tire at the approach of Sir John Leake and Admiral Van- derduassen: and the Marquis de Villadarias, having made little or no progress on land, thought proper to abandon the enterprise.

§ XXV. The parliament of England meeting on the twenty-ninth day of October, the queen, in her speech, observed, that the great and remarkable success with which God had blessed her arms produced unanimous joy and satisfaction through all parts of the kingdom; and that a timely improvement in the present affairs of the nation was necessary to enable her to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, as well as a firm support for the liberty of Eu- rope. She declared her intention to be kind and indulgent to all her subjects. She expressed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loss of this oppor- tunity; and that there would be no contention among them, but an emulation to promote the public welfare. Congratulatory addresses were voted and presented by both Houses. The speech was received with the strongest marks of duty and affection to the queen; but the addresses inclu- ded a very different colour from the different sanctions by which the two Houses were influenced. The Lords congratulated her on the great and glorious success of her arms under the command of the Duke of Marlborough, without designating to mention Sir George Rooke, who had defeated the French navy at sea, and added the important fortress of Gibraltar to the British conquests. On the other hand, the Commons affected to mention the battle of Blen- heim, and Rooke's naval victory, as events of equal glory and importance. However they might be warped by prejudice against individuals, they did not suffer the war to languish for want of the having a number of seamen to furnish the service of the army and navy, they voted that the queen should be desired to bestow her bounty on the seamen and land-forces who had behaved themselves so gallantly. They then deliberated upon the different articles of national expense, and granted four millions six hundred and seventy thousand nine hundred and thirty-one pounds for the occasions of the ensuing year, to be raised by a land-tax, by the sale of annuities, and other ex- penses. These measures were taken with such expedition, that the land-tax received the royal assent on the ninth day of December: when the queen, in a short speech, thanked the Commons for their despatch, which she con- sidered a sure pledge of their exertions in the performance of their professions. The next day the bill was passed, and sent to the Lords for their concur- rence. The court no longer espoused this measure, and the violent party was weakened by defection. After a warm and tedious debate, the Lords was by a large majority. The bill, however, passed the House of Com- mmons, and was sent up to the Lords on the fourteenth day of December, when it would hardly have excited a debate, had not the queen been present, and destitute of hearing what could be said in defence of the measure. The obverse side of the information and satisfaction of her majesty the sub- ject was again discussed, and all the arguments being repeated, the bill was rejected by a majority of one-and-twenty voices. The next subject on which the House of Lords employed their attention, was the late conduct of the Scotch parliament. The Lord Hailes, in his speech observed, that the settlement of the succession in Scotland had been postponed, partly because the ministry for that kingdom were weak and divided; partly from a remark that the Scotsmen had never submitted and cordially intended by those who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet council. He expatiated on the bad consequences that might attend the act of security, which he styled a bill of exclusion; and particularly mentioned that clause, by which the heiress-presumptive was to be deprived of her succession, and to be regarded as her father's fickle men every month. He said the nobility and gentry of Scotland were as learned and brave as any nation in Europe, and generally discontented; that the common people were very numerous, very stout, and very poor; and he asked who was the man that could tell what such a multitude, so armed, and so disciplined, might do under such leaders, could opportunities suit their intention. He recommended these circumstances to the consideration of the House, and concluded with these words of Lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or suffer matter of troubles to be prepared; for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire." The Lords, then, determined to consider this question. On the ninth day of November, when the queen repaired to the House of Peers to hear the debates, and by her presence moderate the heat of both parties. The Earl of Nottingham moved on the memorials of King William, that he would have been sent to the Tower, had not the Lords declined any such motion out of respect to her majesty. After much declaration on the Scottish act of security, the grand committee of the Peers, by the advice of Lord Warton, resolved, That the queen should be enabled by act of parliament on the part of England, to name commissioners to treat about a union with Scotland, provided that the parliament of Scotland should first appoint commissioners to the same purpose. That no Scotsmen should enjoy the privileges of Englishmen, except such as were settled in England, Ireland, and the plantations, and such as were or might be in the sea or land-service, until a union could be effected, or the succession settled as in England: That the traffic by cattle from Scotland to England should be prevented: That the lord admiral should issue orders for taking such vessels as should be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majesty's enemies; and that vessels should be taken to prevent the exportation of English wooll into Scotland. On these resolutions a bill was formed for an entire union, and passed the House on the twenty-second of December. The queen was present to address the queen, representing that they had duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects that were likely to be produced by divers acts of parliament lately passed in Scotland: That they were of opinion the safety of the kingdom required that speedy and effectual orders should be given to put Newcastle in a posture of defence, to secure the port of Tynemouth, and repair the fortifications of Hull and Carlisle. They likewise advised her majesty to give directions for disciplining the militia of the four northern counties; for providing them with arms and ammunition; for maintaining a competent number of regular troops on the northern borders of England, as well as in the north of Ireland; and for prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition; and for preventing the exportation of arms to the Dutch. The queen promised that a survey should be made of the places they had mentioned, and laid before the parliament; and that she would give the necessary directions upon the other articles of the address. The Commons were generally pleased with the sentiments of the Scottish act of security. They resolved, That a bill should be brought in for the effectual securing the kingdom of England from the apparent dangers that might arise from the evil act of parliament in the kingdom of Scotland: and this was formed on nearly the same resolutions which had been taken in the upper House. The bill sent down by the Lords was three read, and ordered to be printed. On the table, but they pressed their own, to take effect at Christmas, prevented before that time. The Scots should not settle the succession. When it was offered to the Lords, they passed it without any amendment, contrary to the expectation and even to the hope of some members who were no friends to the house of Hanover, and firmly believed that it was entirely inadmissible, with the same contempt which had been manifested for that which they had sent down to the Commons.

§ XXVI. The Duke of Marlborough, at his first appearance recommended the queen to congratulate the lady honoured with a very extraordinary eulogium, pronounced by the lord keeper, in the name of the peers of England; and a compliment of the same nature was presented to her by a committee of the House of Commons. Marlborough, accompanied by the principal members of the university, attended the queen with an address of congratulation upon the success of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and in vincible courage of the Duke of Marlborough; and at sea, under the most brave and faithful admiral Sir George Rooke. He received a civil answer from her majesty, though now she took umbrage at Rooke's being raised upon a level with the Duke of Marlborough; those great victories had captivated her administration, and whose wife had alienated her affection from the Tories. The Commons perceiving how high he stood in her majesty's esteem, and having been properly tutored for the purpose, took into their consideration the petitions on the twenty-first of December, in an address, besought her majesty to consider some proper means to perpetuate the memory of such noble actions. In a few days she gave them to understand by a message, that she had been pleased that the admiral, whose government of the whole in the honour and majesty of Woodstock and hundred of Wootton to the Duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that as the lieutenant and ranger of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were granted for two lives, she wished that encumbrance could be removed. A bill was immediately brought in, enabling the queen to bestow these honours and manors on the Duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and the queen was desirous of an act of the same nature as that for Scotland. She not only complied with this address, but likewise ordered the comptroller of her works to build in Woodstock park a magnificent palace for the duke, upon a plan much more solid than beautiful. By this time Sir George Rooke was laid aside, and the command of the fleet bestowed upon Sir Cloudesley Shovel, now declared rear-admiral of England. Mareschal de Tallard, with the other French generals taken at Hochstadt, arrived on the sixteenth of December in the river Thames, and were immediately conveyed in Notting-ham and Litchfield, attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of foot-guards. They were treated with great respect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles to London, and was presented to the queen in the house to the queen, representing that they had duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects that were likely to be produced by divers acts of parliament lately passed in Scotland: That they were of opinion the safety of the kingdom required that speedy and effectual orders should be given to put Newcastle in a posture of defence, to secure the port of Tynemouth, and repair the fortifications of Hull and Carlisle. They likewise advised her majesty to give directions for disciplining the militia of the four northern counties; for providing them with arms and ammunition; for maintaining a competent number of regular troops on the northern borders of England, as well as in the north of Ireland; and for prohibiting the exportation of arms to the Dutch. The queen promised that a survey should be made of the places they had mentioned, and laid before the parliament; and that she would give the necessary directions upon the other articles of the address. The Commons, in an address, besought the queen to refuse granting a writ of error in this case, which would tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England. She decided against the Commons, she would not do any thing to give them just cause of complaint; but this matter relating to the course of judicial proceedings, being of the highest importance, she thought it necessary to weigh and consider very carefully what might be proper for her to do in a thing of so great concern. They voted all the lawyers who had pleaded on the return, to set on foot a treaty in behalf of the prisoners of guilt of a breach of privilege, and ordered them to be taken into custody. They likewise ordered the prisoners to be removed from Newgate into the custody of their sergeant-major, till the transaction should be adjudged by the queen's granting writs of error. The prisoners, finding themselves at the mercy of the exasperated Commons, petitioned the Lords for relief. The upper House passed six different resolutions against the conduct of the Commons in being petitioners for redress of their grievances; but all of them were rejected. The Marquis of Montrose, however, was in such a state of mind that he was determined to break through the bounds of Magna Charta. The lower House demanded a conference, in which they insisted upon the sole right of determining elections; they affirmed, that they only could judge: who had a right of voting; and that they were judges of their own privileges, in which the Lords could not intermeddle.

§ XXVIII. The upper House demanded a free conference, which proved ineffectual. New resolutions were taken by the Commons, diametrically opposite to those of the Peers, who, on the other hand, attended the queen with a long representation of all the particulars relating to this affair. They affirmed, that the proceedings of the House of Commons against the Aylesbury men were wholly new and unconnected, and for this reason: That any thing of an Englishman, who apprehended himself injured, to seek for redress in her majesty's courts of justice: that if any power could control this right, and prescribe when he should or should not proceed, and when he should proceed before the laws, he ceased to be a freem, and his liberty and property were precarious. They requested, therefore, that no consideration whatever should prevail with her majesty to suffer an obstruction to the known course of justice; but that she should be pleased to give effectual orders for the immediate issuing of the writs of error. The queen assured them that she would have complied with their request; but, finding an absolute necessity for putting an immediate end to these matters, she could not proceed further on that matter. On the very day, which was the fourteenth of March, she went to the house of Lords, and passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent. Then she thanked the parliament for having dispatched the public business: she warned them to avoid the fatal effects of animosity and dissension; and ordered the lord keeper to prorogue them to Thursday the 1st of May; but on the fifth of April they were prorogued, for proclamation, and another council was published for calling a new parliament. The queen, accompanied by the Prince of Denmark, made an excursion to Newmarket, which was a journey she had determined to make to the University of Cambridge, where she conferred the honour of knighthood upon Dr. Ellis the vice-chancellor, upon James Montague counsel for the university, and upon the celebrated Isaac Newton mathematical professor. The two Houses of conviction still continued at variance. The lower House penned petitun representations; and the archbishop answered them by verbal reproach and admonition. The Tory interest was now in the wane. The Duke of Buckinghamshire was deprived of the privy seal, and that office conferred upon the Duke of Newcastle, a nobleman of powerful influence with the whig party. The Earl of Montague was created Marquis of Montmorenci, and Duke of Montague; the Earl of Petersborough and Lord Cholmondeley were chosen of the privy council; and Lord Curts was sent to command the troops in Ireland, under the Duke of Overy.

§ XXIX. The ministry of Scotland was now entirely changed. The Marquis of Tweedale and Johnston, having been found unequal to the undertaking, were dismissed. The Duke of Queensberry resumed the management of affairs in Scotland; the Duke of Montrose, the privy seal; and the office of commissioner was conferred upon the young Duke of Argyle, who succeeded to his father's influence among the presbeterians. He was a nobleman possessed of talents, which had not been neglected; candid, open, and sincere; brave, passionate, and aspiring; bad he been endowed with a greater share of liberality, his character would have been truly heroic. At this juncture he was instructed to procure an act of the Scottish parliament, settling the protestant succession: for the union of the two kingdoms. At the opening of the session in June, the members were divided into three parties, namely, the Cavaliers or Jacobites, the Revolutionists, the Squadron Volante, or Flying Squadron, and the Tweedaleists. The Tweedaleists, who disclaimed the other two factions, and pretended to act from the dictates of conscience alone. The parliament was adjourned to the third day of July, when her majesty's letter was read, earnestly recommending the settlement of the succession and the union of the two kingdoms. The Tweedaleists, and the Marquis of Annandale proposed that the parliament should proceed on the limitations and conditions of government; that a committee should be appointed to consider the condition of the coin and the commerce of the nation. The Earl of Mar moved, that the House would, preferrable to all other business, consider the means for engaging in a treaty with England. After a long debate they resolved to proceed on the coin and the commerce. Schemes for supplying the nation with money by a paper credit were presented by Dr. Hugh Chamberlayne and John Law; but rejected. The House of Commons, by the issue of bills, was an improper expedient; and appointed a council to put the laws relating to trade in execution. The Duke of Hamilton proposed that the parliament should proceed to the settlement of the succession and the union of the two kingdoms. The House resolved, to proceed with the bill for a treaty with England, which was granted. The Marquis of Tweedale and the Marquis of Lothian: others were produced concerning the elections of officers of state, and the regulation of commerce.

§ XXX. The chief aim of the cavaliers was to obstruct the settlement of the succession; and with that view they pressed the project of limitations, to which they knew the court would never assent. A motion being made, to grant the first reading to an act of commission for a treaty with England, the Duke of Hamilton insisted on the limitations, and a vote being stated in these terms, "Proceed to consider the act for a treaty of limitation," the letter was carried in favour of the cavaliers. On the twenty-second day of August, for this purpose, a motion was made, and next day an act for a triennial parliament, which the courtiers were enabled to defeat. They likewise passed an act, ordaining, that the Scottish ambassadors representing Scotland, should be recommended to the king; which, they might have occasion to treat with foreign princes and states, and be accountable to the parliament of Scotland. Fletcher, of Saltoun, presented a scheme of limitations that savoured strongly of republican principles. He afterwards enlarged upon every article, endeavouring to prove that they were absolutely necessary to prevent the consequences of English influence; to enable the nation to defend its rights and liberties; to deter ministers of state from giving bad advice to their sovereign; to preserve the courts of judicature from corruption, and screen the people from tyranny and oppression. The Earl of Stair having argued against these limitations, Fletcher replied, "It was no wonder he opposed the scheme; for, had such an act subsisted, his lordship would have been hanged for the bad counsel he had given to King James; for the concern he had in the massacre of Glencoe; and for his conduct since the revolution." The next subject on which the parliament deliberated was the conspiracy. A motion being made that the House might know what answer the queen had returned to their address in the last session, the chancellor delivered to the lord privy seal the plot, that they might be persuaded by the members: but these being copies, and the evidences remaining at London, no further progress was made in the affair. Yet the Duke of Atholl, in a distinct narrative of the pretended conspiracy, boldly accused the Duke of Queenberry having endeavoured to mislead the queen by false accusations against her good subjects. When the act for the union fell under discussion, a debate was entered upon for that purpose, presented by the Earl of Mar, was compared with the English act, importing, That the queen should name and appoint not only the commissioners for England, but likewise those for Scotland; Fletcher did not, the House refusing一切 to the unions could not be added to the act, importing, That the union should no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, and dignities of the Scottish nation. This occasioned a long debate; and the question being put, was carried in the negative. Another clause was proposed, that the Scottish commissioners should not begin to treat until the English parliament should have rescinded their clause, enacting, That the subjects of Scotland should be adjudged and taken as slaves after the twenty-fifth day of December. The courtiers, considering the temper of the House, would not venture to oppose this motion directly, but proposed that the clause should be formed into a separate act; and the expedient was approved. Though the Duke of Athol entered a vigorous protest, to which the greater part of the commoners and all the squadrone adhered, comprehending four-and-twenty peers, and thirty-three of the lords of manor, the act for the treaty of union was, after much altercation, finished, empowering commissioners to meet and treat of a union; but restraining them from treating of any alterations of the church government as by law established. Whilst this important subject was under consideration, the Duke of Hamilton, to the amazement of his whole party, moved that the nomination of the commissioners should be left to the queen. Fourteen or fifteen of the commoners ran out of the House in a transport of indignation, explaining that they were deserted and basely betrayed by the Duke of Hamilton. A very hot debate ensued, in which the Duke was supported by those whose he had hitherto conducted; but, at length, the question being put, whether the nomination should be left to the queen or to the parliament, the duke’s motion was approved by a very small majority. He afterwards excused himself for his defection, by saying, he saw it was vain to contend; and that since the court had acquired a great majority, he thought he might be allowed to pay that compliment to his sovereign. He was desirous of holding a commission, and was pleased to have been nominated. The queen refusing in honour him with that mark of distinction, Argyle would not suffer himself to be named, and threatened to oppose the nomination. The commons were, however, in their resolution. Two drafts of an address were presented by the Earl of Sutherland and Fletcher of Saltoun, beseeching her majesty to use her endeavours with the parliament of England to rescind that part of their act which declared the subjects of Scotland aliens; and an overture of a bill being offered, ordaining that the Scottish commissioners should not enter upon the treaty of union until that clause should be repealed; the courtiers moved that the parliament should proceed by way of order to their commissioners, and by address to her majesty. After some debate, the House assenting to this proposal, the order and address were drawn up and approved. The great and weighty affair of the treaty being at length happily transacted, though not without a protest by Athol and his adherents, the parliament granted a supply of fifty thousand pounds, and the House was adjourned to the twentieth day of December, in order to the doing over of the establishment of the house of James, which was appointed lord president of the council. § XXXI. In Ireland the parliament met at Dublin on the fifth day of March, and voted one hundred and fifty thousand pounds for the support of the government, a third of the establishment. A dispute arose between the Commons and the lower house of convocation, relating to the tubes of hemp and flax, ascertained in a clause of a bill for the better improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of the kingdom. The lower house of convocation presented a memorial against this clause as being too prejudicial to the interest of the kingdom. Commons voted the person who brought it in guilty of a breach of privilege; and ordered him to be taken into custody. They then resolved, That the convocation were guilty of intemperance of the privileges of that House. The convocation presented their memorial, and the Commons voted, that all matters relating to it should be rased out of the journals and books of convocation. The Duke of Ormond, dreading the consequence of all that clause being taken from the act and transmitted to the first day of May, when the Houses meeting again, came to some resolutions that reflected obliquely on the convocation, as enemies to her majesty’s government and the protestant succession. The clergy, in order to acquit themselves of all suspicion, resolved in their turn, that the church and nation had been happily delivered from popery and tyranny by King William at the revolution: That the continuance of these blessings were due (under God) to the suspicious reign and happy government of her majesty Queen Anne: That the future security and preservation of the church and nation depended wholly (under God) on the prosperity and the crown as settled by law in the protestant line; That if any man should by word or writing declare any thing in opposition to these resolutions, they should look upon him as a sower of divisions among the protestants, and an enemy to the common weal, and proceed against the presbyterians, importing, That to teach or to preach against the doctrine, government, rites, or ceremonies of the church, or to maintain schools or seminaries for the education of youth, in principles contrary to the establishment of the established church, was a contempt of the ecclesiastical laws of the kingdom; of pernicious consequence; and served only to continue and widen the unhappy and ruinous schisms and divisions in the nation. This act of parliament was prorogued to the same month of the following year: then the Duke of Ormond embarked for England, leaving the administration in the hands of Sir Richard Cox, lord secretary, and Lord Coffs, chief of the queen’s forces, who were appointed lords justices during the duke’s absence. § XXXII. During these transactions in Great Britain and Ireland, the allies had not been remiss in their preparations for the ensuing campaigns. The Duke of Marlborough had fixed upon the Moselle for the scene of action; and magazines of all sorts were formed at Trier. On the thirteenth day of March the duke embarked for Hungary, and the Dutch generals the necessary measures for opening the campaign, and ordered the troops to concentrate near the Danube army. On the fifth day of May the Emperor Leopold died at Vienna, and was succeeded on the imperial throne by his eldest son Joseph, King of the Romans, a prince who resembled his father in meekness of disposition, narrowness of intellect, and bigotry to the Roman religion. On the fifteenth of June the English troops passed the Mathe, and continued their march towards the Moselle, under the command of General Churchill; and the duke set out for Crastenach, to confer with Prince Louis of Baden, who excused himself on pretence of being much indisposed. Marlborough visited him at Rastadt, where in a conference they resolved that a sufficient number of German troops should be left there to ensure the security of the houses of Lauterburg and Stolhofen, under the command of General Thüngen, and that Prince Louis of Baden should march with a large detachment towards the Saar, to act in conjunction with the Earl of Hertford in the south. The army passed the Moselle and the Saar in the beginning of June, and encamped at Elf in sight of the enemy, who retired with great precipitation, and entrenched themselves in the neighbourhood of Comingairchen. The duke’s design was to attack the Saar, but Marlborough failed in the performance of his engagement: he feigned himself sick, and repaired to the bath at Schlangembude, leaving the small number of imperial troops he conducted as far as Crastenach, under the command of the Count de Freize.
He was suspected of treachery; but probably acted from envy of the duke's military reputation.a

§ XXXIII. While this nobleman sustained such a mortifying disappointment from the Moselle, the French did not fail to make advantage of their superiority in the Netherlands, where General D'Auerquereque was obliged to stand on the defensive. They invested Huy, and carried on their operations to such effect that the garrison were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war: then Villeroi undertook the reduction of Lierge, and actually began his works before the citadel. Marlborough and D'Auverouerque, then marching to Trier, where, in a council, it was resolved that the army should return to the Netherlands. The troops were in motion on the nineteenth of June, and marched with such expedition, that they passed the Meuse on the first day of July. Villeroi having received advance of the duke's approach, abandoned his enterprise, and retired to Tongeren, from whence he retreated within his lines, that reached from Marche aux Dames on the Meuse, along the Meuse as far as Louvain. Marlborough having joined D'Auverouerque, sent General Scholten with a detachment to invest Huy, and in a few days the garrison surrendered at discretion. The English general, resolving to strike some stroke of importance that should compensate for his disappoointment, since General Horne had concluded a defensive understanding with the States, for a proposal for attacking the French lines, and obtained their permission to do whatever he should think proper for the good of the common cause. Then he expounded his proposals, which were, first, to invest the enemy, who had retired from Olen, with the wood of Soignes, to Neerwiche, with the little river Yse in their front, so as to cover Brussels and Louvain. The Duke of Marlborough proposed to attack them immediately, before they could reconnoitre themselves from their consternation; and D'Auverouerque approved of the design; but it was opposed by General Schlangenburgh, and other Dutch officers, who represented it in such a light to the deputies of the States, that they refused to concur in the execution. The cruel ambition to relinquish the scheme, wrote an expository letter to the States-general, complaining of their having withdrawn that confidence which they had reposed in him while he acted in Germany. This letter being published at the Hague, excited murmurs among the people, and the English nation were incensed at the presumption of the deputies, who wrote several letters in their own justification to the States-general: but these had no effect upon the populace, by whom the duke was received with the greatest approbation. The States being apprised of the resentment that prevailed over all England, and that the Earl of Pembroke, lord president of the council, was appointed as envoy extraordinary to the Duke of Marlborough, with instructions to demand satisfaction for this improper to anticipate his journey, by making submissions to the duke, and removing Schlangenburgh from his command. The confederate army returned to Corinna, from where it marched to Perwitz, where it encamped in the little town of Sont-Louwe, situated in the middle of a marsh, and constituting the chief defence of the enemy's lines, being taken by a detachment under the command of Lieutenant-General Dedem, the duke ordered the lines from this post to Wasseneghe to be leveled, and to the failure of the Prince of Baden; but that my esteem for you is still greater than my reverence of his conduct."
he conferred with Prince Louis of Baden. On the twelfth of November he arrived at Vienna, where he was treated with the highest marks of distinction and cordial friendship by the Emperor Charles, to whom, however, the Earl of Sunderland, had been sent thither as envoy extraordinary; and now they conferred together with the emperor and his ministers. They resolved to maintain the war with redoubled vigour. The treaties were renewed, and provisions made for the security of the Duke of Savoy. The emperor, in consideration of the duke's signal service to the house of Austria, presented him with a grant of the lordship of Genoa in Savoy, which was now extended into a principality of the Roman empire. In his return to the Earl of Sunderland he visited the courts of Berlin and Hanover, where he was received with that extraordinary respect which was due to his character, and arrived at the Hague on the fourteenth day of December.

There he settled the operations of the next campaign with the States-general, who concerted to join England in maintaining an additional body of ten thousand men, as a reinforcement to the army of Prince Eugene in Italy. While the allies were engaged in the siege of Sanlul, the Elector of Hanover sent a detachment, under the command of Don Marcelllo de Grimando, to invest Dietz, the garrison of which had been made public cause of war.

§ XXXVI. On the Upper Rhine Mareschal Villars besieged and took Hombourg, and passed the Rhine at Strasburg on the sixth day of August. Prince Louis of Baden, serving in the camp of the imperialists at Strasburg, not only held himself ready to cross the river, forced the French lines at Hagenau; then he reduced Drusenheim and Hagenau, but attempted no enterprise equal to the number of his army, although the emperor had exasperated him severely on his conduct, and he had now a fair opportunity of simulating the glory of Marlborough, upon whom he looked with the eyes of an envious rival. In Italy a battle was fought at Casano, between Prince Eugene and the Dutch, with considerable success. The Duke de Foulbrand reduced Chavas, and invested Nice, which, after an obstinate defence, surrendered in December. All the considerable places belonging to the Duke of Savoy were now taken, except Cun and Turen; and his little army was reduced to twelve thousand men, whom he could barely support. His duchess, his clergy, and his subjects in general, pressed him to submit to the necessity of his affairs; but he adhered to the alliance with surprising fortitude. He withstood the importunities of his duchess, excluded all the bishops and clergy from his councils; and when he had occasion for a confessor, chose a priest occasionally, either at Prague or Vienna. The campaign in Portugal began with a very promising aspect. The allies invaded Spain by the different frontiers of Beyra and Alentejo. Their army, under the command of the Conde de Valencias, undertook the siege of Valenca in May, and it successed, on the arrival of D'Alcantara, in the assault, and the town surrendered upon articles; and then the troops were sent into quarters of refreshment. The Marquis de las Minas, who commanded the Portuguese in the province of Beyra, reduced the town of Sulva-terra, plundered and burned Sarca: but was obliged to retire to Pamamas at the approach of the enemy. Towards the end of September the confederates being reassured, invested Badajoz, by the advice of the Earl of Galway, who lost his right hand by a cannon-ball, and was obliged to be carried off; so that the conduct of the siege was left to General Fagel. He had made considerable progress towards the reduction of the place, when the Marquis de Tholos found means to throw in a powerful reinforcement; and then the confederates abandoned the enterprise. The war continued to rage in Hungary with various success. Ragotski, though frequently worsted, appeared still in arms, and ravaged the country, which became a strength whereby the action. In Poland the old cardinal prince owned Stanislaus, but died before the coronation, which was performed by the Bishop of Cracow. In the beginning of the winter he left his irregular army, and passed through the Muscovite army, which was put under his command in Lithuania; and the campaign was protracted through the whole winter season, notwithstanding the severity of the weather in that northern climate. In the spring the Swedish general, Rencheld, obtained a complete victory over the Saxony army, which was either cut in pieces or taken prisoners. When the war was at an end, the war was not extinguished. The King of Sweden continued obstinately deaf to all proposals of peace, and was become as sanguine in his manners, as brutal in his revenge.

§ XXXVII. At sea the arms of the allies were generally prosperous. Philip of Spain being obstinately bent upon retaining Gibraltar, sent Mareschal de Tholos to renew the siege, while De Pointis was ordered to block up the place. The king of France attacked the English fleet on the siege with such activity, that the Prince de Hesse despatched an express to Lisbon with a letter, desiring Sir John Leake to sail immediately to his assistance. This admiral having been reinforced from England by Sir Thomas Dilkes, with five ships of the line and a body of troops, set sail immediately; and on the tenth day of March desired five ships of war hauling out of the bay of Gibraltar. These were commanded by De Pointis in person, to whom the English admiral gave chase. One of them struck, after having made a very slight resistance; and the rest ran ashore to the westward of Marbella, where they were destroyed. The remaining part of the French squadron was taken to Cádiz, and placed in the bay of Malaga; but now they slipped their cables, and made the best of their way to Toulon. The Mareschal de Tholos, in consequence of this disaster, abandoned the siege of Gibraltar into a blockade, and withdrew the remainder of his fleet. Sir John Leake was employed in this expedition, Sir George Byron, who had been ordered to cruise in soundings for the protection of trade, took a ship of forty guns from the enemy, together with twelve privateers, and seven vessels richly laden from the West Indies.

§ XXXVIII. But the most eminent achievement of this summer, was the reduction of Barcelona, by the celebrated Prince de Vendenome, in consequence of the expedition, which sailed from St. Helen's in the latter end of May with the English fleet, having on board a body of five thousand land forces; and on the twelfth of June arrived at Lisbon; where they were joined by Sir John Leake and the Dutch admiral, Allemonde. In a council of war, they determined to put to sea with eight-and-forty ships of the line, which should be stationed between Cape Sporrel and the bay of Cadiz, in order to prevent the junction of the Toulon and Brest squadrons. The Prince de Hesse Dumfries, arriving from Gibraltar, assured King Charles, that the province of Catalunya and the kingdom of Valencia were attached to his interest; and his majesty being weary of Portugeuse adventurers. The Prince de Hesse-Dumfries took Bordeaux to Barcelona. He accordingly embarked with him on board of the Ranelagh; and the fleet sailed on the twenty-eighth day of July, the Earl of Galway having reinforced them with two regiments of English dragoon. At Gibraltar they took on board the English guards, and three old regiments, in lieu of which they left two new-raised battalions. On the eleventh day of August they anchored in the bay of Alco, where the Earl of Peterborough published a manifesto in the Spanish language, which had such an effect, that all the inhabitants of the place, the neighbouring villages, and adjacent mountains, acknowledged King Charles as their lawful sovereign. They invested the town of Dona, for the purpose of cutting off the garrison of four hundred men under the command of Major-General Ramos. On the twenty-second they arrived in the bay of Barcelona; the troops were disembarked to the eastward of the city, where they encamped in a strong situation, and were well received by the country people. King Charles landed amidst the acclamations of an infinite multitude from the neighbouring towns and villages, who threw themselves at his feet, exclaiming, 'Long live king Charles and eternal glory to the Spanish arms and King Charles.' The king immediately made the most extravagant joy. The inhabitants of Barcelona were well affected to the house of Austria, but overawed by a garrison of five thousand men under the Duke de Pompil, Velasco, which was placed in disgrace by the arrival of the English and Dutch forces. The знать of Philip. Considering the strength of such a garrison, and the small number of Dutch and English troops, nothing could appear more desperate and dangerous than the design of besieging the place: yet this was proposed by the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, who served in the expedition as a volunteer, strongly urged by King Charles, and approved by the Earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudesley Shovel, that the assault should be made on one side, but as a previous step to the reduction of it, they resolved to attack the fort of Montjuic, strongly situated on a hill that commanded the city. The outworks were taken by storm, with much loss of the gallant Prince of Hesse, who was shot through the body, and expired in a few hours: then the Earl of Peterborough began to bombard the body of the fort; and a shell chances to fall into the magazine of ammunition, that was filled to the brim with the powder, and killed some of the best officers: an accident which struck such a terror into the garrison, that they surrendered without further resistance.

§ XXIXI. This great point being gained, the English general raised his batteries against the town, with the help of the Miquelets and seamen: the bomb-ketches began to fire with such execution, that in a few days the governor capitulated, and on the fourth day of October King Charles entered in triumph. The other places in Catalonia declared for him, except Roses; so that the largest and richest province of Spain was conquered with an army scarce double the number of the garrison of Barcelona. King Charles was then salute in Barcelona by five hundred pieces, with a magnificent gun-fire, of the famous Du Bart, this officer was counted the best seaman in France.

§ XLI. The kingdom of England was now wholly engaged by the election of members for the new parliament. The tories excited throughout the eastern counties, to prevent the Catholics from being admitted to sit in parliament. The minority of the Jacobites in the west of Scotland, the English, and the French, had been the alarms of the council of war, as the guard of this city, the committee of the Treasury, and the warders of the prison. The necessity of acting vigorously against France, as a common danger, had been urged in the court of Charles, and the other six regiments were raised by the states of Catalonia. The Count de Cifuentes, at the head of the Miquelets and Catalans attacked to the house of Austria, secured Tarragona, Tortosa, Lareda, San-Mattheo, Gironne, and other places. Don Raphael Nevat, revolting from Philip with his whole regiment of horse, joined General Ramos at Denia, and made themselves masters of several places of importance in Catalonia. The casemates of Mahon were prepared by such unexpected success they penetrated to the capital of the same name, which they surprised, together with the Marquis de Villa-Garcis, the viceroy, and the archbishop. These adven-tures, by no means approved of the court of Charles, were divided into factions, and, so much time lost in disputes, that the enemy sent a body of six thousand men into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the Conde de los Toses, who was formerly invested San-Mattheo, guard by Colonel Jones at the head of five hundred Miquelets. This being a place of great consequence, on account of its situation, the Earl of Peterborough marched thither with one thousand infantry, and two hundred dragoons; and by means of feigned intelligence artfully conveyed to the Conde, induced that general to abandon the siege with precipitation, in the apprehension of being suddenly attacked by a considerable army. Peterborough afterwards took possession of the town, and then, with his chasse horses at Castillon de la Plana, began to form a body of cavalry, which did good service in the sequel. Having assembled a little army, consisting of ten squadrons of horse and dragoons, and four hundred armed foot, he marched to Molina, which was surrendered to him by the governor, Brigadier Mahoni. Between this officer and the Duke d'Arcos, the Spanish general, he excited such jealousies by dint of artifices, not altogether justifiable even in war, that the duke was more intent upon avoiding the supposed treachery of Mahoni than upon intercepting the earl's march to Valencia. The inhabitants expressed uncommon marks of joy at this arrival, which, as a very obstinate action happened at St. Istevan de Letrea, where the Chevalier D'Arsfeld, with nine squadrons of horse and dragoons, and as many battalions of French infantry, attacked Colomn at the head of a small detachment; but this last being supported by Lieutenant-General Cunningham, who was mortally wounded in the engagement, the rebels though three times his number, could not make the least impression on the spot. The troops on both sides fought with the most desperate valour, keeping up their fire until the muskets of their pieces met, and changing each other at the point of the bayonet. The only misfortune that attended the English arms in the course of this year, was the capture of the Baltic fleet homeward-bound, with their convoy of three ships of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk squadron under the command of the Count de St. Paul, though he himself was killed in the engagement. When an account of this advantage was communicated to the French king, he replied with a sigh, "Very well, I wish the ships were safe again in any English port, provided the Count de St. Paul were alive." After the death of the famous Du Bart, this officer was counted the best seaman in France.

§ I. The kingdom of England was now wholly engaged by the election of members for the new parliament. The tories excited throughout the eastern counties, to prevent the Catholics from being admitted to sit in parliament. The minority of the Jacobites in the west of Scotland, the English, and the French, had been the alarms of the council of war, as the guard of this city, the committee of the Treasury, and the warders of the prison. Having assembled a little army, consisting of ten squadrons of horse and dragoons, and four hundred armed foot, he marched to Molina, which was surrendered to him by the governor, Brigadier Mahoni. Between this officer and the Duke d'Arcos, the Spanish general, he excited such jealousies Then the Commons drew up a second, assuring her they would, to the utmost of their power, assist her in bringing the treaty of union to a happy conclusion. They desired that the question of the last, of parliament, relating to the union and succession, might be laid before the House. The Lords had solicited the same satisfaction; and her majesty promised to comply with their request. The lower house, having heard this, declared in some cases of controverted elections, proceeded to take into consideration the estimates for the service of the ensuing year, and granted the supplies without hesitation. In the House of Lords, while the queen was present, Lord Haversham, at the instance of the bishops, in a speech, in which he reflected upon the conduct of the Duke of Marlborough, both on the Monsele and in Behan, moved for an address to desire her majesty would invite the presumptive heir to the crown of England to come and reside in the kingdom. This motion was earnestly supported by the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Rochester, Nottingham, and Anglesea. They said there was no method so effectual to secure the succession, as that of the successor's being upon the spot, ready to assume and maintain his or her right against any pretender; and they observed, that in former times, when the throne of England was vacant, the first comer had always succeeded in lawful pretensions. The proposal was relished by the opposition, who knew it was disagreeable to the queen, whom they would not venture to disoblige.

They argued, that a rivalry between the two courts might produce distractions, and be attended with very ill consequences. It was observed, that the Princess Sophia had expressed a full satisfaction in the assurances of the queen, who had promised to maintain her title. The question being put, was carried in the negative by a great majority.

The design of the torres in making this motion was, to bring the other party into disgrace either with the queen or with the people. Their joining in the measure would have given umbrage to their sovereign; and, by opposing it, they ran the risk of incurring the public odium, as enemies of the crown, and of the next successor, whom they thought herself secure; and those patriots who stood up in its defence were disconcerted and punished; nay, when the successor ascended the throne, and the church was apprized in the most imminent danger, by the high commission court and otherwise, the nation was then indeed generally alarmed; and every body knew who sat in that court, and entered deeply into the measures which were then pursued. Compton, Bishop of London, declared that the church was in danger, from profaneness, irreligion, and the licentiousness of the press. He complained, that sermons were preached wherein rebellion was countenanced, and resistance to the higher powers encouraged. He added, that it was the lord chief-justice, and the minister of the queen's bench. Their business was to proclaim the next successor through the kingdom of England, and join with a certain number of persons named as regents by the successor, in three lists to be sealed up and deposited with the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord keeper, and the minister residuary of Hanover. It was enacted, That these joint regencies should conduct the administration: that the last parliament, even though dissolved, should reassemble, and continue sitting for six months after the decease of her majesty. The bill met with a warm opposition from the torres, and did not pass the upper House without a contest. It was still further obstructed in the House of Commons, even by some of the Whigs, who were given to understand that the Princess Sophia had expressed an inclination to reside in England. Exceptions were likewise taken to that clause in the bill, enacting, that the last parliament should be reassembled. They affirmed that this was inconsistent with part of the act by which the succession was at first settled; for, among other limitations, the parliament had provided, that when the crown should descend to the house of Hanover, no man who had either place or pension, should be capable of sitting in the House of Commons. After tedious disputed and zealous alterations, they agreed that a certain number of seats should be disqualifying places. This self-denying clause, and some other provisions, were so altered in the conferences between the two Houses, and at length the bill passed by their mutual assent. Lord Haversham that his sons were indeed taught by Mr. Ellis, a sober, virtuous man; but that when he refused the oath of abjuration, they were immediately withdrawn from his instruction. Lord Wharton proceeded to declare, that he had carefully assembled the pamphlets intended for Memorial, which was said to contain a demonstration that the church was in danger; but all he could hear was, that the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Rochester and Nottingham, were out of place: that he remembered some of these noblemen said, they were all to come, and that he made no complaint of the church's being in danger.

Patrick, Bishop of Ely, complained of the heat and passion manifested by the gentlemen belonging to the university for the affection of the clergy towards their bishops. He was seconded by Hugh of Lichfield and Coventry, who added, that the inferior clergy calumniated their bishops, as if they were in a plot to destroy the church, and had compounded to be the last of their order. Hooper of Bath and Wells expatiated on the invidious distinction implied in the terms "high-church," and "law-church." The Duke of Leeds asserted, that the church could not be safe, without an act against occasions of communion between the two(" high-church") and the law-church. The House resolved, that the church of England as by law established, which was rescued from the extreme danger by King William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy reign of her majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest or insinuate that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom.

Next day the Commons concurred in this determination, and joined the Lords in an address to the queen, communicating this resolution, beseeching her to take effectual measures for making it public; and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of the seditionary and scandalous reports of the church's being in danger. She accordingly issued a proclamation, containing the resolution of the two Houses, and offering a reward for discovering the author of the Memorial of the Church of England, and for apprehending David Edwards, a servant of Mr. Fanshawe, upon oath to be the printer and publisher of that libel.

§ XI. III. After a short adjournment, a committee of the lower House presented the thanks of the Commons to the queen, for her performance of the resolution concerning her majesty and the nation in the last campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her allies. This nobleman was in such credit with the people, that when he proposed a loan of five hundred thousand pounds to the emperor, upon a branch of his revenue in Sicily, the money was advanced immediately by the merchants of London. The kingdom was blessed with plenty: the queen was universally beloved: the people in general were zealous for the prosecution of the war; the senators and council were well paid: the treasury was punctual: and though a great quantity of coin was exported for the maintenance of the war, the paper currency supplied the deficiency so well, that no murrains were heard, and the public credit was channelled both at home and abroad.

All the funds being established, one in particular for two millions and a half by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at six and a half per cent, and all the bills having received the royal assent, the queen went to the House of Peers on the nine-and-twenty day of March, where, having thanked both Houses for the repeated assurances upon which she had received, she proscribed the parliament to the twenty-first day of May following. The new convocation, instead of imitating the union and harmony of the parliament, which the former had been distraught, and the two Houses seemed to act with more determined rancour against each other. The upper House having drawn up a warm address of thanks to the queen for the affection of the church, the lower House refused to concur; nor would they give any reason for their dissent. They prepared another in a different strain, which was rejected by the archbishop. Then they agreed to divers resolutions, asserting their right of having what they offered to the upper House received by his Grace and their lordships. In consequence of this dissension the address was set aside, and dropped, and a stop put to all further communications between the two branches of parliament. The Duke of Marlborough and Lord Bathurst, then offered an amendment to the resolution of the lower House, praying the upper House to consider the irregularities of the lower House. The queen, in a letter to the archbishop, signified her resolution to maintain her supremacy, and the due subordina- tion of the lower House, which she expressed her hope that he and his suffragans would act conformably to her resolution, in which case they might be assured of the continuance of her favour and protection: she required him to impart this declaration to the bishops and clergy, and to proscribe the convocation to such end as should appear most convenient. When he communicated this letter to the lower House, the members were not a little confounded; nevertheless, they would not comply with the proposition, but continued to sit, in defiance of her majesty's pleasure.

§ XLI. The eyes of Great Britain were now turned upon a transaction of the utmost importance to the whole island: namely, the treaty for a union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The queen having appointed the commissioners on both sides, they met on the sixteenth day of April, in the council-chamber of the Cockpit near Whitehall, which was the place appointed for the conferences. Their commissions being opened and read by the respective secretaries, and introductory speeches being pronounced by Lord keeper of England, and the lord chief justice of Scotland, they agreed to certain articles, importing, that all the proposals should be made in writing; and every point, when agreed, reduced to writing: That no points should be obligatory, till all matters should be adjusted in such manner, that the Articles of Adherents should be read before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation: That a committee should be appointed from each commission, to revise the minutes of what might pass, before they should be inserted in the books by the respective secretaries; and that all the proceedings during the treaty should be kept secret. The Scots were inclined to a federal union, like that of the United Provinces; but the English were bent upon an incorporation, so that no Scottish parliament should ever have power to treat the articles of the treaty. The lord keeper proposed that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be for ever united into one realm, by the name of Great Britain: that it should be represented by one and the same parliament; and, that the succession of this monarchy, failing ... of heirs of her majesty's body, should be according to the limitations mentioned in the act of parliament passed in the reign of King William, intituled, An Act for the further security of the crown and the estates of the realm; and for the better securing the laws and statutes, and the rights and liberties of the subject. The Scottish commissioners, in order to comply in some measure with the popular clamour of their nation, presented a proposal, implying, that the union to the crown of Scotland should be established upon the same persons mentioned in the act of King William's reign: that the subjects of Scotland should for ever enjoy all the rights and privileges of the native in England, and the dominions thereunto belonging; that the subjects of England should enjoy like rights and privileges in Scotland: that there should be a free communication and intercourse of trade and navigation between the two kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, contrary to the terms of this union, should be repealed. The English commissioners declined entering into any considerations upon these proposals, declaring themselves fully convinced that nothing but an entire union could settle a perfect and lasting friendship between the two kingdoms. The Scots acquiesced in this reply, and both sides proceeded in the treaty, without any other intervening dispute. They were twiced addressed by the queen, who exhorted them to accept the articles of a treaty that would prove so advantageous to both kingdoms. At length they were finished, arranged, and mutually signed, on the twenty-second of July, and next day presented to his majesty. The whole of the treaty, and the palace of the exchange at the court, by the English court-keeper in the name of the English commissioners, as the same time a sealed copy of the instrument was likewise delivered by the lord chancellor of Scotland: and such made the subjects of both countries, to which the observance returned a very gracious reply. That same day she dictated an order of council, that whoever should be concerned in any discourse or libel, or in laying wagers relating to the union, should be prosecuted with the utmost rigour of the law.

§ XLV. In this famous treaty it was stipulated, that the succession to the united kingdom of Great Britain should be vested in the Princess Sophia, and her heirs, according to the acts already passed in the parliament of England: that the united kingdom should be represented by one and the same parliament: that all the subjects of Great Britain should enjoy a communication of privileges and advantages: that they should have the same allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks; and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations, with respect to commerce and customs: that Scotland should not be subject to any extraordinary duties on some certain commodities: that the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, should be granted to the Scots, as an equivalent for such parts of the customs and excise charged upon that kingdom, in consequence of the union, as would be applicable to the payment of the debts of England according to the proportion which the customs and excise of Scotland bore to those of England: that, as the revenues of Scotland might increase, a further equivalent should be allowed for such proportion of the said increase, as should be applicable to the payment of the debts of England: that the sum to be paid at present, as well as the monies arising from the future equivalents, should be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the English coin, in paying off the capital stock and interest due to the proprietors of the African company, which should be immediately dissolved; in discharging all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland; in promoting and encouraging manufactures and fisheries, under the direction of commissioners to be appointed by her majesty, and accountable to the parliament of Great Britain: that the laws concerning war, peace, trade, commerce, navigation, coinage, and revenue, should be the same throughout the whole united kingdom; but that no alteration should be made in laws which concerned private right, except for evident utility of the subject. There was also an act, that the Court of Session, and all other courts of judicature in Scotland, should remain, and then constituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the same authority and privileges as before the union; subject, nevertheless, to such regulations as should be made by the parliament of Great Britain: that all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and all other rights and jurisdictions, hereditary and ecclesiastical, as well as rights and property, in the same manner as then enjoyed by the laws of Scotland: that the rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland should remain entire after the union: that they should be represented in the parliament of Great Britain by sixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to be elected in such a manner as should be settled by the present parliament of Scotland: that all peers of Scotland and the successors to their honors and dignities, should, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and should have rank and precedence next and immediately after the English peers of the like orders and degrees at the time of the union; and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the union: that they should be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all privileges of peers, as fully as enjoyed by the peers of England, except the right and privilege of sitting in the House of Lords; and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of peers: that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and regalia wherewith the crown of Scotland was attended, as they were attended that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland: that all laws and statutes in either kingdom, so far as might be consistent with the terms of these articles, should cease and be declared void by the respectively legislative assembly of each kingdom; and the whole of the substance of that treaty of union which was so eagerly carried by the English ministry, and proved so unpalatable to the generality of the Scottish nation.

§ I. While this treaty was on the carpet at home, the allied armies proposed such a war against Spain, as the French king had resolved to make very considerable efforts in these countries; and, indeed, at the beginning of the year 1678, it is said that he had resolved, that, by the reduction of Turin and Barcelone, the war would be extinguished in Italy and Catalonia. He knew that he could out-number any body of forces that Prince Louis of Orange could raise; he should assemble, and be resolved to reinforce his army in Flanders, so as to be in a condition to act offensively against the Duke of Marlborough. This nobleman repaired to Holland in the latter end of April; and conferred with the States-General. Then he assembled the army between Borschlohn and Groes-Waren, and found it amounted, after the battle, to more than two thousand squadrons of horse and dragoons, well furnished with artillery and potoon. The court of France having received intelligence that the Dutch and Prussian troops had not yet joined the confederates, ordered the Elector of Bavaria and the Mareschal de Villeroi to attack them before the junction could be effected. In pursuance of this order they passed the Dyle on the nineteenth day of May, and posted them-selfs along the front of all Holland, in the hope of forcing the enemy to leave the army. There they were joined by the horse of the army commanded by Mareschal Marin, and encamped between Tirlemont and Judouge. On Whit'sunday, early in the morning, the Duke of Marlborough advanced with his amy in eight columns towards the village of Ramillies, being by this time joined by the Danes; and he learned that the enemy were in march to give him battle. Next day the French generals perceiving the confederates so near them, took possession of a strong caup, the right extending to the tomb of Hautemont, on the side of the Maheugne; their left to Anderkirk; and the village of Ramillies being near their centre. The confederate army was divided into three battalions, and the right wing was Fitz on the brook of Yasse, and the left by the village of Franqueges, which the enemy had occupied. The duke ordered Lieutenant-General Schults, with twelve battalions and twenty pieces of cannon, to begin the action, by attacking the French and driving them from their artillery. At the same time Velt-Mareschal D'Avrincques, the left, commanded Colnel Wurtzmaier, with four battalions and two pieces of cannon, to dislodge the enemy's infantry posted near the hedges of Franqueges.
Both these orders were successfully executed. The Dutch and Danish horse of the left wing charged with great vigor and intrepidity, but were so roughly handled by the troops of the Duke of Burgundy and the Dutch Artillery, that the former were driven back to give way, when the Duke of Marlborough sustained them with the body of reserve, and twenty squadrons drawn from the right, where a musquet prevented them from acting.
In the mean time, he in person rallied some of the broken squadrons, in order to renew the charge, when his own horse falling, he was surrounded by the enemy, and must have been either killed or taken prisoner, had not a body of infantry come seasonably to his relief. When he re-mounted his horse, the head of Col. Brienfield, his gentleman of the horse, was carried off by a cannon-ball whilehe held the duke's stirrup. Before the reinforcement arrived, the best part of the French musquetrerie were cut in pieces. All the troops posted in Ramillies were either killed or taken. The Duke of Burgundy began to retire in tolerable order, under cover of the cavalry on their left wing, which formed themselves in three lines between Ossut and Anderkirk; but the English horse having found means to pass the rivulet which divided them from the enemy, fell upon them with such impetusity, that they abandoned their foot, and were terribly slaughtered in the village of Anderkirk. They now gave way on all sides. The horse fled three different ways; but were so closely pursued that very few escaped.
The Elector of Bavaria, and the Mareschal de Villerox, saved themselves with the utmost difficulty. Several wagons of the enemy's van-guard breaking down in a narrow pass, osuallyPered such a manner, that the baggage and artillery could not proceed; nor could their troops defile in order. The victorious horse being informed of this accident pressed upon them so vigorously, that great numbers threw down their arms and submitted. The pursuit was followed through Judouge till two o'clock in the morning, five leagues from the field of battle, and within two of Louvaine. In a word, the confederates overwhelmed his troops. The baggage and artillery, about one hundred and twenty colours, or standards, six hundred officers, six thousand private soldiers; and about eight thousand were killed or wounded.
Princ Maximilian and Prince Monbson lost their

in order of battle within half cannon shot of the enemy. Then they advanced to the attack with surprising resolution, and met with such a warm reception from the Duke of Savoy that they were forced to retire. Prince Eugene perceiving this check, drew his sword, and putting himself at the head of the battalions on the left, forced the entrenchments at the first charge. The Duke of Savoy met with the same success in the center and on the right near Lucerno. The Duke of Orleans advanced through the intervals of the foot, left for that purpose; and breaking in with vast impetuosity, completed the confusion of the enemy, who were defeated on all hands, and hastened their flight. The operations of the Po, while the Duke of Savoy entered his capital in triumph. The Duke of Orleans exhibited repeated proofs of the most intrepid courage; and received several wounds in the engagement. Marschal de Marsin fell into the hands of the victors, his thigh being shattered with a ball, and died in a few hours after the amputation. Of the French army about five thousand men were slain on the field of battle; a great number of officers, and upwards of seven thousand men, were taken, together with a hundred and fifty-five pieces of cannon, one hundred and eighty mortars, an incredible quantity of ammunition, all the tents and baggage, five thousand beasts of burden, ten thousand horses belonging to the prisoners, the proportions of dragons, and the mules of the commissary-general, so richly laden, that this part of the booty alone was valued at three million of livres. The loss of the confederates did not exceed three thousand men killed or disabled in the same manner. On the 22d, the Duke of Savoy, having drawn the siege of Turin, which had fallen since the beginning of the siege. This was such a fatal stroke to the interest of Louis, that Madame de Maintenon would not venture to make him fully acquainted with the state of his affairs. He was told that the Duke of Orleans had raised the siege of Turin at the approach of Prince Eugene; but he knew not that his own army was defeated and ruined. The spirits of the French were a little comforted in consequence of Prince Eugene's repulse. Now the Duke of Orleans, the Duke of Orléans, and the Duke of Guise, who commanded a body of troops left in the Mantuan territories. He surprised the Prince of Hesse in the neighbourhood of Castiglione, and obliged him to retire to the Adige, with the loss of two thousand men; but this victory was attended with no consequence in their favour. The Duke of Orleans retreated into Dauphiné, while the French garrisons were driven out of every place they occupied, in Piedmont and Italy, except Cremona, Valenza, and the castle of Milan, which were blocked up by the confederates.

§ IV. Over and above these disaters, which the French sustained in the course of this campaign, they were miserably alarmed before they had entered Italy. The King of France, who was informed by the Marquis de Guiscard, who, actuated by a family disgust, had abandoned his country, and become a partisan of the confederates. He was declared a lieutenant-general in the emperor's army, and came over to London, after having settled a correspondence with the malcontents in the southern parts of France. He insinuated himself into the friendship of Henry St. John, secretary of war, and other persons of distinction. His scheme of invading France was approved by the British ministry, and he was promoted to the command of a regiment of dragoons destined for that service. About eleven thousand men were embarked under the conduct of Earl Rivers, with a large train of artillery and the necessary supplies, commanded by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, set sail from Plymouth on the thirteenth day of August. Next day they were forced into Torbay by contrary winds, and there they held a council of war to concert their operations, when they discovered that Guiscard's plan was altogether chimerical, or at least founded upon such slight assurances and conjectures, as could not justify their proceeding to execution. An express was immediately despatched to the admiralty, with the report of this unfortunate event. Letters arrived at court from the Earl of Galway, after his retreat from Madrid to Valencia, adjuring succours with the most earnest entreaties. The expedition to France was immediately stopped. The Prince of Condé ordered to make the best of his way for Lisbon, there to take such measures as the state of the war in Spain should reader necessary. Guiscard and his officers being set on shore, the fleet sailed with the first fair wind, and towards the latter end of October arrived at Lisbon. On the twenty-eighth of November, a disease, which had portended the death of his eldest son and successor but eight years of age, was even more than his father influenced by a ministry which had private connections with the court of Valencia; he commanded Sir Cloudesley Shovel and Earl Rivers, being pressed by letters from Charles and the Earl of Galway, sailed to their assistance in the beginning of January; and on the twenty-eighth arrived at Alcant, from whence the Earl of Rivers proceeded by land to Valencia, at which place he died. The operations of the ensuing campaign being contested, and the army joined by the reinforcement from England, Earl Rivers, disliking the country, returned with the admiral to Lisbon.

§ V. Poland was at length delivered from the presence of the King of Sweden, who, in the beginning of September suddenly marched through Lusatia into Saxony; and in a little time laid that whole electorate under contribution. Augustus being thus cut off from all resource, resolved to obtain peace on the Swede's own terms, and engaged in a secret treaty for this purpose. In the mean time the Poles and Muscovites attacked the Swedish foundations, and Poland, under the influence of famine routed them with great slaughter. Notwithstanding this event, Augustus ratified the treaty, by which he acknowledged Stanislaus as true and rightful King of Poland, re-ensured the loss of his nearest province, and gave the confederates a not a little alarmed to find Charles in the heart of Germany, and the French court did not fail to court his alliance; but he continued on the reserve against all their solicitations. Then they implored his mediation for a peace; and he answered, that he would interpose his good offices, as soon as he should know he would be agreeable to the powers engaged in the grand alliance.

The pride of Louis was now humbled to such a degree as might have excited the compassion of his enemies. He employed the Elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the Duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the States-general, containing proposals for opening a congress. He had already tampered with the Dutch, in a memorial presented by the Marquis d'Alençon. He likewise besought the Pope to interpose in his behalf. He offered in dote either Spain and the West Indies, or Marseilles and the city of Naples, to King Charles; to give up a barrier for the Dutch in the Netherlands; and to indemnify the Duke of Savoy for the ravages that had been committed in his dominions. Though his real aim was posterity, and not to be persuaded by the necessity of his situation, he hoped, that the terms of the treaty would be acceptable to her parliament of Scotland. She said, an entire and perfect union would be the solid foundation of a lasting peace; it would secure their religion, liberty, and prosperity, remove the anxiety that prevailed among themselves, and the jealousies that subsisted between the two nations; it would increase their strength, riches, and commerce: the whole island would be joined in affection, and free from all apprehensions of danger, and might be enabled to resist all its enemies, support the protestant interest every where, and maintain the liberties of Europe. She renewed her assurance of maintaining the government of their church, and told them, that now they had an opportunity of taking such steps as might be necessary for its security after the union. She demanded the necessary supplies. She observed, that the great success with which God Almighty had blessed her arms afforded the greater prospect of a happy peace, with which they might enjoy the full advantages of this union; that they had no reason to doubt that the parliament of England would do all that should be necessary on their part to confirm the union, if it was with advantage to them, to be joined in deliberating on this great and weighty affair, of such consequence to the whole island of Great Britain.

§ VIII. Juslito the articles of the union had been industriously concealed from the knowledge of the people, but the treaty being read in parliament, and the particulars divulged, such a flame was kindled through the whole nation, as had not appeared since the Restoration. The exiles or Jacobites had always foreseen that this union would extinguish all their hopes of a revolution in favour of a pretender. The nobility found themselves degraded in point of dignity and influence, by being excluded from their seats in parliament. The trading part of the nation beheld their commercial connections with foreign countries restricted, and considered the privilege of trading to the English plantations as a precarious and uncertain prospect of advantage. The barons, or gentlemen, were exasperated as a coalition, by which their parliament was annihilated, and their credit destroyed. The people in general exclaimed, that the dignity of their crown was betrayed, that the independency of their nation had fallen a sacrifice to treachery and corruption, that whatever conditions might be offered, it would be better not to conclude, than be observed by a parliament in which the English had such a majority. They exaggerated the dangers to which the constitution of their church would be exposed from a body of bishops, and a parliament of episcopal claims. Their greater consideration alarmed the presbyterian ministers to such a degree, that they employed all their power and credit in walking the resentment of their hearers against the treaty, which produced a universal ferment among all ranks of people. Even the most rigid puritans joined the cavillers in their censure of this measure, and, in order not to let this undue and illegal matter go unpunished, they proposed an investigation, not only of the treaty, but of the multiplicity of other mischiefs, which were alleged as the cause of the present condition of the kingdom. The first of these noblemen had wavered so much in his conduct, that it is difficult to ascertain his real political principles. He was generally supposed to disapprove the claim of the queen; but he was afraid of embarking too far in his cause, and avoided violent measures in the discussion of this treaty, lest he should incur the resentment of the English parliament, and forfeit the estate he possessed in that kingdom. Athol was more forward in his professions of attachment to the court of St. Germain’s; but he had less ability, and his zeal was supposed to have been inflamed by resentment against the ministry. The debates upon the different articles of the treaty were carried on with great heat and vivacity; and many shrewd arguments were used against this scheme of an incorporating union. One member affirmed, that it would furnish a handle to any aspiring pretender, to the liberties and boroughs of Scotland; for if the parliament of Scotland could alter, or rather subvert, its constitution, this circumstance might be a precedent for the parliament of Great Britain to assume the same power; that the representatives for Scotland would, from their own interest, connive at this and facilitate the means of corruption: and having expressed so little concern for the support of their own constitution, would pay very little regard to that of any other. What (said the Duke of Hamilton) shall we in half an hour give up what our forefathers maintained with their lives and fortunes for many ages? Are here none of the descendants of those worthy patriots, who defended the liberty of their country against all invaders; who assisted the great King Robert Bruce to recover it for the first time for England, and the usurpation of Balliol? Where are the Douglases and Campbells? Where are the peers, where are the barons, once the bulwark of the nation! Shall we yield up the supremacy and independency of our country, when we are commanded by those we represent to preserve the same, and assured of their assistance to support us?”

The Duke of Athol protested against an incorporating union, as contrary to the honour, interest, fundamental laws, and constitution of the Kingdom of Scotland, the birthright of the peers, the rights and privileges of the barons and boroughs, and to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the subjects. To this protest nineteen peers and forty-six members of the council added their names. Sir Francis Mackenzie entered a protest, importing, that no person being successor to the crown of England should inherit that of Scotland, without such previous limitations as might secure the honour and sovereignty of the Scottish crown and kingdom, the frequency and power of parliament, the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, from English or any foreign influence. He was seconded by six-and-forty members. With regard to the third article of the union, stipulating that both kingdoms should be represented by one and the same parliament, the country party observed, that, by ascertaining to this expedient, they did in effect sink their own constitution, while that of England underwent no alteration; that in all avocations there are fundaments on which no power whatever can alter: that the rights and privileges of parliament being one of these fundaments among the Scots, no parliament, or any other power, could ever legally prohibit the meeting of parliaments, or deprive any of the three estates of its right of sitting or voting in parliament, or give up the rights and privileges of parliament; but that by this treaty the parliament of Scotland was entirely abrogated, its rights and privileges sacrificed, and those of the English parliament established. The other side argued, that though the legislative power in parliament was regulated and determined by a majority of voices; yet the giving up the constitutions with the rights and privileges of the country, was a subject of such importance to the nation, and did not, on this occasion, subsist in theuin, and therefore could not be legally surrendered without the consent of every person who had a right to elect and to be represented in parliament. They affirmed that the obligation laid on the Scottish members to reside so long in London, in attendance on the British parliament, would disable Scotland of all its natural rights; impoverish the members, and subject them to the temptation of being corrupted. Another protest was entered by the Marquis of Annandale against an incorporating union, as being odious to the people, subversive of the constitution, and contrary to the sovereignty, and claim of right, and threatening ruin to the church as by law established. Fifty-two members joined in this protestation. Almost every article produced the strongest animadversions. This pretended law was pronounced, and the mschafis which would attend the union, in a pathetic speech, that drew tears from the audience, and is at this day looked upon as a prophecy by great part of the Scottish nation. Addressed against the treaty were presented to parliament by the convention of burgouges, the commissioners of the general assembly, the company trading to Africa and the Indies, as well as from several shires, stewarries, boroughs, towns, and parishes, in all the different parts of the kingdom, without distinction of whig or tory, episcopal or presbyterian. The Earl of Buchan for the peers, Lockhart of Carnwath for the barons, Sir Walter Stuart for behalf of the peers, barons, and representaives of the Camerons, who served them as we, and themselves, as high-constable and earl-marshal of the kingdom, protested severally against the treaty of union.

§ 19. While this opposition raged within doors, the resentment of the people rose to transports of fury and resentment. The town of Edinburgh, with the great body of the Camerons, chose officers, formed themselves into regiments, provided horses, arms, and ammunition, and marching to Dumfries, burnt the articles of the union at the market-cross, justifying their conduct in a public declaration. They made a tender of their attachment to Duke Hamilton, from whom they received encouragement in secret. They reconciled themselves to the episcopalians and the cavaliers; they resolved to take the road to Edinburgh, and, at the instance of the Earl of Athol undertook to secure the pass of Stirling with his highlanders, so as to open the communication between the western and northern parts of the kingdom. Seven or eight thousand men were actually ready to appear in arms at the town of Hamilton, and march directly to Edinburgh, under the duke’s command, when that nobleman altered his opinion, and despatched private couriers through the whole country, requiring the people to defer their meeting till further directions. The mistake of the soldiers accused his Grace of treachery; but in all likelihood he was actuated by prudential motives. He alleged, in his own excuse, that the nation was not in a condition to carry on such an enterprise, and that the Earl of Mar, upon his entering a protest, importing, that no person being successor to the crown of England should inherit that of Scotland, without such previous limitations as might secure the honour and sovereignty of the Scottish crown and kingdom, the frequency and power of parliament, the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, from English or any foreign influence. He was seconded by six-and-forty members. With regard to the third article of the union, stipulating that both kingdoms should be represented by one and the same parliament, the country party observed, that, by ascertaining to this expedient, they did in effect sink their own constitution, while that of England underwent no alteration; that in all avocations there are fundaments on which no power whatever can alter: that the rights and privileges of parliament being one of these fundaments among the Scots, no parliament, or any other power, could ever legally prohibit the meeting of parliaments, or deprive any of the three estates of its right of sitting or voting in parliament, or give up the rights and privileges of parliament; but that by this treaty the parliament of Scotland was entirely abrogated, its rights and privileges sacrificed, and those of the English parliament established. The other side argued, that though the legislative power in parliament was regulated and determined by a majority of voices; yet the giving up the constitutions with the rights and privileges of the country, was a subject of such importance to the nation, and did not, on this occasion, subsist in theuin, and therefore could not be legally surrendered without the consent of every person who had They magnified the advantages that would accrue to the kingdom from the privileges of trading to the English plantations, and being protected in their commerce by a powerful nation, and therefore resolved to throw off the pretended, who they knew was odious to the nation in general. They found means, partly by their promises, and partly by corruption, to bring over the Earls of Roxburgh and Sunderland, with the whole court to whom bad known to be unproportioned to the court. They disarmed the resentment of the clergy, by promising to act as an interest in the union, declaring the presbyterian discipline to be the only government of the church of Scotland, unalterable in all, and that the church was a dummy to the treaty. They sought the African company with the prospect of being indemnified for the losses they had sustained. They amused individuals with the hope of sharing the rest of the equivalent. They employed emusaries to allay the ferment among the Cameronians, and disuade them from the causers, by canting, praying, and demonstrating the absurdity, sinfulness, and danger of such a coalition.

These remonstrances were reinforced by the sum of twenty thousand pounds, which the queen privately lent to the Scottish treasury, and which was now distributed by the runymine in such a manner as might best conduce to the success of the treaty. By these practices they diminished, they opposed, and obtained a considerable major in parliament, which cut out all opposition. Not but that the Duke of Queensberry at one time despaired of succeeding, and being in danger of losing his life, by quitting the calling the parliament, until time and good management he should be able to remove those difficulties that then seemed to be insurmountable. But the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin, who foresaw that the measure would be entirely lost by delay, and was no judge of the difficulties, insisted upon his proceeding. It was at this period that he remitted the money, and gave directions for having forces ready at a call, both in England and Ireland. At length the bill was brought to the Commons, and prepared for the articles of the union, with some small variation. They then prepared an act for regulating the election of the sixteen peers and forty-five commoners to represent Scotland in the British parliament. This being touched with the sceptre, the three estates proceeded to elect their representatives. The remaining part of the session was employed in making regulations concerning the coin, in examining the accounts of their African company, and providing for the due application of the equivalent, which was scandalously misapplied. On the twenty-fifth day of March the commissioner adjourned the parliament, after having, in a short speech, taken notice of the honour they had acquired in the court of Scotland, by their zeal and industry. Having thus accomplished the great purpose of the court, he set out for London, in the neighbourhood of which he was met by above forty noblemen in their coaches, and about four hundred gentlemen on horseback. Next day he waited upon the queen at Kensington, from whom he met with a very gracious reception. Perhaps there is not another instance upon record, of a ministry having carried a point of this importance against such a violent torrent of opposition, and contrary to the general sense and inclination of a whole exasperated people. The Scots were persuaded that their trade would be destroyed, their nation oppressed, and their rights impounded, in consequence of the union with England; and indeed their opinion was supported by very plausible arguments. The majority of both nations believed that the treaty would produce violent convulsions, or, at best, prove ineffectual. But we now see it has been attended with none of the calamities that were prognosticated; that it quietly took effect, and fully answered all the purposes for which it was intended. Hence we may learn, that many great difficulties are surmountable by union, when those who are benefited are satisfied with the execution of any great project; and that many schemes, which theory deems impracticable, will yet succeed in the experiment.

X. The English parliament assembling on the third day of December, the queen, in her speech to both Houses, congratulated them on the glorious successes of her arms. She desired the Commons would grant such supplies as might enable her to improve the advantages of this successful campaign. She told them that the treaty of union, as concluded by the commissioners of both kingdoms, was at that time under consideration of the two parliaments; and she recommended despatch in the public affairs, that both friends and enemies might be convinced of the firmness and vigour of their proceedings. The parliament was perfectly well disposed to comply with all her majesty's requests. Warm addresses were presented by both Houses. Then they proceeded to the consideration of the supply, and having examined the estimates in less than a week, voted near six millions for the service of the ensuing year. Nevertheless, during the acceptance of these provisions arose. They found that the extraordinary supplies for the support of King Charles of Spain, amounted to eight hundred thousand pounds more than the sums provided by parliament. Some members argued that very ill consequences might ensue, if a ministry could thus ruin the nation in debt, and expect the parliament should pay the money. The courtiers answered, that if any thing had been raised without necessity, or ill applied, it was reasonable that those who were in fault should be punished; but, as this expense was incurred to improve advantages, at a time when the occasion could not be communicated to parliament, the ministry was rather to be applauded for their zeal than condemned for their liberalism. Thus being put, the majority voted that those sums had been expended for the preservation of the Duke of Savoy, for the interest of King Charles against the common enemy, and for the safety of the Hanoverian succession. As the speaker presented the money bills, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the Duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was fought before it could be supposed the armies were in the field, so it was on less supposing that the Commons had granted supplies to her majesty before the enemy could well know that the parliament was sitting. The general was again honoured with the thanks of both Houses. The Lords in an address, besought the queen to settle the Scotch Commons, that the Commons might be passed for this purpose; and in pursuance of another address from the Commons, a pension of five thousand pounds out of the post-office was settled upon him and his descendants. The Lords and Commons having adjourned themselves to the last day of December, the queen closed the year with triumphal processions. As the standards and colours taken at Blenheim had been placed in Westminster-hall, so now those that had been brought from the field of Ramillies were put up in Guildhall, as trophies of that victory. About this time, the Earl of Kent, Lindsey, and Kingston, were raised to the rank of marquesses. The Lords Wharton, Paulet, Godolphin, and Bolingbroke, with their sisters, were naturalized, and her apparrel to the Earl of Suffolk, obtained the title of Earl of Bindon: the Lord Keeper Cowper, and Sir Thomas Pelham, were ennobled as barons.

XII. The parliament being assembled after their short recess, the Earl of Nottingham moved for an address to the queen, desiring her majesty would order the proceedings of the commissioners for the union, as well as those of the Scottish parliament on the said subject, be laid before them. He was seconded by the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Rochester; and answered by the Earl of Godolphin, who told them they needed not doubt but that her majesty would communicate those proceedings, as soon as the Scotch parliament should have disposed of the subject of the union. The Lords Wharton, Somers, and Halfax, observed, that it was for the honour of the nation that the treaty of union should, first come ratified from the parliament of Scotland; and that then, and not before, it would be a proper time for the Lords to take it into consideration. On the twenty-eighth day of January, the queen in person told both Houses, that the bills for the union were to be completed by the alteration suggested by an act of the Scotch parliament: that she had ordered it to be laid before them; and hoped it would meet with their concurrence and approbation. She desired the Lords gave the great scheme of the union so tolerably well, in case the treaty should be approved. She observed to both Houses, that now they had an opportunity of putting the last hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms; and that she should look upon it as a particular happiness, if this great work, which had been so often attempted without success, could be brought to perfection in time. The Commons, therefore, provided themselves with a committee of the whole House, to deliberate on the articles of the union, and the Scottish Act of Ratification, the tory party, which was very weak in that assembly, began to start some objections. Sir John Packington disapproved of this incorporating union, which he likened to a marriage with a woman against her consent. He said it was a union carried on by corruption and bribery within doors, by force and violence without; that the promoters of it had been guilty of such perfidy as to induce the King against his own interest, to consent to it. He said to the judgment of the House, to consider whether or no men of such principles were fit to be admitted into their House of representatives. He observed that her majesty, by the coronation oath, was obliged to maintain the church of England as by law established; and likewise bound by the same oath to defend the presbyterian kirk of Scotland in one and the same kingdom. Now, said he, after this union is in force, who shall administer this oath to her majesty? It is not the business of the Scots, who are incapable of it, and no well-wishers to the church of England. It is then only the part of the bishops to do it; and can it be supposed that such men as will act a thing so contrary to their own order and institution, as thus to promote the establishment of the presbyterian church-government in the united kingdom? He added, that the church of England being established jure divinum, and the Scots presbyterian church erected at will, he could not tell how two nations that clashed in so essential an article could unite; he, therefore, thought it proper to consult the parliament on this critical point. A motion was made that the first article of the treaty, which implies a preambular agreement to an incorporating union, should be postponed; and that the House should proceed to the consideration of the terms of the intended union, containing three articles. The proposal being read, some tory members quitted the House; and all the articles were examined and approved without further opposition. The whigs were so exact in the prosecution of this point, that they proceeded in a very superficial manner, and with such precipitation as furnished their enemies with a plausible pretence to affirm that they had not considered the treaty with the coolness and deliberation which an affair of this importance required.

41. Before the Lords began to investigate the articles of the union, they, at the instance of the Archbishop of Canterbury, brought in a bill for the security of the church of England, to be inserted as a fundamental and essential part of it. It passed the House without opposition, and received the royal assent. On the fifteenth day of February, the debates concerning the union began in the House of Lords, the queen being present, and the Bishop of Sarum chairman of the committee. The Earls of Rochester, Anglesea, and Nottingham, argued against the union; as did the Bishop of Bath and Wells. Lord Haversham, in a premeditated bararque, and the question was, Whether two nations independent in their sovereignties, that had their distinct laws and interest, their different forms of worship, church-government, and order, should be united into one kingdom? He supposed it a union made up of so many mismatched pieces, of such part that the kirk was as the best, that such an union would never take effect, it would carry the necessary consequences of a standing power and force, to keep them from falling under and breaking in pieces every moment. He repeated what had been said by Lord Bacon, that a unity paved up by direct admission of contadictories in the fundamental points of it, is like the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image, which were made of iron and clay, they may cleave together, but would never incorporate. He dis- sented from the words of Sir Harford, who embraced all the Scottish constitution, in which he dreaded some alteration from the additional weight of sixty-one Scottish members, and these too returned by a Scottish privy council. He took notice, that twenty-five hundred Scotch ecclesiastics, and as many lay sages, were excluded from sitting and voting to parliament, though they had as much right of inheritance to sit there, as an English peer had of sitting in the parliament of England. He expressed his apprehension of this precedent; and asked what security any peer of England and peer of Scotland, or any earl, marquis, duke, or lords had not. He said, if the bishops would break their own cause, so far as to give up the two great points of episcopal ordination and confirmation; if they would approve and ratify the act for securing the presbyterian church-government in Scotland, as the true protestant religion and purity of worship; they must give up that which had been contended for between them and the presbyterians for thirty years, and been defended by the Kirk of Scotland to the utmost of their strength. He objected to the exempting articles, by which heritable offices and superstities were reserved. He affirmed that the union was contrary to the sense of the Scottish nation; that the murmurs of the people had been so loud as to fill the whole kingdom; and so bold as to reach even to the doors of the parliament; that the parliament itself had suspended their beloved clausse in the act of security for arming the people: that the government had issued a proclamation promising all salvation, bloodshed, and maiming committed upon those who should be found in tumults. From these circumstances he concluded, that the Scottish nation was averse to an incorporating union, which would make them mere ciphers in that union, and subjected them to the experiments in both nations. Lords North and Grey complained of the small and unequal proportion of the lands, taxes imposed upon Scotland. The Earl of Nottingham had already at it, and the Scots were not the worse for it by the treaty let into all the branches of the English trade, and paid so little towards the expense of the government, should moreover have such a round sum by way of equivalent. The same topics were insisted upon by the Lords of North and Grey, on the customs, the minister-hall, the fortresses in Scotland, and the duties of Scotland. The Earl of Nottingham, after having opposed every article separately, concluded with words to this effect: "As Sir John Maynard said to the late king at the revocation of the massacre, that in his opinion a degree of union, that he did not fear, was to be asked for; and that in this union any prince should be afraid to come in, in consideration of the greatness of the advantage: that the chief dangers to which the church was exposed arose from France and popery; and this union would effectually secure it against these evils; that Scotland lay on the weakest side of England, which could not be defended but by an expensive army. Should a war break out between the two nations, and Scotland be conquered, yet even in that case it would be necessary to keep it under with a standing army, which any enterprising prince might model for his ambitious purposes, and joining with the Scots, enslave his English dominion; that any union after a conquest would be compulsory, consequently of short duration; whereas now it was voluntary, it would be lasting: that with regard to ecclesiastical affairs, all burdens and anomalies might be allayed by soft and gentle management. The cantons of Switzerland, though they professed different religion, were yet united in one general bond; and the confededes of Germany were preserved as princes and states, among whom three different persuasions prevailed: so that two sorts of discipline might very well subsist under one legislature. If there was any danger in either, it was that good old English freedom of the most durable; and, as it was five hundred and thirteen members could certainly be too hard for forty-five; and in the House of Lords, six-and-twenty bishops would always proportionately prevent the opposition made by the lords of the toy interest, every article was approved by a great majority, though not without a good number of protestations; and a bill of ratification was prepared in the lower House by Sir Simon Harcourt, the solicitor-general, in such a manner as to remove all reason to doubt the intention of the articles, as they passed in Scotland, were recited by way of preamble, together with the acts made in both parliaments for the security of the set public revenue; and in conclusion there was one clause, by which the whole was ratified and enacted into a law. By this contrivance, those who were designing to stultify new difficulties found themselves obliged to pass from punishment. The latter could not object to the recall, which was barely matter of fact; and they had not strength sufficient to oppose the general enacting clause. On the other hand, the whigs promised it with such zeal that it passed by a majority of one hundred and fourteen, before the others had recollectted themselves from the surprise which the structure of the bill had occasioned. It made its way through the House of Lords with equal despatch; and, when it received the royal sanction, the queen expressed the utmost satisfaction. She said she did not doubt but it would be remembered and spoke of hereafter, to the honour of those who had been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. The law of nature, the kinship, the interest, should from henceforward behave with all possible respect and kindness towards one another, that so it might appear to all the world they had hearts disposed to become one people.

A. D. 1707.

§ XV. As the act of union did not take place till the first of May, a great number of traders in both kingdoms resolved to take advantage of this interval. The English proposed to export into Scotland such commodities as entitled them to drawback, with a view to bring them back after the first of May. The Scots on the other hand, as their duties were much lower than those in England, intended to import great quantities of such articles, and to sell them for a greater advantage in England after the union, when there would be a free intercourse between the two nations. Some of the munsters had embarked in this fraudulent design, which alarmed the merchants of England to such a degree, that they presented a remonstrance to the Commons. Resolutions were immediately taken in the House against these practices, and a bill was prepared; but the Lords apprehending that it in some measure infringed the articles of the Union, and that it might give umbrage to the Scottish nation, it was dropped. The fraud was in a good measure prevented by the previous resolutions of the House; and the first day of May was not at all brought to the test of necessity. On the twenty-fourth day of April the queen prorogued the parliament, after having given them to understand, that she would continue by proclamation the Lords and Commons already assembled, as members in the first British parliament on the part of England, pursuant to the powers vested in her by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, ratifying the treaty of union. The parliament was accordingly revolved by proclamation, and another issued to convocate the first parliament of Great Britain for the twenty-third day of October. The Scots repaired to London, where they were well received by the queen, who bestowed on the title of duke on the Earl of Rochburgh and Montrose. She likewise granted a commission for a new privy council in that kingdom, to be in force till the next session of parliament, that the nation might not be disgusted by too sudden an alteration of outward appearances. The first of May was appointed as a day of public thanksgiving; and congratulatory addresses were sent up from all parts of England: but the university of Oxford prepared no compliment; and the Scots presented to the queen a number of verses, which was not acceptable. The latter was accordingly revolved by proclamation, and another issued to convocate the first parliament of Great Britain for the twenty-third day of October. The Scots repaired to London, where they were well received by the queen, who bestowed on the title of duke on the Earl of Rochburgh and Montrose. She likewise granted a commission for a new privy council in that kingdom, to be in force till the next session of parliament, that the nation might not be disgusted by too sudden an alteration of outward appearances. The first of May was appointed as a day of public thanksgiving; and congratulatory addresses were sent up from all parts of England: but the university of Oxford prepared no compliment; and the Scots presented to the queen a number of verses, which was not acceptable.

§ XVI. In the course of this session the Commons, in an address to the queen, desired she would re-settle the islands of St. Christopher's and Nevis in the West Indies, which had been neglected by her predecessors. The latter addressed to the queen, praying she would concert measures for suppressing a body of pirates who had made a settlement on the island of Madagascar, as also for recovering and preserving the ancient possession, trade, and fisheries in Newfoundland. The French refugees likewise delivered a petition to the queen, praying she would prevent the persecution of the Protestants in France which the persecuted protestants in France had resided from the assistance of her royal predecessors, acknowledging their own happiness in living under her gentle government, among the people by whom they had been kindly treated when driven from their native country, and improving her majesty's interposition and good offices in favour of their distressed and persecuted brethren abroad. She graciously received this address, declaring, she had always been and would continue to be the protector of the protestants in France; that she would communicate her thoughts on this subject to her allies; and she expressed her hope that such measures might be taken as should sufficiently answer the intent of their petition. In the month of May she granted an audience to an ambassador extraordinary from the Czar of Muscovy, who delivered a letter from his master, containing complaints of King Augustus, who had instigated the Russian troops sent to his assistance, concluded a dishonourable peace with Charles King of Sweden, without the knowledge of his allies, and surrendered Count Patkul, the Muscovite minister, as a deserter, to the Swedish monarch, contrary to the law of nations. She declared she would shun all communication with the Czar; that she desired her Britannic majesty would use her good offices to prevent the enlargement of the Count, and the other Russian prisoners detained at Stockholm; and that she would take proper care to prevent the Russian auxiliaries upon the Isthme, that they might enter into the service of the allies, or be at liberty to return in safety to their own country. The queen actually interposed in behalf of Patkul; but her intercession proved ineffectual, and that unhappy minister was put to death with all the circumstances of wanton barbarity. As many severe sentences, and sarcastic writings had lately appeared, in which the whigs and ministry were reviled and reflections hinted to the prejudice of the queen, the queen was desired to solve to make examples of the authors and publishers of these licentious productions. Dr. Joseph Browne was twice pilloried for a copy of verses entitled, "The Country Poiser's Advice to the Lord Keeper," and after which be afterwards wrote to Mr. Secretary Harley. William Stephens, rector of Sutton in Surrey, underwent the same sentence, as author of a pamphlet, called, "A Letter to the Author of the Memorial of the Church of England." Edward Ward was fixed and set in the pillory, for having written a burlesque poem on the times, under the title of "Hudibras Redivivus"; and the same punishment was inflicted upon William Pitee, author of a performance entitled," The Case of the Church of England's Memorial fairly stated." repeated. About this period the Earl of Sunderland was appointed one of the secretaries of state, in the room of Sir Charles Nicholls. This change won great opposition from Harley, who was in his heart an enemy to the Duke of Marlborough, and all his adherents; and had already, by his secret intrigues, made considerable progress in a scheme for superseding the influence of the Duke in the councils of the kingdom.

§ XVIII. The French king at this juncture seemed to be entirely abandoned by his former good fortune. He had sustained such a number of successive defeats as had devoured the kingdom of personages and soldiers; and his treasury was quite exhausted:

He had endeavoured to support the credit of his government by issuing mint-bills, in imitation of the bank notes of England; but notwithstanding all his pretexts, they passed at a discount of three-and-fifty per cent. The lands lay uncultivated; the manufactures could be no longer carried on; and the subjects perished with famine. The allies, on the other hand, seemed to prosper in every quarter. They had become masters of the greatest part of the Netherlands, in consequence of the victory at Ramillies: the army of King Charles was considerably reinforced: a scheme was formed for the conquest of Toulon, by the troops of the emperor and the English; supplies were collected by means of the Queen Anne, and assisted by the combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir Cloudesly Shovel. In a word, France seemed to be reduced to the worst extremity, from which nothing could have saved her but the jealousy and misconduct of the confederates. Louis, by virtue of his capitulation with the emperor in Italy, was enabled to send such reinforcements into Spain, as turned the fortune of the war in that country; while the distractions in the council of King Charles prevented that unanimity and concurrence, without which no success can be expected. The Earl of Peterborough declared against an offensive war, on account of the difficulty of finding subsistence in Castile; and advised the Emperor Charles to trust to the expedition against Toulon. This opinion he sent from Italy, to which he had withdrawn.

§ XIX. Charles, however, was persuaded to penetrate once more to Madrid, and give battle to the enemy wherever they should appear. On the thirteenth day of March the army was assembled at Caudiel, to the number of sixteen thousand men; under the auspices of the Marquis del Menas, to whom the Earl of Galway was second in command. They marched towards Yecla, and under took the siege of Vílora; but, having received intelligence that the Duke of Berwick was in the neighbourhood, they advanced on the fourteenth day of April in four columns towards the city of Almansa, which was drawn up in order of battle, their number being considerably superior to that of the confederates. The battle began about two in the afternoon, and the whole front of each army was fully engaged. The English and Dutch stood on the left, supported by the Portuguese. Each of the second line, were overpowered after a gallant resistance. The centre, consisting chiefly of battalions from Great Britain and Holland, oblied the enemy to give way, and drove their first upon their second line: but the Portuguese cavalry on the right being broken at their first charge, their foot betook themselves to flight; so that the English and Dutch troops being left naked on the thanks, were surrounded and attacked on every side. In this dreadful emergency they formed themselves into a square, and retired from the field of battle. By this time the men were quite spent with fatigue, and all their ammunition exhausted: they were ignorant of the country, abandoned by their former habits of provision, and cut off from all hope of supply. Moved by these dismal considerations, they capitulated, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, to the amount of thirteen battalions. The Portuguese, guard the baggage, retreated to Alcera, where they were joined by the Earl of Galway, with about five-and-twenty hundred dragoons which he had brought from the field of battle. About two hundred men of the allied army were killed upon the spot, and among that number Brigadier Killigrew, with many officers of distinction. The Earl of Galway, who charged in person at the head of Guscuard's dragoons, received two deep cuts in the face. The Marquis del Menas was run through the arm, and saw his concubine, who fought in the habit of an Amazon, killed by his side: the Lords Tyrwhali, Mark Ker, and Colonel Clayton, were wounded: all their artillery, together with a hundred and thirty thousand francs' worth of baggage, and ten thousand men, were taken; so that no victory could be more complete: yet it was not purchased without the loss of two thousand men slain in the action, including some officers of eminence. The Duke of Berwick, who commanded the troops of King Philip, acquired a great addition of fame by his conduct and behaviour before and during the engagement; but his authority was superseded by the Duke of Orleans, who arrived in the army immediately after the battle. This prince seemed to entertain some private views of his own; for he took no effectual step to improve the victory. He began a private negotiation with the Earl of Galway, during which the two armies lay; and at length agreed to the sum of money to be paid to the Earl, the merchants, and others, and a scheme for the surrender of Toulon, to be carried into execution. He embarked at Barcelona for Lisbon, and General Carpenter remained commander of the English forces quartered in Catalonia, which was now the only part of Spain that remained to King Charles.

§ XX. The attempt upon Toulon by the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene might have succeeded, if the emperor, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of the maritime powers, had not divided his army in Italy, by detaching a considerable body through the plains of Maestricht towards Naples, of which he took possession without any difficulty. Besides, ten thousand recruits destined for the imperial forces in Italy were detained in Germany, from apprehension of the King of Sweden, who remained in Savoy, and seemed to be upon very indifferent terms with the emperor. With the assistance of the English and Dutch fleets, the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene passed the Var on the eleventh day of July, at the head of an army of thirty thousand men, and marched directly towards Toulon, whether the artillery and ammunition were conveyed on board of the combined squadrons. The French king was extremely alarmed at this attempt, as five thousand of the enemy, in the best part of his fleet, were in the harbour of Toulon, and ran the greatest risk of being entirely taken or destroyed. The whole kingdom of France was filled with consternation, when they learned their enemy was in the bosom of their country. The emperor resolved to leave no stone unturned for the relief of the place, and his subjects exerted themselves in a very extraordinary manner for its preservation. The nobility of the adjacent provinces armed their servants and tenants, at the head of whom they marched into the city: they coned their plate, and pawned their jewels for money to pay the workmen employed upon the fortifications; and such industry was used, that in a few days the town and harbour, which had been greatly neglected, were put in a good posture of defence. The allies took possession of the eminences that commanded the city, and the ordnance being landed, erected batteries. From these they began to cannonade and bombard the town, while the fleet attacked and reduced two forts at the entrance of the mole, and co-operated in the siege with their guns and bomb-ketches. The garrison was numerous, and defended the place with great vigour. They sunk ships in the harbour to the depth of fifteen feet, generated a prodigious fire from the ramparts: they made desperate sallies, and even drove the besiegers from one of their posts with great slaughter. The French king, alarmed at this design of his enemies, ordered troops to march towards Toulon to counteract it. The artillery being too few, he ordered the forces that were on route to improve the victory of Almazia: a great part of the army under Villars on the Rhone was detached to Provence, and the court of Versailles declared the negotiators of Burgundy should march at the head of a strong army to the relief of Toulon.

The Duke of Savoy being apprized of these preparations, seeing no hope of reducing the place, and being apprehensive that his passage would be intercepted, resolved to abandon it and retreat on the wing from the enemy's encampment, with the sick and wounded, he decamped in the night, under favour of a terrible bombardment and cannonading from the English fleet, and retreated to his own country without molestation. 22 Then he undertook the reduction of Susa, the garnison of which surrendered at discretion. By this conquest he not only secured the key to his own dominions, but also opened to himself a free passage into Dalmatia.

§ XXI. Sir Cloudesley Shore having left a squadron with Sir Thomas Dilkes for the Mediterranean service, set sail for England with the rest of the fleet, and was in soundings on the twenty-second of June. About eight o'clock at night, his own ship, the Association, struck upon the rocks of Scilly, and perished with every person on board. This was likewise the fate of the Eagle and the Romney: the Freestyle was dashed to pieces on the rock, and the boat found two men were drowned in the boat; the Phoenix was driven on shore: the Royal Anne was saved by the presence of mind and uncommon dexterity of Sir George Byng and his officers: the St. George, commanded by Lord Dursley, struck upon the rocks, but a wave set her astern again. The admiral's body was cast ashore, and stripped and buried in the sand; but afterwards discovered and brought into Plymouth, from whence it was conveyed to London, and interred. Sir John Abbey and Sir Cloudesley Shore were born of mean parentage to the county of Suffolk; but raised himself to the chief command at sea, by his industry, valour, skill, and integrity. In the Upper Rhine the allies were unprospers. The Prince of Baden was dead, and the German army so inconsiderable, that it could not defend the lines of Blud against the Mareschal de Villars, who broke through this work, esteemed the rampart of Germany, reduced Halsatt, defeated a body of horse, laid the duchy of Wurtemberg under contribution, took Stuttgard and Schondorf; and routed three thousand Germans entrenched at Lorch, under the command of General Janus, who was made prisoner. In all probability the states have ventured too much in order to the restoration of the Elector of Bavaria, had not he been obliged to stop in the middle of his career, in consequence of his army's being diminished by sending off detachments to Provence. The imperial army retar-ded Hailseron, and the command of it was, at the request of the emperor and allies, assumed by the Elector of Hanover, who restored military discipline, and acted with uncommon prudence and circumspection; but he had not force sufficient to undertake any enterprise of importance.

22 Had the Duke of Savoy marched with expedition from the Var, he would have been forced upon Charles; but he lingered in such a manner as gives reason to believe he was not weary in the enterprise: and his expedition did not fail short of him, being known by Prince Eugene.

§ XXII. In the month of April, the Duke of Marlborough set out from the Hague for Leipsic with a letter from the queen to Charles XII. of Sweden, whose designs on Germany were still so menacing. The British king had sent help being alarmed at his being in the heart of Germany. The duke was pushed upon as the most proper ambassador, to soothe his vanity and penetrate into his real intentions. He found this real character not such, but recorded in his appearance and economy, savage in his deportment, ferocious, illiterate, stubborn, implacable, and reserved. The English general assailed him on the side of his vanity, that part by which he was accessible. "Sure," said he, "I am not so far from the chancery, but from the heart of the queen my mistress, and written with her own hand. Had not her sex prevented her from taking so long a journey, she would have crossed the sea to see a prince admired by the whole universe. I esteem myself happy in having the honour of assuring your majesty of my regard; and I should think it a great happiness, if my affairs would allow me, to learn under so great a sovereign as your majesty what I want to know in the art of war." Charles was pleased with this overstrained compliment, which seems to have been calculated for a raw, unintelligent barbarian, without any sense of the present situation. He pressed particular veneration for Queen Anne, as well as for the person of her ambassador, and declared he would take no steps to the prejudice of the grand alliance. Nevertheless, the sincerity of this declaration has been questioned. This is the case with all the actions of his minister, Count Piper, to their interest. Certain it is, he most un decorously sought occasion to quarrel with the emperor, and treated him with great insolence, until he submitted to all his demands. The treaty being concluded upon the terms he thought proper to impose, he had no longer the least shadow of pretence to continue his disputes with the court of Vienna: and therefore began his search for Poland, which was by this time overrun by the Czar of Muscovy.

§ XXIII. The Duke of Marlborough returning from Saxony, assembled the allied army at Andelbrach near Brussels, about the middle of May; and, understanding that the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke de Vendome, who commanded the French forces, had quitted their lines, he advanced to Sogna, with a design to engage them in the plain of Fleurs. But receiving certain intelligence that the enemy were greatly superiority in the allies in number, by the help of drafts from all the garrisons, he retreated towards Brussels, and took post at Milttert; while the French advanced to Gemblours. Both armies lay in such a way towards one another as to render the establishment of the treaty towards Provence. Then the Duke of Marlborough and General D'Avusenerque resolved to attack them in their fortiest camp at Gemblours. But they retreated with such celerity from one post to another, that the confederates could not come up with them until they were entirely encamped with the right at Ponta-Tresin, and their left under the cannon of Lisle, covered with the river Scheldt, and secured by entrenchments. The allies chose their camp at Helchin, and foraged under the cannon of Tournay, with an alliance of the enemy: but nothing could induce them to hazard an engagement; and both armies went into winter quarters in the latter end of October. The Duke of Marlborough set out for Frœnkfort, where he conferred with the Electors of Hanover, Hannover, and Palatine, about the operations of the next campaign; then he returned to the Hague, and having concerted the necessary arrangements, the deputies of the States-General, embarked for England the beginning of November.

§ XXIV. The queen's private favour was now shifted to a new object. The Duchess of Marlborough was supplied by her own authority, her own means, whom she had rescued from indignity and obscurity. This favourite succeeded to that ascendancy over the mind of her sovereign which the duchess had formerly possessed. She was more humble, pliable, and obliging, than her first patroness, who had played the tyrant and threatened the queen in some of her most respected maxims. Her majesty's propriety in favour of the Tories and high-churchmen was no longer insolently condemned and violently opposed. The new candidate conformed to all her prejudices, and encouraged all her designs with assent and approbation.

In political intrigues she acted as associate, or rather auxiliary, to Mr. Secretary Harley, who had immunized himself into the queen's good graces; and determined to be the credit of the Duke of Marlborough and Earl of Godolphin. His aim was to unite the Tory interest under his own auspices, and expel the whigs from the advantage they then enjoyed. The governor's chief conductor in this scheme, was Henry St. John, afterwards Lord Bolingbroke, a man of warm imagination and elegant taste, penetrating, eloquent, ambitious, and enterprising, whose talents were rather precocious than solid, and whose principles were loose and fluctuating. He was at first contented to act in an inferior capacity, subservient to the designs of the secretary: but when he understood the full extent of his own parts and influence, he was freed from the medium of the minister's government; and from the sphere of his minister raised himself to the character of his rival. These politicians, with the assistance of Sir Simon Harcourt, a colleague of uncommon ability and credit, exerted themselves to rally and establish the Tories, who were given to understand, that the queen could no longer bear the tyranny of the whigs: that she had been always a friend in her heart to the Tory and high-church party; and that she could now exhibit manifest proof of her inclination. She accordingly bestowed the bishopric of Chester and Exeter upon Sir William Dawes and Dr. Blackall, who, though otherwise of unblemished character, had openly opposed the revolution.

§ XXV. The people in general began to be sick of the whig ministry, whom they had formerly caressed. To them it imputed the burdens under which they groaned; the miseries which had grown to such a degree to bear by the pomp of triumph, and uninterrupted success. At present they were discouraged by the battle of Almanza, the miscarriage of the expedition against Toulon, the loss of Sir Cloudsley Shovel, and the fate of four ships of the line, destroyed or taken by a squadron under the command of Messieurs Forbin and Du Gignon Trouin, two of the most enterprising sea-officers in the French service. No new advantage had been obtained in the Netherlands: France, instead of sinking under the weight of the confederacy, seemed to rise with fresh vigour from every overthrow: the English traders had lately sustained repeated losses for want of proper conveys; the coin of the nation was cara and debased; and the ambition of eclipsing his principal, and from the sphere of his minister raised himself to the character of his rival. These politicians, with the assistance of Sir Simon Harcourt, a colleague of uncommon ability and credit, exerted themselves to rally and establish the Tories, who were given to understand, that the queen could no longer bear the tyranny of the whigs: that she had been always a friend in her heart to the Tory and high-church party; and that she could now exhibit manifest proof of her inclination. She accordingly bestowed the bishopric of Chester and Exeter upon Sir William Dawes and Dr. Blackall, who, though otherwise of unblemished character, had openly opposed the revolution.

so that the generality of the Scottish nation loudly exclaimed against the union and the government. The Jacobites were again in commotion. They held conferences: they maintained a correspondence with the court of St. Germain's: a great number of the most rigid whigs entered so far into their measures, as to think a revolution was absolutely necessary to the safety of the government. Under the influence of these considerations, they endeavored to make the English people think of a separation of the two kingdoms, and threw themselves into an insurrection. They raised money in greater quantities than ever before, and organized matters more effectually than before. The government was alarmed. The queen was seized with anxiety. She had recourse to her saucepans, resolved, that the kingdom had been put to excessive charge, by means of great arrears of rent returned by the late taxes, as due out of the forfeited estates, which returns were false and unjust, and, that an humble representation should be laid before her majesty on this subject. They passed another laudable resolution in favour of their own manufactures. They granted the necessary supplies, and having finished several bills for the royal assent, were prorogued on the twenty-sixth day of October.

§ XXVI. It was on the twenty-third of the same month, that the queen determined to dismiss the legislature at Westminster, when the queen, in her speech to both houses, palliated the miscarriages in Provence and in Spain; represented the necessity of making further efforts against the rebellion in the two kingdoms; and the necessity of calling upon the guard against those who endeavoured to sow jealousies in the commonwealth. The Commons, in their address, expressed the coyness of their former zeal and devotion to the government; but in the House of Lords, the Earl of Wilmington expressed his apprehension of the necessity of money, the decay of trade, and the mismanagement of the navy. He was seconded by Lord Somers, and the leaders of the tory party, who proposed, that previous to every measure, there should be a committee to examine the necessity of the measure. The design of Wharton and Somers was to raise the Earl of Oxford once more to the head of the admiralty; and the tories, who did not possess their drift, answered, that they could do no harm without the concurrence of the allegiance upon the whig ministers. A day being fixed for this examination, the house received a petition from the sheriffs and merchants of London, complaining of great loss by sea, for want of cruisers and resources; and these complaints were proved by witnesses. The report was sent to the lord admiral, who answered all the articles paragraphed: they should convene for an address, in which they should declare their minds to his majesty, and informed the same, that the minority of Scotland should be on the same footing with that of England: that the powers of the justices of the peace should be the same, through the whole island: that the lords of justiciary in Scotland should go on with their sessions as before: that the Scotch members of commons should be directed, and returned, in the same manner as practised in England. An act being formed on these resolutions, the king in council, in June, in the month of June, in Portugal: then they considered the state of the war in Spain.

§ XXVII. When the queen passed these bills, she recommended an augmentation in the aids and auxiliaries granted to the army, and increased the quantity of wines and spirits exported from thence into England, were made in all the northern parts with an affection of severity and disdain: Peterborough were extolled by the Earl of Rochester and Lord Haversham, who levelled some oblique reflections at the Earl of Galway. Several lords enlarged upon the necessity of carrying on the war until King Charles should be driven from his throne by the fruits of his unfaithfulness.

The Earl of Peterborough said they ought to contribute nine shipfuls in the pound rather than make peace on any other terms: he declared himself ready to return to Spain, and serve every one under the Earl of Galway. The Earl of Rochester represented a system of the old Duke of Schomberg, that attacking France in the Netherlands was like taking a bull by the horns. He therefore proposed, that the allies should stand on the defensive in Flanders, and decline any operation in divers letters or written decrees, or even to ask a truce of the Catalans. He was seconded by the Earl of Nottingham; but warmly opposed by the Duke of Marlborough, who urged, that the great towns in Brabant which he had conquered could not be preserved without a considerable number of men; and that if the Spanish should gain any advantage in Flanders their superiority in point of number, the discontented party in Holland, which was very numerous, and bore with patience the burthen of the war, would not fail crying aloud for peace. Being challenged by Rochester to show how troops could be procured for the service in Italy and Spain, he assured the House, that measures had been already concerted with the emperor for that service. Then he added, that the Duke of Savoy, for sending powerful succours to King Charles. This declaration finished the debate, which issued in an affectionate address to her majesty. The Lords did not, but one private measure the more, make any demonstrations of the Queen or her advisors. The ministry finding it strenuously supported by all the peers, and a considerable number of the other faction, would have compromised the design, by proposing that the privy council of Scotland should convene the day of October. They hinted this expedient, in hope of being able to influence the ensuing elections; but their design being palpable, the motion was overruled, and the late court of the Stannaries, for reasons of the supply, which amounted to the enormous sum of six millions.

§ XXVIII. At this period Mr. Harley's character incurred the censure from the French cabinet. The Ducreux, inferior clerk in his office, who was detected in a correspondence with Monsieur Chamiard, the French king's minister. When his practices were detected he made an ample confession, and pleading guilt to his indictment at the Old Bailey, was condemned to death for high treason.

At the same time, John Bara and Alexander Caliere were committed to Newgate, for corresponding with the enemy, and Claude Bunde, secretary to the Duke of Savoy's minister, was, at the request of his master, apprehehended for traitorous practices against her majesty and her government. A committee of seven lords being appointed to examine these delinquents, made a report to the House, which were transmitted to the town, and the whole public. It is apparent, that Gregg had discovered secrets of state to the French minister; that Alexander Caliere and John Bara had managed a correspondence with the governors and commanders-in-chief. The Duke of Savoy, and all probable, discovered to the enemy the stations of the British cruisers, the strength of their convoys, and the times at which the merchant ships proceeded on their voyages: that all the papers in the office of Mr. Secretary Harley had been destroyed in a considerable time; that they were kept by the most trusted clerks; and that the perusal of all the letters to and from the French prisoners had been chiefly trusted to Gregg, a person of a very suspicious character, and known to be infatuated upon this particular subject. The Earl of Marlborough, in his address to the House of Commons, declared that he must, in hopes of making some important discovery: but he really knew nothing of consequence to the nation. He was an ignobls Scot, who had been employed as a spy in his own country, and now offered his services to Chamiard, with a view of being rewarded for his treachery; but he was discovered before he had reaped any advantage. And this was an instance of so small a part of importance to impart, he was executed at Tyburn, where he delivered a paper to the sheriff, in which he declared Mr. Harley entirely ignorant of all his treasonable communications, notwithstanding some endeavours that were made to engage him to declare the whole.

§ XXIX. The queen had refused to admit the Earl of Peterborough into her presence, until he should have vindicated his conduct, of which King Charles had complained in divers letters and written decrees. He was consequently divorced from his ministerial duty. His military proceedings, his negotiations, his disposal of the remittances, were taken into consideration by both Houses; but he produced such a number of witnesses and original papers to justify every transaction, that his character triumphed in the inquiry, which was dropped before it produced any resolution in parliament. Then they took cognizance of the state of affairs in Spain, and found there had been a great defection in the English troops at the battle of Almanza. This, however, was explained so much to their satisfaction, that they voted an address to the queen, thanking her for having taken measures to restore the affairs in Spain, and provide foreign troops for that service. But the duke of Marlborough added, that a more complete met with a vigorous opposition in the House of Lords from the court party, on account of the clause enacting, That, after the first of May, there should be no more troops raised in this kingdom. The ministry finding it strenuously supported by all the tories, and a considerable number of the other faction, would have compromised the design, by proposing that the privy council of Scotland should convene the day of October. They hinted this expedient, in hope of being able to influence the ensuing elections; but their design being palpable, the motion was overruled, and the late court of the Stannaries, for reasons of the supply, which amounted to the enormous sum of six millions.

The Duke of Marlborough and the Earl of Godolphin, being apprised of his secret practices in this matter, pressed thematter forward, and were not to be deterred. They served her no longer, should Mr. Harley continue in the post of secretary. Being summoned to the cabinet council, they waited on her person and expostulated on the necessity of taking some decisive measures. They were received with the utmost clemency; and she affected to treat them with soft persuasion, which had no effect; and when they retired from court, to the astonishment of all the spectators, she repaired in person to the council. There Mr. Secretary Harley began to explain the cause of their meeting, which was some circumstance relating to foreign affairs. The Duke of Somerset said he did not see how they could deliberate on such matters while the general and treasurer were absent: the other members observed a motion was made, and the queen found herself in danger of being abandoned by her ministers. Next day her majesty sent for the Duke of Marlborough, and told him that Harley should immediately resign the place, and to make his resignations. The Duke of Marlborough went to the chamber, and said, that his resignation would be presented to the queen, that he and Lord Boyce, chancellor of the exchequer, but she deeply received the department of the duke and the Earl of Godolphin, from whom she entirely withdrew her confidence. Sir Simon Harcourt, attorney-general, the Earl of Somers, comptroller of the household, and Mr. St. John, relinquished their several posts under the disgrace of Harley.

§ XXX. The kingdom was at this period alarmed with a threatened invasion from France. The court of St. Germain's had sent over a colonel to Scotland, to learn the situation, number, and abilities of the pretender's friends in that country. This minister, by his misconduct, produced a division among the Scots, and the prevalence of his Jacobite principles. As he had his own interest, he attached himself wholly to the Duke of Athol, and those other zealous partisans who were bent upon receiving the pretender without conditions; and he neglected the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl Marschal, and other adherents of that house, who adopted the more moderate principle advanced by the Earl of Middleton. At his return to France, he made such a favourable report of the disposition and power of the Scottish nation, that Louis resolved to equip an armament, and send over the pretender to that kingdom. His presence was considered that prince on the throne of his ancestors: but his real aim was to make a diversion from the Netherlands, and excite a revolt in Great Britain, which should hinder Queen Anne from executing her own designs against France, and her own continent. Hence he began to make preparations for this expedition at Dunkirk, where a squadron was assembled under the command of the Chevalier de Furbon; and a body of land forces were embarked with Monsieur de Gace, afterwards known by the appellation of the Mariscal de Matignon. The pretender, who had assumed the name of the Chevalier de St. George, was furnished with services of gold and silver plate, sumptuous tents, rich clothes for his guards, splendid lances, and all sorts of necessary even to profusion. Louis at parting presented him with a sword studded with valuable diamonds, and repeated what he had formerly said to this adventurer's father: "He hoped he should never see him again (blasphemous traitor!) to the expense of this expedition, and accommodated him with divers religious inscriptions, which were wrought upon his colours and standards. Queen Anne being informed of these preparations, and the design of the French minister, she sent a mean present for advice to which she had received from Holland and the Netherlands, touching the destination of the Dunkirk armament: both houses concurred in an address, assuring her they would外壳 her majesty with their lives and fortunes against the pretended Prince of Wales, and all her other enemies. Then they passed a bill, enacting, That the oath of abjuration should be tendered to all persons, and such as refused to take it should be in the condition of convicted rebels. By this means, the halberd armed, was act October, with relation to persons apprehended by the government on suspicion of treasonable practices. The pretender and his adherents were proclaimed traitors and rebels; and a bill was passed, discharging the clans of Scotland from all vassalage to those chief who should take up arms against her majesty.

Transport were hired to bring over ten British battalions from Ostend; a large fleet being equipped with considerable diligence, sailed from Dunkirk, under the conduct of Sir John Leake, Sir George Bung, and Lord Dursley. The French imagined that Leake had sailed to Lisbon, and that Britain was unpowdered of war; so that they were amazed and frightened when this vessel, having made a stop, was immediately put to the embarkation of their troops: frequent express were dispatched to Paris: the Count de Furbon represented to the French king the utter ruin of the pretender, and the danger that would attend the attempt; but he received postive orders in embark the forces, and set sail with the first favourable wind.

§ XXII. The British fleet being forced from their station by severe weather on the fourteenth day of March, the French squadron sailed on the seventeenth from the road of Dunkirk; but the wind shifting, it anchored in Newport-Duiks till the nineteenth in the evening, when they set sail again with a fair breeze, the wind having detached a squadron, under Admiral Launay, to convey the troops under the command of Lord Newburgh. On the tenth day of March, the queen went to the House of Peers, where, in a speech to both houses, she told them that the French fleet had sailed; that Sir George Bung was in command; and that the troops were expected every day in England. This information was followed by various warm addresses from the Lords and Commons, in which they repeated their assurances to make her Majesty free from all her enemies. They exhorted her to persevere in supporting the common cause, notwithstanding this petty attempt to disturb her dominions; and levelled some severe insinuations against the Jesuits, whose designs were to establish in France the Pretender's majesty and her most faithful servants. Addresses on the same occasion were sent up from different parts of the kingdom; so that the queen seemed to look with contempt upon the designs of the enemy. Several regiments of foot, with some squadrons of cavalry, began their march for Scotland: the Earl of Leven, the commander in chief of the forces in that country, and governor of the castle of Edin- burgh, hastened thither to put that fortress in a posture of defence, and to invite the Pretender to his landing. But the vigilance of Sir George Bung rendered all these precautions unnecessary. He sailed directly to the firth of Edinburgh, where he arrived almost as soon as the enemy, who immediately took the advantage of a land breeze, and bore away with all the sail they could carry. The English admiral gave chase; and the Saumane, one of their ships, was boarded and taken. At night Monsieur de Furbon altered his course, so that next day they were out of reach of the English squadron. The pretender desired they would proceed to the northward, and land him at Inverness, and Furbon seemed willing to gratify his request: but the wind changing, and having unchained his adventurers, he began the dance of attempting to prosecute the voyage; and, with the consent of the Chevalier de St. George and his general, returned to Dunkirk, after having been tossed about a whole month in very tempestuous weather. In the meantime, the Pretender wrote to the queen, where he received the freedom of the city of Edinburgh in a golden box, as a testimony of gratitude for having delivered them from the dreadful apprehensions under which they laboured.}

§ XXIII. Certain it is, the pretender could not have chosen a more favourable opportunity for making a descent upon Scotland. The people in general were disaffected to the government on account of the union: the regular troops were composed of the four hundred thousand men, and even great part of these would in all probability have joined the invader: the castle of Edin- burgh was instituted of amniation, and would in all apperance have surrendered at the first summons; in which case the Jacobites must have been masters of the equiva lent money lodged in that fortress; n good number of Dutch ships loaded with cannon, small arms, ammuation, and a large sum of money, had been driven on shore in the shire of Angus, where they would have been taken by the fronds of the pretender, had the French troops been landed; and all the adherents of that house were ready to appear in arms. In England, such a demand was made upon the commons of England, where the Jacobites, who dreaded a revolution, that the public credit seemed to be in danger. The Commons resolved, that whoever designedly endeavoured to destroy or lessen the public credit, engagin the state, and those who had been enriched with an invasion, was guilty of a high crime and misdeemor, and an enemy to her majesty and the kingdom. The lord treasurer signified to the directors of the bank, that her majesty would allow for six months an interest of six per cent, upon their bills, which was double the usual rate; and considerable sums of money were offered to them by this noblemen, as well as by the Duke of Newcastle, for Scotland. The French Dutch, and Jewish merchants, whose interest was in a peculiar manner connected with the safety of the bank, exerted themselves for its support; and the directrs, having called in twenty per cent upon their capital, were enabled to answer all the demands of the timorous and disaffected. All the noblemen and persons of distinction in Scotland, suspected of an attachment to the Pretender, were either sent into gaol, or imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh, or brought up to London, to be confined in the Tower or in Newgate. Among these was the Duke of Hamilton, who found means to escape, and repaired to France, where, in a little time, the other prisoners were admitted to bail, and ship escape, and repaired to London, according about this time the appel-
On the first day of April, the parliament was prorogued, and afterwards dissolved by proclamation. Writs were issued for new elections, together with a proclamation, commanding all the peers of North Britain to assemble at Holyroodhouse, and the French advanced to Flanders to cross the Scheldt, and elect sixteen peers to represent them in the ensuing British parliament, pursuant to the twenty-second article of the treaty of union. After the dissolution of the parliament, the legislature of Scotland, continuing the same council of ministers,גו ויריב, and several Scottish and Irish officers, who had been taken on board the Salisbury, were brought to London, and imprisoned in the Tower, or in Newgate. Lord Grey, among them, was detained till the assassination committed in the reign of William, was brought to the bar of the court of king's bench, and a rule made for his execution; but he was remanded from month to month, until he died of a natural death in prison. The privy council of Scotland was dissolved; the Duke of Queensberry was created a British peer, by the title of Baron of Rippon, Marquis of Beverley, and Duke of Dover; and the office of secretary at war, vacated by the resignation of Henry Pelham, was made over to the Duke of Ancaster. A gentleman who had rendered himself considerable in the House of Commons, and whose conduct we shall have occasion to mention more at large in the sequel. About the middle of the month, the detachment towards the protection of the shipping, in certain proportions, to the different officers and seamen of the royal navy; a regulation that still prevails.

The French king, not at all discouraged by the enemy's successes, had determined to improve the advantages he had gained on the continent during the last campaign, and indeed he made efforts that were altogether incredible, considering the consummate state of his finances. He assembled a prodigious army in the Netherlands under the command of the Duke of Burgundy, assisted by Vendome, and accompanied by the Duke of Berry and the Chevalier de St. George. The Elector of Bavaria was destined to the command of the troops in the province of Brabant, and the Duke of Berwick; and the Mareschal de Villeroi was sent to conduct the forces in Dauphiné. About the latter end of March, the Duke of Marlborough repaired to the Hague, where he was met by Prince Eugene; those celebrated generals conferred with the Pensionary Heinsius, and the deputies of the States-general. Then they made an excursion to Hanover, where they prevailed upon the elector to be satisfied with acting upon the defensive in his present condition. The British and Hanoverian confederates were now pressed so hard that the confederates might be enabled to make vigorous efforts in the Netherlands. The prince proceeded to Vienna, and the duke immediately returned to Flanders, which was invested, and was invested with the May. On the twenty-fifth day of that month, the Duke de Vendome marched to Soignies, and posted himself within three leagues of the confederates, who were encamped at Billingen and Halie. The Duke of Marlborough having received intelligence that the enemy were on their march by Bois-Seigneur-Isaac to Braine-la-Luëve, concluded their intention was to take post on the banks of the Dyle, to hinder the allies from passing that river, and to occupy Louvaine. He, therefore, commanded the army to march all night, and on the third day of June encamped at Terhank, General D'Anquerque fixing his quarters in the suburbs of Louvaine, while the rest of the French general and Duke of Flanders moved to Leuze. As they were more numerous than the confederates, and headed by a prince of the blood, the generals of the allies at first expected that they would hazard a battle; but the command they were given was so exact that they had lost in Flanders. The Elector of Bavaria had rendered himself extremely popular in the great towns: the Count de Bergeyck, who had considerable interest in the Heights of Havre, and the inhabitants of the great cities were naturally constant and mutinous, and particularly dissatisfied with the Dutch government. The French generals resolved to profit by these circumstances. A detachment of their troops, under the Brugedyers La Faille and Pastene, surprised the city of Ghent, in which there was no garrison: at the same time the Count de la Motte, with a strong body of forces, appeared before Bruges, which was surrendered to him without resistance: this was made a fluster at Damme, and marched to the little fort of Plassendael, which he took by assault. The Duke of Marlborough was no sooner apprized of the enemy's having sent a strong body of men from Ypres to the assistance of the Dutch, than he sent a body of men from the bank, passed the canal, and encamped at Anderloch. The French crossed the Senne at Halte and Tubize, and the allies resolved to attack them next morning; but the prince of Orange was immediately informed that the French had made a surprising march from Asche, as far as Helsingen, where he was joined by the reinforcement. Then he took possession of the strong camp at Lessenuse, which the French had intended to occupy, in order to cover the siege of Oudenarde.

Thus disappointed, the French generals altered their resolution, abandoned Oudenarde, and began to pass the Scheldt towards the Caray. The two generals of the French forces assembled in a place called Cadogon were sent with seventeen battalions and eight squadrons to repair the roads, and throw bridges over the Scheldt below Oudenarde. The army was in motion at seven o'clock, and by ten o'clock the two in the afternoon the horse had reached the bridges over which Cadogon and his detachment were passing. The enemy had posted seven battalions in the village of Huyven, situated on the banks of the Scheldie, and the French household troops were drawn up in order of battle on the adjacent plain, opposite to a body of troops under Major-General Hantzw, who were posted behind a rivulet... that ran into the river. The Duke de Vendome intended to attack the Confederates when one half of their army should have passed the Schelde; but he was thwarted by the Duke of Burgundy, who seemed to be perplexed and irresolute. Thus prince had ordered the troops to halt in their march to Gavre, as if he had not yet formed any resolution; and now he recalled the squadrons from the plain, determined to avoid a battle. Vendome remonstrated against this conduct, and the dispute continued till three in the afternoon, when the greater part of the allied army had passed the Schelde without opposition.
Then the Duke of Burgundy declared for an engagement, and promised to lead the centre; the enemy was with great resistance, as the opportunity was now lost, and the army unformed. Major-General Girmaldi was ordered to attack Rantzau with the horse of the king's household, who, finding the river marshy, refused to charge, and retired to the right. Meanwhile Cadogan attacked the advance of Heynem, which he took with three of the seven battalions by which it was guarded. Rantzau, passing the rivulet, advanced into the plain, and drove before him several regiments of the enemy. In this attack the electoral Prince of Hanover, his late majesty George II. charged at the head of Balun's drag ons with great intrepidity.
His horse was shot under him, and Colonel Laschky killed.
The Duke of Argyile's French advanced, and a good number of officers and standards fell into the hands of the Hanoverians. The Confederates continued still passing the river; but few or none of the infantry accompanied them till five in the afternoon, when the Duke of Argyile arrived with twenty battalions, which immEDIATELY sustained a vigorous assault from the enemy.
By this time the French were drawn up in order of battle; and the enemy, who had fanned the river, detached both armies engaged through the whole extent of their lines about seven in the evening. Europe had not many years produced two such noble armies: above one hundred generals officered in the field, that two hundred and fifty colonels fought at the head of their respective regiments. The number of the French exceeded that of the allies by twelve thousand; but their generals were divided; their forces ill-disposed; and the men dispirited by the failure of their officers. They seemed from the beginning adverse to an engagement, and acted in hurry and trepidation. Nevertheless, the motion was maintained until General D'Arquespoque and Count Turenne had advanced, when the two emperors of the enemy began to give ground; and the Prince of Orange with Count Ostenheim attacked them in flank with the Dutch infantry. Then they began to give way, and retreat, but not without confusion. The French, slighting from his horse, rallied the broken battalions, called the officers by name, constrained them to maintain the honour of their country, and animate the men with his example. When, after engaging all his extradistri-vors, they were forced back among the enclosures in great confusion. Some regiments were cut in pieces; others deserted to capitulate; and if the darkness had not interposed, their whole army would have been ruined. The right coming on, so that it became impossible to distinguish friends from enemies, the two generals ordered the troops to cease firing, and the enemy took this opportunity of escaping by the road which leads from Oudenarde to Gavre. The Duke de Vendome seeing the retreat of the allied army, was entirely owning the troops to meet at day-break the Duke of Marlborough sent a large detachment of horse and foot, under the Lieutenant-Generals Balun and Lumley, to pursue the fugitives: but the French made the most of their retreat, and galloped through the French grenadiers in such a manner, that the cavalry could not form, and they were obliged to disperse. The French reached Ghent about eight in the morning, and marched in the field, with the appearance of having halted for the purpose of assenting to engagement. There tied the French expected to cast up entrenchments, upon which they planted their artillery, which they had left at Gavre with their heavy baggage. About three thousand were slain on the field of battle; two thousand deserted; and about seven thousand were taken, including a great number of officers, together with ten pieces of canon, above a hundred standards and colours, and four thousand horses. The loss of the allies did not amount to two thousand men; nor was one officer of distinction killed on their side during the whole engagement. After the conference, the Duke of Burgundy detached the French troops to cross the river; a detachment was ordered to level the French lines between Ypres and the Lys; another was sent to raise contributions as far as Arras: they ravaged the country, and struck terror even in the head of the enemy. While the allies plundered the province of Picardy, a detachment from the French army, under the Chevalier de Rozen, made an irruption into Dutch Flanders, broke through the lines of Berrikit, which had been left unguarded, and made a descent upon the island of Cadsandt, which they had left under command § XXXVI. The generals of the allies now undertook an enterprise, which, in the opinion of the French generals, was arduous and inconsiderate self-sufficiency. This was the siege of Lille, the strongest town in Flanders, provided with all necessaries, store of ammunition, and a garrison reinforced with one-and-twenty battalions of the best troops in France, commanded by Mareschal de Boufflers. When the French were engaged in the difficulties which the allies encountered.

quespoque and the Duke of Argyile distinguished themselves by the most forty pounds upon the crupper. They were discovered in passing through the camp of the allies, and pursued to the banner of the town into which about three hundred were admitted. M. de Mareschal, in the citadel, or miserably destroyed by the explosion of the powder which they earned.

§ XXXVII. The next attempt of the French generals was to intercept a convoy from Ostend. Count de la Motte marched from Ghent, with about two-and-twenty thousand men, to attack this convoy, which was guarded by six thousand of the allied army, commanded by Mayor-General Webb. This officer made such an admirable dispositions by land and sea, that, after a great and long action, they did not prevent the convoy from reaching Antwerp, where they invested the city of Ghent on all sides; and on the thirtieth, when the batteries were ready to open, the Count de la Motte, who commanded the garrison, desired to capitulate. On the third day of the next month it was marched out with thirty battalions and sixteen squadrons, which were conducted to Tribeur; while the Duke of Ancyre, with six British battalions, took possession of the town and citadel. Then the enemy abandoned Bruges, Plassendahl, and Leffingen; and the generals of the allies, having settled the plan of winter-quarters, repaired to Holland, leaving the forces under the command of Count Tilly. The French king was confounded, and dismayed at these disasters, which, in that year, were far from the side of Dauphiné: in spite of all the vigilance and activity of Villars, the Duke of Savoy made himself master of the important fortress of Esplugue, La Péruse, the valley of Martin, and all the land of Dauphiné. On the campaign he had secured a barrier to his own frontiers; and opened a way into the French provinces; after having made a diversion in favour of King Charles, by obliging the enemy to send a strong detachment from Roussillon to the assistance of Villars.

§ XXXIX. The campaign in Catalonia was productive of a great event. Count Guido de Staremberg arrived at Dover. Prince Eugene had received the troops brought from Italy by Admiral Leake did not land in time to relieve Torton, which the Duke of Orleans besieged and took, together with Dema, the garrison of which were made prisoners of war, contrary to the articles of capitulation. These losses, however, were abundantly made up to the allies by the conquest of Sardinia and Minorca. Sir John Leake having taken on board a hundred of troops, under the conduct of the Marquis D'Alconzel, set sail for Cagliari, and summoned the viceroy to submit to King Charles. As he did not send an immediate answer, the admiral began to bombard the city, and the inhabitants compelled him to surrender at discretion. The greater part of the confederates, however, marched away with incredible fury; but was repulsed by the garrison, under the command of General Paschal, and retired with precipitation, when he understood that the Duke of Marlborough was in motion to relieve the place. This nobleman and Prince Eugene no sooner understood the danger to which Brussels was exposed, than they marched with the covering army to the Schelde, which they passed on portions without opposition, notwithstanding the formidable works which the French had raised. They now abandoned them with precipitation, to the surprise of the confederates, who had had their account with the loss of a thousand men in the attack. Having been driven between Eeknalle and Hastenburg, as well as at other places, they marched to Oudenarde, where they received intelligence that the elector had retreated. Then Prince Eugene returned to Lisle, and the Elector sent a personal letter to him. But the prince was received with joy and acclamation. He afterwards took post at Oudenarde, so as to maintain a communication with Prince Eugene.

dier Wade, at the head of the grenadiers, stormed a retrenchment with such extraordinary valour as struck the besieged with consternation. On the second day they thought proper to beat a parley, and capitulate, on condition, that they should march out with the honours of war: that the Spaniards should be transported to Minorca, and that they should be permitted to take with them all their baggage and provender; and that the commander of the bishopric of Cadiz, with all his troops, should be allowed to go into the town of Cadiz. The Spaniards were so mortified when he learned the real number of the besiegers, that on his arrival at Moraca, he threw himself into the river and was killed in the act. In consequence of the loss, the whole French army was posted in protection to the spot. La Jonquière was confined for life, and all the French officers incurred their master's displeasure. For St. Philip being thus reduced, to the annoyance of all Philistines, and the garrison of Port-Foulques having surrendered the keys of the prison to the Admirals Leake and Whitaker, the inhabitants gladly submitted to the English government, for King Philip had oppressed and deprived them of their privileges; General Stanhope appointed Colonel Petet governor of Fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole island. After this important conquest he returned to the army in Spain, where an unsuccessful attempt to surprise Tortosa harassed the operations of the campaign.

§ XL. The British fleet not only contributed to the reduction of Minorca, but likewise overset the Pope, who had endeavoured to form a league of the princes in Italy against the emperor. On this point had manifested his design. On the 13th of January, in such a palmar manner, that his imperial majesty ordered Monsieur de Bonneval to march with the troops that were in Italy, reinforced by those belonging to the Duke of Modena, and invade the duchy of Ferrara. He accordingly took possession of Comacchio and some other places, pretending they were allodial estates belonging to the Duke of Modena, and facts of the emperor, to which the holy see had no lawful ground. The Vicerey of Naples was forbidden to remit any money to Rome; and the council of the kingdom drew up a long memorial, containing the pretensions of his catholic majesty, which struck at the very foundation of the Pope's temporal power. His holiness wrote a long remonstrance to the emperor, on the injustice of these proceedings, and declared that he would assert his cause though he should lose his life in the contest. He forthwith began to raise an army, and revived a plan of forming a league among the princes and states of Italy for their mutual defence. Sir John Leake had received orders to bomband Civita-Vecchia, in resentment for the Pope's having countenanced the pretender's expedition to Great Britain; and the emperor and Duke of Savoy hoped to effect an accommodation with the court of Rome, they prevailed upon the English admiral to suspend hostilities until they should have tried the method of negotiation. The Marquis de Pryan, a Protestant nobleman, was sent as ambassador to Rome, but the Pope would not receive him in that quality. Elated with the promises of France, he set the emperor at defiance; and his troops having surprised a body of imperialists, were so barbarous as to cut them all in pieces. The Duke of Savoy having ended the campaign, the troops of the emperor, which had served under that prince, were ordered to march into the papal territories, and drove the forces of his holiness before them, without any regard to number. Bologna capitulated; but Rome began to tremble with the apprehension of being once more sacked by a German army. Then the Pope's courage failed; he was glad to admit the Marquis de Prie as envoy from the emperor. He consented to disband his new levies; to accommodate the imperial troops with winter-quarters in the papal territories; to grant the investiture of Naples to King Charles; and to allow at all times a passage to the imperial troops through his dominions. On the Upper Rhine the Elector of Bavaria and Hanover were so weak, that they could not undertake any thing of consequence against each other. In Hungary the disputes still continued between the emperor and the magnates of Poland; but the marquis had nothing to fear, as the oppression exercised by the King of Sweden, who marched into the Ukraine against the Czar of Muscovy, notwithstanding the submission with which that monarch endeavoured to appease his indignation. During the course of this year the English merchants sustained no considerable losses by the cruisers of the French, and the trade was regularly supplied with convoy.

In the West Indies Commodore Wager destroyed the admiral of the galleons, and took the rear-admiral on the coast of Carthagena. Had the officers of his squadron done their duty, they would have destroyed the French vessel. However, were deprived of the honours of the capture by way of reprisal for the garrison of Deuna. The Spanish governor was so mortified when he learned the real number of the besiegers, that on his arrival at Moraca, he threw himself into the river and was killed in the act. In consequence of the loss, the whole French army was posted in protection to the spot. La Jonquière was confined for life, and all the French officers incurred their master's displeasure. The bank agreed to circulate two millions five hundred thousand pounds in exchequer bills for the government, on condition that the new subsidy, which was voted the second and twenty years; and that their stock of two millions one hundred and thousand pounds should be doubled by a new subscription. The two-thirds subsidy was appropriated for the interest of the new subscription.

§ X.III. Great debates having arisen about Scottish elections, the House considered the petitions and representations that were delivered, touching the incapacity of the election commissioners for the election of members to the parliament of Great Britain. Counsel being heard upon the subject, that incapacity was confirmed, and new writs were issued, that new members might be elected for the shires of Aberdeen and Linlithgow, in the room of William Lord Haddo, and James Lord Johnston. Petitions were likewise presented to the House of Lords by some Scottish peers, concerning their right of voting, and signing proxies. After warm debates, the House, upon a division, determined that a Scottish Lord, created a peer of Great Britain, should no longer retain his vote in Scotland; and that the noblemen who were in the castle of Edinburgh had a right to sign proxies, after having taken the oaths to the constitution. Ministers that sat in the British parliament were divided into two factions. The Duke of Queensberry was in great credit with the queen and the lord treasurer, by whose interest his influence in elections was so great, that all offices in that kingdom were bestowed according to his recommendation. He was opposed by the Dukes of Hamilton, Montrose, and Roxburgh, who were supported by the Earl of Sutherland and Lord Somers: so that the whole interest in that country was engrossed by one or other member of the ministry. A bill for a general naturalization of all protestants was brought into the House, and notwithstanding various small substructions to the bill, the House of Commons, was enacted into a law. The wigs argued for this bill, as a measure that would encourage industry, improve trade and manufacture, and repair the waste of men which the war had occasioned: but one of their chief motives was to throw an addition of foreigners into the balance against the landed interest. The Tories pleaded that a conflux of aliens might prove dangerous to the constitution; that they would retain a fondness for their native country; that they were the best of men; and, that they would insinuate themselves into places of trust and profit; become members of parliament; and by frequent intermarriages contribute to the extinction of the House of Commons. The House of Lords ordered the Duke of Marlborough to write expostulatory letters to Mr. Secretary Boyle, who at last owned, that the laws of the kingdom did not admit of such punishment as he demanded. An information was used in the court of king's bench against the majesty of Thomas Morton, haunch, and thirteen other persons concerned in the insult of which they were found guilty; and the special matter of the privileges of ambassadors was to be argued next term before the judges. Meanwhile, the queen, by way of satisfaction to the court, concurred to make solemn excuses by her ambassador to repair the majesty's honour by a letter, and immediately him for all his costs and damages: concessions with which the state and his ambassador were well satisfied. The convocation had been summoned, chosen, and returned with the new parliament: but as the old spirit was supposed to prevail in the lower house, the queen, went to the archbishop, ordered him to proceed from time to time, until the session of parliament was finished.

§ I. The French king was by this time reduced to such a state of humiliation by the losses of the last campaign, and a severe winter, which completed the misery of his subjects, that he resolved to make some concessions and a truce, as well as the interest of his grandson, to his desire of peace, which was now become so necessary and indispensable. He despatched the president Rouillé privately to Holland, with an offer of a general and absolute cession of all his possessions to the States-general, still entertaining hopes of being able to detach them from the confederacy. This minister conferred in secret with Buys and Vanderduussen, the Ulster commissioners, at Amsterdam, and from whence he was permitted to proceed to Woerden, between Leyden and Utrecht. The States immediately communicated his proposals to the courts of Vienna and Great Britain. Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, before the arrival of the Dutch ambassador, conferred with the grand pensionsman Heinens, Buys, and Vanderduussen, on the subject of the French proposals, which were deemed unsatisfactory. Rouillé immediately despatched a courier to Paris, for further instructions; and the Duke of Marlborough returned to England, to make the queen acquainted with the progress of the negociation. Louis, in order to convince the States of his sincerity, sent the Marquis de Törey, his secretary for foreign affairs, to the Hague, with fresh offers, by which the deputies were made no greater until they knew the sentiments of the Queen of Great Britain. The Duke of Marlborough crossed the seas a second time, accompanied by the Lord Viscount Townshend, before the arrival of the Dutch ambassador. The minister declared that his master would consent to the demolition of Dunkirk, to the satisfaction of the demands of the conqueror, and dismissed him from his dominions: that he would acknowledge the queen's title and the protestant succession: that he would renounce all pretensions to the Spanish monarchy, and cede the places in the Netherlands which the States-general demanded for their barrier; that he would treat with the emperor on the footing of the treaty concluded at Ryswick, and even demolish the fortifications at Strasburg. The ministers of the allies, rendered proud and wanton by success, and to whom the deputies gave the conduct of the concluding articles of the war, insisted upon the restitution of the Upper and Lower Alsace to the empire; upon the French monarch's restoring Strasburg in its present condition; upon his demanid to the last degree of distress, and from the first conferences with the deputies, he could not believe that the Dutch would be so blind to their own interest, as to reject the advantages in commerce, and the barrier which he had offered. He could not conceive that they would choose to bear the burden of excessive taxes in prosecuting the war, the expenses of which would be always he who undertook to be more courtly rather than enjoy the blessings of peace, security, and advantageous commerce: he flattered himself, that the allies would not so far deviate from their purposed aim of establishing a barrier against the French, as to deviate weight into the scale of the house of Austria, which shrowded all the dangerous ambition and arbitrary power without the liberty of sentiment peculiar to the House of Bourbon. In proportion as they rose in their demands, he found the Dutch, on the contrary, more ready to yield. The Marquis de Törey, posted in disguise to Holland, on the faith of a common blank passport. He soothed, he supplicated, and made concessions in the name of his sovereign. He found the States were wholly guided by the influence of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. He found these generals elated, haughty, overbearing, and implacable. He in private attacked the Duke of Marlborough on his weakest side; he informed the nobleman a large sum of money, provided he would effect a peace on certain conditions. The proposal was rejected. The duke found his enemies in England increasing, and his credit at court in the wane; and he knew that nothing short of a decisive battle without a possibility of support his influence in Holland. Törey was sensible that his country was utterly exhausted; that Louis dreaded nothing so much as the opening of the campaign; and he could not consent to any one of the preliminaries. The French king was confounded at these proposals: he felt the complicated pangs of grief, shame, and indignation. He rejected the preliminaries with disdain. He even desired to submit his conduct to the judgment of his subjects. His offers were published, together with the demands of the allies. His people interested themselves in the glory of their monarch. They exclaimed against the cruelty and arrogance of his enemies. Though the French monarch's impoverishment was so great, and his credit so subsisted, and confined with the grand pensionsman Heinens, Buys, and Vanderduussen, on the subject of the French proposals, which were deemed unsatisfactory. He even desired to submit his conduct to the judgment of his subjects. His offers were published, together with the demands of the allies. His people interested themselves in the glory of their monarch. They exclaimed against the cruelty and arrogance of his enemies. Though the French monarch's impoverishment was so great, and his credit so a practicable breach, and made the necessary dispositions for a general assault, the enemy offered to capitulate; the town was surrendered upon conditions, and the garrison retired to the瓜d Marly, when a council of war decided upon carrying the place by a treaty about giving up the citadel: the articles being sent to the court of Versailles, Louis would not ratify them, except upon condition that there should be a general cessation in the Netherlands till the fifteenth of September. Hostilities were renewed on the eighth day of August, and prosecuted with uncommon ardour and anxiety. On the thirtieth, Surville desired to capitulate on certain articles, which were rejected by the Duke of Marlborough, who informed the English commanders that he had no terms to expect, but must surrender at discretion. At length his provision being quite exhausted, he was obliged to surrender himself and his garrison prisoners of war, though they were permitted to return to France, on giving their parole that they would not act in the field until a like number of the allies should be released.

§ III. The next object that attracted the eyes of the confederates was the city of Mons, which they resolved to besiege with all possible expedition. They passed the Scheldt on the third day of September, and detached the Prince of Hesse to attack the French lines from the Haines to Bleron, which were abandoned at his approach. On the thirteenth, Major-General Marly de Batz, with two hundred and twenty thousand of his best troops were killed in the engagement; whereas the enemy did not lose half that number, and retired at leisure, perfectly recovered of that apprehension with which they had been some years inspired and overawed by the successes of their adversaries. On the side of the allies, Count Lottin, General Tettau, Count Oxenstern, and the Marquis of Tullibar, were killed, with many other officers of distinction. Prince Eugene was slightly wounded on the head: a lieutenant-General Welch received a shot in the groin. The Duke of Argyile, who distinguished himself by extraordinary feats of valor, escaped unhurt; but several musket-balls penetrated through his clothes, his hat, and periwig. In the French army the Chevalier de St. George charged twelve times with the household troops, and in the last was wounded with a sword in the arm. The Mareschal de Villars confidently asserted, that if he himself had not been disabled, the confederates would certainly have been defeated.

§ IV. Considering the situation of the French, the number of their troops, and the manner in which they were fortified, nothing could be more decisive than the attack, which cost the lives of so many gallant men, and was attended with so little advantage to the conquerors. Perhaps the Duke of Marlborough thought a victory was absolutely necessary to the glory of his army and the interest of the great court of Great Britain. His intention was to have given battle before the enemy had entrenched themselves; but Prince Eugene insisted upon delaying the action until the reinforcement should arrive from Tournay. The extraordinary carnage is imputed to the immobility of the Prince of Orange, whose arm through this whole war was to raise himself into consideration with the States-general, by signal acts of military prowess. The French having retired to Vle, the Dutch to Blerom, and the left on the edge of the woods of Lagmers; the head-quarters being at Blargines. The enemy, instead of attacking the allies, began to fortify their camp, which was naturally strong, with triple entrenchments. In a word, they were so covered with lines, hedges, entrenchments, cannon, and trees laid across, that they seemed to be quite inaccessible. Had the confederates attacked them on the ninth, the battle would not have been so bloody, and the victory would not have proved so decisive, for they had not then begun to secure the camp; but Marlborough postponed the engagement until they should be reinforced by eighteen battalions which had been employed in an engagement with the enemy, and the French fortified themselves with incredible diligence and despatch. On the eleventh day of September, early in the morning, the confederates, favored by a thick fog, erected batteries on each wing, and in the centre: and about eight o'clock, the weather clearing up, the attack began. Eighty-six battalions on the right, commanded by General Schuylerdeburg, the Duke of Argyile, and other generals, and supported by two and twenty battalions under Count Lottin, attacked the left of the enemy with such vigour, that notwithstanding their lines and barricades, they were in less than an hour driven from their entrenchments into the woods of Sirt and Tanniers. The Princes, to prevent their soldiers from being exposed to Dutch battalions, advanced against the right of the enemy, posted in the wood of Lamer, and covered with three entrenchments. Here the battle was maintained with the most desperate courage on both sides. The Dutch obliged the French to quit the first entrenchment; but were repulsed from the second with great slaughter. The Prince of Orange persisted in his efforts with incredible perseverance and intrepidity, even after two horses had been killed under him, and for the accomplishment of his designs, in the face of the enemy. The French fought with an obstinacy of courage that bordered on despair, till seeing their lines forced, their left wing and centre giving way, and their general superiority was downcast, their officers exhorted them to remain unvanquished. The French fought with an obstinacy of courage that bordered on despair, till seeing their lines forced, their left wing and centre giving way, and their general superiority was downcast, their officers exhorted them to remain unvanquished, and, towards Bayau, they couched for a retreat, and headed to Quesnoy and Valencienches.
them he could not bear the thoughts of seeing so many brave men perish in the ruins of a place they had so gallantly defended: and allowed them four-and-twenty hours to consider a more resolute stand they should take. Hythurg continued deaf to his remonstrances; and, with an obstinacy that savoured more of stupidity than of valour, determined to stand the explosion. When the sentinels that were placed on the side of the town were noticed, by a preconcerted signal, that fire was set to the mine, the governor ordered the guard to retire, and walked out to the parade accompanied by several officers. The mine being sprung, the runs of their fort, and they falling into the chasms, it instantly closed, and crumpled them to pieces. Notwithstanding this dreadful incident, Colonel d'Alblon, who succeeded to the command, resolved to defend the place to the last extremity. Sir Edward Whistler sailed from Barcelona to the relief of the place; but the enemy had erected such works as effectually hindered the troops from landing. Then General Stanhope, who commanded them, capitulated with the Spanish general for the garrison, which marched out with all the honours of war, and was transported to Minorca, where the men were put into quarters of refreshment. On the frontiers of Catalonia, General Staremburg maintained his ground, and even annoyied the enemy. He placed Bishop Seguier at Puliowa; Balagué: having left a strong garrison in the place, he repassed the river, and sent his forces into winter-quarters.

The most remarkable event of this summer was the battle of Poldova, in which the King of Sweden was entirely defeated. That war of Minorca was ended by a capitulation of the fugue at Bender, a town of Moldavia, in the Turkish dominions. Augustus immediately marched into Poland against Stanislaus, and renounced his own resignation, as if to give the effect of compulsion. He formed a project with the Kings of Denmark and Prussia, to attack the Swedish territories in three different places: but the emperor and maritime powers prevented the execution of this scheme, by entering into a guarantee for preserving the peace of the empire. Nevertheless, the King of Denmark declared war against Sweden, and transported an army over the Sound to Schonen; but they were attacked and defeated by the Swedes, and obliged to re-embark with the utmost precipitation. The war still continued to rage in Hungary, where, however, the revolters were routed in many petty engagements.

§ VI. Though the events of the summer had been less unfavourable to France than Louis had reason to expect, he saw that peace was as necessary as ever to his kingdom; but he thought he might now treat with some freedom and dignity. His minister, Torey, maintained a correspondence with the Duke of Holstein at the Hague: he proposed to this minister, that the negociation should be renewed; and demanded passes by virtue of which the French plenipotentiaries might remain in the Netherlands. In the mean time, the French king withdrew his troops from Spain, on purpose of demonstrating his readiness to oblige the allies in that particular: though this measure was the effect of necessity, which obliged him to recall those troops for the defence of his own dominions. The States-general refused to grant passes to the French ministers; but they allowed Petkum to make a journey to Versailles. In the interim King Philip published a manifesto, protesting against all that should be transacted at the Hague to prejudice his pretensions. Far from yielding Spain and the Indies to his competitor, he declared his intention of driving Charles from those places that were now in his possession. He named the Duke of Alba and Count Burgos, for his plenipotentiaries, and ordered them to notify their credentials to the maritime powers: but no regard was paid to their intimation. Philip tampered likewise with the Duke of Holstein and the Marquis de Torey renewed his attempts upon that general; but all his applications and address proved ineffectual. Petkum brought back from Versailles a kind of memorial, importing, that those motives which influenced the French before the campaign was opened, were no longer such; and that the winter had naturally produced a cessation of arms, during which he would treat of a general and reasonable peace, without restricting himself to the form of the preliminaries which the allies had pretended to impose: that, nevertheless, he would still treat on the foundation of those conditions to which he had consented, and send plenipotentiaries to obtain the renunciation of all the terms that had been agreed upon. They came to a resolution, that it was absolutely necessary to prosecute the war with vigour; and they wrote pressing letters on the subject to all their allies.

§ VII. The parliament of Great Britain being assembled on the fifteenth day of November, the queen in her speech told both Houses, That the enemy had endeavoured, by false appearances and deceitful insinuations of a desire after peace, to create jealousies among the allies: that God Almighty had been pleased to bless the arms of the confederates with a most remarkable victory, and other successes, which had laid France open to the impression of the allied arms, and consequently rendered peace more necessary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign. She insisted upon the expediency of prosecuting the advantages she had gained, by reducing that exorbitant and oppressive power which had so long threatened all Europe, and the liberties of all mankind; deluding them as eager and compliant as ever. They presented cogent andvarious addresses: they thanked the Duke of Marlborough for his signal services; while great part of the nation reproached him with having wantonly sacrificed so many thousands of men to the effusion of their blood, and to the extortion. In less than a month, the Commons granted upwards of six millions for the service of the ensuing year; and established a lottery, with other funds, to answer this enormous expense. On the thirteenth day of December, Mr. Doblen, son to the late Archbishop of York, complained to the House of two sermons preached and published by Dr. Henry Sacheverel, rector of St. Saviour's in Southwark, as containing propositions contrary to the religious principles, to the present government, and the protestant succession. Sacheverel was a clergyman of narrow intellects, and an over-heated imagination. He had acquired some popularity among those who distinguished themselves by the name of high-churchmen; and took all occasions to vent his animosity against the dissenters. At the summer assizes at Derby, he had held forth in that strain before the judges; on the fifth day of November, in St. Paul's church, he, in a violent declaration, defended the doctrine of non-resistance; inveighed against the toleration and dissenters; declared the church was dangerously attacked by her enemies, and slightly defended by her friends. Out of the durability of the nation, he exhorted the people to put on the whole armour of God. Sir Samuel Garrad, the lord mayor, countenanced this farage, which was published under his protection, exiled by the torres, and circulated all over the nation. The complaint of Mr. Doblen against Sacheverel was seconded in the House of Commons by Sir Peter King, and other members. The most violent paragraphs were read: the sermons were voted scandalous and venomous libel. Sacheverel, being brought to the bar of the House, acknowledged himself the author of both, and mentioned the encouragement he had received from the lord mayor to print what that was entitled, "The Perils of False Brethren, to Sir Samuel, who was a party to his proceedings: which he had ever given him such encouragement. The Doctor being ordered to withdraw, the House resolved he should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors; and Mr. Doblen was ordered to impeach the Duke of the House of Lords, in the name of all the Commons of England. A committee was appointed to draw up articles, and Sacheverel was taken into custody. At the same time, in order to demonstrate their own principles, they resolved on the suspension and deprivation of the rector of St. Peter-le-Po, for having often justified the principles on which her majesty and the nation proceeded in the late happy revolution, had justly merited the favour of the law, and refused to conform with the director. It was their address to the queen, beseeching her to bestow some dignity in the church on Mr. Hoadly, for his eminent services both to the church and state. The queen returned a civil answer, though she paid no regard to their recommendation. Blandly was a clergyman of sound understanding, unblemished character, and uncommon moderation, who, in a sermon preached before the Lord Mayor of London, had dwelt upon the sinfulness of trampling upon the holy foot and forsook not the protest of the true and cruel governors; and vindicated the late revolution. By pronouncing such doctrines, he incurred the resentment of the high-churchmen, who accused him of having preached up rebellion. Many books were written against the maxims he professed. These he answered; and in the course of the controversy, acquitted himself with superior temper, judgment, and solidity of argument. He, as well as Bishop Warburton, was afterwards treated with great violence in Sacheverel’s sermon; and the lord treasurer was scurrilously abused under the name of Volpone.

§ VII. The doctor being impeached at the bar of the upper House, petitioned that he might be admitted to bail; but this indulgence was refused, and the Commons seemed bent upon prosecuting him with such severity as gave disgust to men of moderate principles. Meanwhile the topic was not idle. They boldly affirmed that the whigs had formed a design to pull down the church; and that this prosecution was intended to try their strength, before they would proceed openly to the execution of their designs. They were answered, that they were even more excited, by great part of the clergy, who did not fail to alarm and inflame their hearers; while emissaries were employed to raise a ferment among the populace, already prepared with discontent arising from a scarcity which prevailed and troubled him as the minister of the church. The ministry magnified the dangers to which the church was exposed, from dissenters, whigs, and lukewarm prelates. These they represented as the authors of a rumous war which, in a little while, would produce universal famines, and as the immediate encouragers of those Palatine refugees who had been brought over, to the number of six thousand, and maintained by voluntary contributions until they could be conveniently transported into Ireland, and the plantations in America. The charity between whom these unhappy strangers exasperated the poor of England, who felt severely the effects of the dearth, and helped to fill up the measure of popular discontent. The articles against Dr. Sacheverel being exhibited, his person was committed to the deputy-usher of the black rod; but, afterwards, the Lords admitted him to bail. Then he drew up an answer to the charge, in which he denied some articles, and admitted others to justify to exact punishment. The Commons having sent up a replication, declaring they were ready to prove the charge, the Lords appointed the twenty-seventh day of February for the trial, in Westminster-hall.

§ IX. The eyes of the whole kingdom were turned upon this extraordinary trial. It lasted three weeks, during which all other business was suspended; and the queen herself was every day present, though in quality of a private spectator. The managers for the Commons were Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr. Eyre, solicitor-general, Sir Peter King, recorder of the city of London, Lieutenant-General Stanhope, Sir Thomas Parker, and Mr. Robert Walpole, treasurer of the navy. The doctor was defended by Sir Simon Harcourt and Mr. Pepys, and assisted by Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Smallbridge, and Dr. Friend. A vast multitude attended him every day to and from Westminster-hall, striving to kiss his hand, and praying for his deliverance, as if he had been a martyr and confessor. The queen’s sedan was beset by the populace, exclaiming, “God bless your majesty and the church. We hope your majesty is for Dr. Sacheverel.” They compelled all persons to lift their hats to the doctor, as he passed in his coach to the temple, where he lodged; and among these some members of parliament, who were abused and insulted. They destroyed several meeting-houses; plundered several dwellings of non-conformists; and threatened to pull down those of the lord chancellor, the Earl of Wharton, and the Bishop of Surum. They even propounded to attack the bank; so that the directors were obliged to send to Whitehall for assistance. The horse and foot of the city were ordered to be dispersed, in order to prevent the insurrection which seemed on the eve of taking place.

Sixteen of the officers who died in the battle were doubled at Whitehall, and the train-bands of Westminster continued in arms during the whole trial. The Commons treated the queen, in an address, to take effectual measures for suppressing the present tumults, set on foot and encouraged by all those enemies to her title and government. She expressed a deep sense of their care and concern, as well as of a just resentment at these tumultuous and violent proceedings. She published a proclamation for suppressing the tumults; and several persons being apprehended, were afterwards tried for high treason. Two of them were convicted, and sentenced to die; but neither suffered. The Commons presented another address to the queen, in a gracious answer to their first remonstrance. They took this occasion to declare that the prosecution of the Commons against Dr. Henry Sacheverel proceeded only from the indispensable obligation they lay under to vindicate the late happy revolution, the glory of their royal deliverer, her own title and administration, the present established and protestant succession, together with the toleration and the quiet of the government. When the doctors counsel had finished his defence, he himself recited a speech, wherein he solemnly justified his intentions towards the queen and her government; and spoke in the most respectful terms of the revolution, and the protestant succession. The doctors maintained that non-resistant persons were not in whatsoever, as a maxim of the church in which he was educated; and by many pathetical expressions endeavoured to excite the compassion of the audience. He was surrounded by the queen’s chaplains, who encouraged and assisted him in all the conduct of his defence. He was privately favoured by the queen herself, who could not but relish a doctrine so well calculated for the support of regal authority.

§ X. On the tenth day of March, the Lords being adjourned to their own House, the Earl of Nottingham proposed the following question, “Whether, in prosecutions by impeachments for high crimes and misdemeanors, by writing or speaking, the particular words supposed to be criminal, are necessary to be expressly specified in such impeachments?” The judges being consulted, were unanimously of opinion, that, according to law, the grounds of an indictment or impeachment ought to be expressly mentioned in both. One of the lords having suggested, that the judges had, delivered their opinions according to the rules of Westminster-hall, and not according to the usage of parliament, the House resolved, that in any impeachments they should proceed according to the laws of the land, and the law and usage of parliament. On the sixteenth day of the month, the queen being in the House incognito, they proceeded to consider whether or not the Commons had made good the articles exhibited against Dr. Sacheverel. The Earl of Wharton said, that the doctor’s speech was a full confutation and condemnation of his sermon; that all he had advanced about non-resistance and unlimited obedience was false and ridiculous; that the doctrine of passive obedience, as urged by the doctor, was not reconcilable to the practice of churchmen: that if the revolution was not lawful, many in that House, and vast numbers without, were guilty of blood, murder, rape, and injustice; and that the queen herself was no lawful sovereign, since the best title she had to the crown, was her parliamentary title, founded upon the re-

In the next chapter the Commons came to a resolution, and the trial was determined. The Earl of Scarborough observed, that the revolution was a nice point, and above the law: he moved that they should adjourn the debate, and take time to consider before they gave judgment. Dr. Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells, allowed the necessity and legality of resistance in some extraordinary cases; but was of opinion that this maxim ought to be concealed from the knowledge of the people, who ought to be taught to resist; that this resolution was to be boasted of or made a precedent; but that a mantle ought to be thrown over it, and it should be called a vacancy or abdication. He said the original compact were dangerous words, not to be mentioned, and desired the court to reserve the question examined the revolution too muchly were no friends to it; and that there seemed to be a necessity for preaching up non-resistance and passive obedience at that time, when resistance was justified. The Duke of Argyle affirmed, that the clergy in all ages had delivered up the rights and privileges of the people, promiscuously, in order to govern him the more easily; and therefore they ought not to be suffered to meddle with politics. The Earl of Anglesey owned the doctor had preached nonsense; but he was now come. The Duke of Leeds durst not distinguish between resistance and revolution; for had not the last succeeded, it would have certainly been rebellion, since he knew of no other but hereditary right. The Bishop of Salisbury justified resistance from the Book of Macros; which stated that the prelate then desired that Earl Sacheverel, who assisted the Scots, the French, and the States-General, in resisting their different sovereigns, and was supported in this practice both by her parliament and his convocations. He observed that King Charles I. had assisted the citizens of Rochelle in their rebellion; that Mainwaring incurred a severe censure from the parliament for having preached the doctrine of the divine right of kings; and that though this became a favourite maxim after the restoration, yet its warmest asserters were the first who pleaded for resistance when they thought themselves oppressed. The Archbishop of York, the Duke of Bucking, and other leaders of the protestant interest declared, that they never read such a piece of madness and nonsense as Sacheverel's sermon; but they did not think him guilty of a misdemeanor. Next day, Dr. Wake, Bishop of Lincoln, accused Sacheverel of having made a strange and fallacious exhibition of the doctrine of the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, which had been set on foot by Archbishop Sancroft, and promoted by the most eminent divines of the church of England. He was of opinion that some step should be taken for putting a stop to such preaching; as, if not timely corrected, might kindle heats and animosities that would endanger both church and state. Dr. Trammell, Bishop of Norwich, expatiated on the insolence of Sacheverel, who had presumed to publish the most high mysteries, in the presence of the eminent churchmen, as a pernicious prelate, for having favoured and tolerated the discipline of Geneva. He enlarged upon the good effects of the toleration. He took notice of Sacheverel's preposition in publishing inflammatory prayers, declaring himself under persecution, while he was prosecuted for offending against the law, by those who in common justice ought to be thought the fairest accusers, and before their lordships, who were justly acknowledged to be the most impartial judges. In discussing the former article, the Bishop of Salisbury spoke with great vehemence against Sacheverel, who, by investigating against the revolution, toleration, and union, seemed to arrogate and attack the dignity of the state, and incite her majesty to such a name in the first; had often declared she would maintain the second; and that she looked upon the third as the most glorious event of her reign. He affirmed that nothing could be more plain than the doctor'sickening upon her majesty's ministers; and that he had so well marked out a noble peer there present, by an ugly and scurrilous epithet which he would not repeat, that it was not possible to mistake his meaning. Some of the younger peers could not help laughing at this undeneuned sarcasm upon the lord treasurers, whom Sacheverel had reviled under the name of Volpone: they exclaimed, "Name him, name him;" and in all probability, the zealous bishop, who was remarkable for abrupt and other expressions, would have gratified their request, had not the chamber, interpolating, declared that no peer was obliged to say more than he should think proper.

§ XI. All observed disputes, and much virulent altercation, Sacheverel was found guilty by a majority of seventeen voices; and four-and-thirty peers entered a protest against this decision. He was prohibited from preaching for three years; his two sermons were ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, in presence of the lord mayor and the two sheriffs of London and Middlesex. The Lords likewise voted, that the executioner should commit to the same fire the famous devotions of the people, preaching up the king's power, asserting the absolute authority and indefeasible right of princes. A like sentence was denounced by the Commons upon a book entitled, "Collections of Passages referred to by Dr. Sacheverel, in his Answer to the Articles of Impeachment." These he had selected from impious books lately published, and they were read by his counsel, as proofs that the church was in danger. The length of the sentence passed upon Sacheverel, which was in a great measure owing to the dread of popular resentment, his friends considered as a victory obtained over a wily faction, and the town of Leeds described as the mightiest bournes and illuminations. On the fifth day of April, the queen ordered the parliament to be prorogued, after hearing, in her speech to both Houses, expressed her concern for the necessity of an expedient to bring the session to an end. She declared that no prince could have a more true and tender concern for the welfare and prosperity of the church than she had, and should always have; and she said it was very injurious to take a present from wicked and malicious libels, to impute that the church was in danger by her administration.

§ XII. The French king, seeing the misery of his people daily increase, and all his resources fail, humbled himself again before the allies, and by the means of Petkum, who still corresponded with his ministers, implored the French and Spaniards, by the means of the Electors of Saxony and Jena, to assist him in his case. In order to facilitate their consent, he despatched a new project of pacification, in which he promised to renounce his grandson, and to comply with all their other demands, provided the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be reinforced in their establishments of compunction, which was being rejected, another plan was offered, and communicated to the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and queen of Great Britain. Then Petkum wrote a letter to the Marquis de Torcy, intimating, that the allies required, that Christian majesty should declare, in plain and expressive terms, that he consented to all the preliminaries, except the thirty-seventh article, which stipulated a cessation of civil wars, in case the empires were divided, and that King Charles was to be sent in lieu of them. He said, the allies would send passports to the French ministers, to treat of an equivalent for that article. Louis was even forced to swallow this bitter draught. He sacrificed his consent, and appointed the Marquis DONELLES and the Abbé Polignac his plenipotentiaries. They were not refused, however, to enter Holland, but were met by the deputies BUSY and VANDERDUSSEN at Gertruydenburgh. Meanwhile, as the French king was determined to send over the Duke of Marlborough, to assist them with his advice in these conferences. The two Houses of parliament seconded their request in a joint address to her majesty, which was urged by other members, in case of refusal, to request her majesty for his departure; and said she was glad to find they concurred with her in just sense of the duke's eminent services. Both the letter and addresses were procured by the interest of Marlborough, to let the queen see how much that nobleman was considered both at home and abroad. But she was already wholly alienated from him in her heart, and these expedients served only to increase her distrust.
Naples was already in possession of the house of Austria, he restricted the provision to Sicily and Sardinia. He offered to deliver up four castrum towns in Flanders, as a security of Behithune, and even engaged to supply the confederates with a monthly sum of money, to defray the expense of expelling that prince from his dominions, should he refuse to resign them with a good grace.

The deputies,commissioned to Lord Townsend, and Count Zinzelpof, the imperial plenipotentiary; but the conduct of the deputies was regulated by the Pensionary Heinsius, who was firmly attached to Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, and who had never been pacificator. The negotiation lasted from the nineteenth day of March to the twenty-fifth of July, during which time the conferences were several times interrupted, and a great many despatches and new proposals arrived from Versailles. At length, the plenipotentiaries returned to France, after having sent a letter to the pensionary, in which they declared, that the proposals made by the deputies were unjust and impracticable; and complained of the unworthy treatment to which they had been exposed. Louys resolved to hazard another campaign, not without hope, that there might be some lucky incident in the events of war, and that the approaching revolution in the English ministry, of which he was well apprized, would give him an additional pretext. The States-general resolved, That the enemy had departed from the foundation on which the negotiation had begun, and studied pretences to evade the execution of the treaty. By a great number of the Lords, Townsend, and, in short, that France had no other view than to sow and create jealousy and discord among the allies. Lord Townsend, in a memorial, assured them, that the queen entirely approved their resolution, and all the steps they had taken in the course of the negotiation; and that she was firmly resolved to prosecute the war with all possible vigour, until the enemy should accept such terms of peace as might secure the tranquility of the Christian world.

§ XV. The operations of the campaign. Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough set out from the Hague on the fifteenth day of March for Tournay, in order to assemble the forces which were quartered on the Maes, in Flanders, and Brabant.

On the twentieth of April, they suddenly advanced to Pont-a-Vendin, in order to attack the lines upon which the French had been at work all the winter, hoping by these to cover Douay and other frontier towns, which were threatened by these operations. The troops left for the defence of the lines retired without opposition. The allies having laid bridges over the scarp, the Duke of Marlborough with his division passed the river, and encamped at Vitr. Prince Eugene took possession of the whole invasion. The enemy retiring towards Canbeuray. Mariscal Villars still commanded the French army, which was extremely numerous and well appointed, considering the distress they were in. Indeed, the numbers were augmented by this distress; for many thousands saved themselves from dying of hunger, by carrying arms in the service. The maréchal having assembled all his forces, passed the Schelte, and encamped at Bouchan, declaring that he would give battle to the confederates; an alteration was immediately made in the disposition of the allies, and proper precautions taken for his reception. He advanced in order of battle; but having viewed the situation of the confederates he marched back to the heights of B台南ware, where he fixed his camp. His aim was, by continual alarms, to intercept the siege of Douay, which was vigorously defended by a numerous garrison, under the command of Monsieur Albergotti, who made a number of successful sallies, in which the besiegers were greatly outnumbered. They were likewise repulsed in several assaults; but still proceeded with unremitting vigour, until the besieged, being reduced to the last extremity, were obliged to capitulate. He had placed a garrison in all the towns of the districts of Amiens, which he had stormed. But the Duke of Berwick had cast up entrenchments in the mountains, and taken such precautions to guard them, as baffled all the attempts of the imperial general. Spain was much more fruitful of military incidents. The horse and dragon-s in the army of King Charles, headed by General Stanhope, attacked the whole cavalry of the enemy at Almenaur. Stanhope charged in person, and with his own hand slew General Amessida, who commanded the guards of camp. The Spanish horse were entirely routed, together with nine battalions that escaped by favour of the darkness; and the main body of the army retired with precipitation to Lendu. General Staremberg pursued them to Saragossa, where he found a vast number of battalions in their winter-quarters. The disposition ensuing on the ninth day of August, the enemy were totally defeated; five thousand of their men were killed, seven thousand taken, together with all their artillery, and the enemy retreated to Saragossa, which they entered Saragossa in triumph, while Philip with the wreck of his army retreated to Madrid. Having sent his queen and son to Vicenza, he retired to Valladolid, in order to collect his scattered forces, so as to form another army. The good fortune of Charles was of a short duration. Stanhope proposed that he should immediately secure Pampeluna, the only pass by which the French king could send troops to Spain; but this salutary scheme was rejected. King of France was at one time the whole country deserted by all the grandees; and he had the mortification to see that the Castilians were universally attached to his competitor.

§ XVI. While his forces continued cantoned in the neighbourhood of Toledo, the King of France, at the request of Philip, sent the Duke de Vendome to take the command of the Spanish army, which was at the same time reinforced by detachments of French troops. Vendome's reputation was so high, and his person so beloved by the soldiery, that his presence was almost equivalent to an army. A great number of volunteers immediately assembled to signalize themselves under the eye of this renowned general. They were new recruited, had undergone severe service, were imbued with the greatest courage, and made surprising efforts in favour of their sovereign; so that in less than three months after his defeat at Saragossa, he was in a condition to go in quest of his rival. Charles, on the other hand, was totally neglected by the courts of Vienna and Great Britain, which took no steps to supply his wants, or enable him to prosecute the advantages he had gained. In the beginning of November his army marched back to Saragossa, and was cantoned in the neighbourhood of Cifuentes, where Staremberg established his head-quarters. General Stanhope, with the British forces, was quartered in the little town of Brinlac, where, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, he found himself again under the command of the Spanish army. As the place was not tenable, and he had very little ammunition, he was obliged, after a short but vigorous resistance, to capitulate, and surrender himself and all his forces prisoners of war, to the amount of two thousand men, one thousand colonels, and two thousand one hundred and forty-two officers. General de Staremberg, major-general, one brigadier, with all the colonels and officers of the respective regiments. He was greatly censured for having allowed himself to be surprised; for if he had placed a garrison in the order of battle, and acceding to the advice of General Carpenter, he might have received notice of the enemy's approach time enough to retire to Cifuentes. Thither he had detached his aide-de-camp, with an account of the enemy's march. The duke of Berwick fled to United States and Spanish army; and Staremberg immediately assembled his forces. About eleven in the forenoon they began to march towards Birnsea; but the roads were so bad, that night overtook them before they reached the height of that place. Staremberg is said to have lost many of his men in the attempt. He sent the English general, who had surrendered before his ar-vival. The troops lay all night on their arms near Villafranca, and on the twenty-ninth were attacked by the enemy, who doubted the weakness of Staremberg's left wing. It was utterly defeated, all the infantry that com-opposed it having been cut in pieces or taken; but the victors, instead of following the blow, began to plunder the baggage; and Staremberg with his right wing fought their left, and his foot made up for the lack of cavalry. Then they reverted in disorder, leaving him master of the field of battle and of all their artillery. Six thousand of the enemy were killed on the spot: but the allies had suffered so severely, that the general could not maintain his ground. He ordered the cannon to be nailed up, and marched to Saragossa, from whence he retired to Ca-talona. Thither he was pursued by the Duke de Vendome, who reduced Dalaguer, in which he had left a garrison, and commanded him to take shelter under the walls of Barcelona. At this period the Duke de Noailles invested Gironne, which he reduced notwithstanding the severity of the weather; so that Philip, from a fugitive, became in three months its supreme master. He invested the Spanish archy, except the province of Catalonia, and even that lay open to his incursions. Nothing of consequence was achieved on the side of Portugal, from whence the Earl of Garcia and Granville had retired. The operations of the British fleet, during this summer, were so inconsiderable as scarcely to deserve notice.
Sir John Norris commanded in the Mediterranean, and with a view to support the Camisars, who were in arms in the Crimea, sailed for the Cape, within a gulf of Marseilles, and at the distance of fifteen from the mouintains. The place surrendered, without opposition, to about seven hundred men who landed under the command of Major-General, and lately voncertain, he made himself master of the town and castle of Avile; but the Duke de Noailles advancing with a body of forces to join the Duke de Roqueilail, who commanded in those parts, the English abandoned their conquests, and re-embarked with precipitation. After the battle of Pollania the Czar of Muscovy reduced all Liron; but he and King Augustus agreed to a neutrality for Pomerania. The King of Sweden continued at Bender, and the grand signor interested himself so much in favour of that prince, as to declare war against the Emperor of Russia. Hostilities were concluded on the Swedish and Danish fleets, without further success. The malcontents in Hungary sustained their intrigues during the summer; but they were discouraged, and encouraged to maintain the war by the rupture between the Ottoman Porte and Russia. They were flattered with hopes of auxiliaries from the Turks: and expected enginedmn from the French monarch.
§ XVII. In England, the effects of these intrigues which had been formed against the whig ministers began to appear. The trial of Sacheverel excited a popular spirit of averse to those who favoured the dissenters.
From all parts of the kingdom addresses were sent to the queen, censuring all resistance as a rebellious doctrine, found upon anti-monarchical and republican principles.
At the same time counter addresses were procured by the whigs, censuring the action, and magnifying the conduct of the present parliament. The queen began to express her attachment to the courtiers, by mortifying the Duke of Marlborough. Upon the death of the Earl of Essex she wrote to the general, desiring that the regiment which had been commanded by that nobleman should be given to Mr. Hill, brother to Mrs. Masham, who had supplanted the Dachess of Marlborough in the queen's friendship, and was, in effect, the source of this political revolution. The duke, instead of supporting her Majesty, or assuming the protection of that which would redound to the service from the promotion of such a young officer over the heads of a great many brave men, who had exhibited repeated proofs of valour and courage, was Mariners in this extraordinary mark of partial regard to the brother of Mr.
Masham, which he could not help considering as a declaration against himself and his family, who had so much care to complain of that lady's malice and ingratitude.
To this remonstrance the queen made no other reply, but lesser his aprax. He died at St. John's in the Goddolphin enforced his friend's arguments, though without effect; and the duke in disgrace retired to Windsor. The queen appeared at council without taking the least notice of this faUl and dismissed the Duke of Marlborough. Several noblemen ventured to speak to her majesty on the subject, and explain the bad consequences of disobliging a man who had done such eminent services to the nation. She told them his services were still fresh in her memory: but that she could not spare the Duke of Marlborough for his person, Hearing, however, that a popular clamour was raised, and that the House of Commons intended to pass some votes that would be disagreeable to her and her new counsellors, she ordered the Earl of Godolphin to write to the duke, to dispose of the regiment as he should think proper, and return to town immediately. Before he received this intimation he had sent a letter to the queen, desiring she would permit him to retire from business.
In answer to this petition, the assured him his suspicions were groundless, and insisted upon his coming to council.
The duchess demanded an audience of her majesty, on pretence of vindicating her own character from some aspersions.
She was not likely to hope much success from the influence she had lost. She protested, argued, wept, and supplicated; but the queen was too well pleased with her own deliverance from the tyranny of the other and the weakness of the party. The queen and humiliation of the duchess served only to render herself more contemptible. The queen heard her without examining the least sign of emotion, and all she would vouchsafe, was a repetition of these words, "You desired no answer, and you shall have none:" alluding to an expression in a letter she had received from the duchess.
As an additional mortification to the ministry, the office of lord chamberlain was transferred from the Duke of Kent to the Duke de Noailles. The Duke de Sangle to the tories, and maintained an intimacy of correspondence with Mr. Harley. The interest of the Duke of Marlborough was not even sufficient to prevent the dismission of his own son-in-law, the Earl of Sunderland, from the post of secretary of state, in which he was succeeded by Lord Dartmouth.

§ XVIII. The queen was generally applauded for this act, which appeared to just and reasonable, and setting herself free from her dependency, she appeared an arbiter of her own and public affairs, which had hitherto been in the hands of others. The Duke of Beaufort went to court on this occasion, and told her majesty he was extremely glad that she could now salute her queen in reality. The whole world who had been out of the secret was glad to see the ministry, by which the king had been influenced, out of the confidence of the bank represented to her majesty the prejudice that would undoubtedly accrue to public credit from a change of the ministry. The emperor and the States-general were in this domestic revolution. Their ministers at London presented memorials, explaining in what manner their foreign affairs would be influenced by an alteration in the British ministry. The queen assured them, that, whatever changes might be made, the Duke of Marlborough should continue in his employment. In the month of August the Earl of Godolphin was divested of his office, and the treasury put in commission, subjected to the direction of Harley, appointed chancellor of the exchequer and under-treasurer. The Earl of Rochefoucauld was declared president of the council, in the room of Lord Stanhope, whose death had taken place. The lord steward was replaced by the Duke of Devonshire, who was given to the Duke of Buckingham; and Mr. Boyle was removed from the secretary's office, to make way for Mr. Henry St. John. The lord chancellor resigned the great seal, it was first put to commission, and afterwards given to Sir Simon Harcourt. The Earl of Wharton surrendered his commission of lord lieutenant of the island of Jersey, to Mr. Henry St. John. The Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Orford withdrew himself from the board of admality; and Mr. George Granville was apnointed secretary of war, in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole. The command of the forces in Portugal was bestowed under the Duke of Portland; the Duke of Hamilton was appointed lord lieutenant of the county-palatine of Lancaster.
ter. In a word, there was not one whig left in any office of state, except the Duke of Marlborough, who would have renounced his command, had he not been earnestly dissuaded by the peerage. ... his good name as might have been prejudicial to the interest of the nation. That the triumph of the toasts might be complete, the queen dissolved the whig parliament, after such precautions were taken as could not fail to influence the new election in favour of the other party.

§ XIX. To this end nothing so effectually contributed as the trial of Sacheverel, who was used as an instrument and tool to wound and turn the passions of the vulgar. Having given his assent to the war, and being sent in procession to that country, with all the pomp and magnificence of a sovereign prince. He was sumptuously entertained by the University of Oxford, and different noblemen, who, while they worshipped him as the idol of their faction, could not help despising the object of their adoration. He was received in several towns by the magistrates of the corporation in their formalities, and often attended by a body of a thousand horse. At Buckingham he was met by Mr. Creswell, at the head of four thousand horse, and the like number of persons on foot, wearing white knots edged with gold, and three leaves of gilt laurel in their hats. The hedges were for two miles dressed with streamers of blue, white, and red; and the steppers covered with streamers, flags, and colours. Nothing was heard but the cry of "The church and Dr. Sacheverel." The clergy were actuated by a spirit of enthusiasm, and the house of commons by a spirit of terror; all ranks and degrees of people, and had such effect upon the elections for a new parliament, that very few were returned as members but such as had distinguished themselves by their zeal against the whig administration. Now the queen had the pleasure to see all the offices of state, the lieutenant of London, the management of corporations, and the direction of both houses of parliament, in the hands of the Tories. When these met on the twenty-fifth of November, Mr. Hanly spoke with great freedom, and without opposition. The queen, in her speech, recommended the prosecution of the war with vigour, especially in Spain. She declared herself resolved to support the church of England; to preserve the British constitution according to the union; to maintain the indulgence by law allowed to scrupulous dissentions; and to employ none but such as were heartily attached to the protestant succession in the House of Hanover. The Lords in their address promised to concur in all reasonable measures towards procuring an honourable peace. The Commons were more warm and hearty in their assurances, exhorting her majesty to distinguish all such principles and measures as were lately threatened her honour and dignity; measures which, whenever they might prevail, would prove fatal to the whole constitution, both in church and state. After this declaration they proceeded to consider the estimates, and cheerfully granted the supplies for the ensuing year, part of which was raised by two lotteries. In the House of Peers, the Earl of Scarborough moved, that the thanks of the House should be returned to the Duke of Marlborough; but the Duke of York made some objections to the motion, and the general's friends, dreading the consequence of putting the question, postponed the consideration of this proposal until the duke should return from the continent. The Earl of Peterborough was appointed extraordinary to the imperial court: the Earl of Rivers was sent in the same quality to Hanover: Mr. Richard Hill was nominated envoy extraordinary to the United Provinces, as well as to the council of state appointed for the government of the Spanish Netherlands, in the room of Lieutenant-General Cadogan. Meredith, Macartney, and Honeywood, were deprived of their regiments, because in their cups they had drank a toast to the Duke of Dinmont.

§ XX. This nobleman arrived in England towards the latter end of December. He conferred about half an hour in private with the queen, and next morning assisted at a council of war; but without violence; and to express to the queen, as well as to the nation, that he needed not to expect the thanks of the parliament as formerly: and told him she hoped he would live well with her ministers. He expressed no resentment at the alterations which had been made; but resolved to acquiesce in the queen's pleasure, and retain the command of the army on her own terms. On the second day of January, the queen procured a message to the king, intimating that there had been an action in Spain to the disadvantage of King Charles; that the damage having fallen particularly on the English forces, she had given directions for sending and procuring troops to repair the loss, and hoped the parliament would approve her conduct. Both Houses seized this opportunity of venting their spleen against the old ministry. The history of England is disgraced by the violent conduct of two turbulent factions, which, in the course of the war, assumed the name of whig and legislative power. The parliamentary strain was quite altered. One can hardly conceive how resolutions so widely different could be taken on the same subject, with any shadow of reason and decorum. Marlborough, who but a few months before had been so highly extolled and cared for by the representatives of the people, was now become the object of parliamentary hatred and censure, though no sensible alteration had happened in his conduct or success. That hero, who had retrieved the glory of the British arms, won so many battles, subdued such a number of towns and districts, humbled the pride and checked the ambition of France, secured the liberty of Europe, and, as it were, chained this noisy adversary to his chains; in a few weeks dwindled into an object of contempt and derision. He was ridiculed in public letters, and reviled in private conversation. Instances were every where repeated of his fraud, his excess, his violence, his cruelty, his ambition, and misconduct; even his courage was called in question: and this consummate general was represented as the lowest of mankind. So unstable is the popularity of every character that fluctuates between two opposite sides of faction.

§ XXI. The Lords, in their answer to the queen's message, declared, that as the misfortunes in Spain might have been occasioned by some preceding mismanagement, they would not use their utmost endeavours to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future. They set on foot an inquiry concerning the affairs of Spain; and the Earl of Peterborough being examined before the committee, imputed all the miscarriages in the course of that war, to the Earl of Galway and General Stanhope. Notwithstanding the defence of Galway, which was clear and convincing, the House resolved, That the Earl of Peterborough had given a faithful and an honourable account of the councils of war in Valencia; that the Earl of Galway, Lord Trowley, and General Stanhope, in advising an offensive war, had been the unhappy occasion of the battle at Almanza, the source of our misfortunes in Spain, and one great cause of the nation's misfortune; and that this conduct was inexplicable by the conduct of the minister with her majesty. They voted that the prosecution of an offensive war in Spain was approved and directed by the ministers, who were, therefore, justly blamable, as having contributed to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disarmed and the Earl of Peterborough, during his command in Spain, had performed many great and eminent services; and, if his opinion had been followed, it might have prevented the misfortunes that ensued. Then the Duke of Buckingham moved, That the thanks of the House should be given to the Earl, for his remarkable and eminent services: and these were actually received from the mouth of the Lord-keeper Harcourt, who took this opportunity to drop some oblique reflections upon the mercenary disposition of the Duke of Marlborough. The House, proceeding in the inquiry, passed another vote, importing, That the late ministry had been negligent in managing the Spanish war, to the great prejudice of the nation. Finding that the Portuguese troops were posted on the right of the English at the battle of Almanza, they resolved, That the Earl of Galway, in yielding the right wing of the army to the Earl of Marlborough, the greatest of Prince of Great Britain. These resolutions they included in an address to the queen, who had been present during the debates, which were extremely long and arduous, and was determined to give no protest. These were not the proceedings of candour and national justice, but the ebullitions of party zeal and rampant animosity.

§ XXII. While the Lords were employed in this inquiry, the Commons examined certain abuses which had crept into the management of the navy; and some censures were passed upon certain persons concerned in matters for virtually the same. The interesting evidence of St. Olave's and other parishes presented a petition, complaining that a great number of Palatines, inhabiting one house, might produce among them a contagious distemper; and in time become a plague to the public, as they were destitute of all visible means of subsistence. This petition had been procured by the tories, that the House of Commons might have another handle for attacking the late ministry. A committee, with the purpose to investigate or encourage those Palatines had come to England. The papers relating to this affair being laid before them by the queen's order, and perused, the House resolved, That the inquiring and bringing over the poor Palatines of all religions, at the public expense, was an extravagant and unreasonable charge to the kingdom, and a scandalous misapplication of the public money, tending to the increase and oppression of the poor, and of dangerous cooeorence with the constitution in church and state; and, that whoever advised their being brought over was an enemy to the queen and kingdom. Animated by the heat of this inquiry, they passed the bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of some ancient times. But this bill was rejected in the House of Lords. Another bill was enacted into a law, importing, That no person should be deemed qualified for representing a county in parliament, unless he possessed an estate of six hundred pounds a-year; and restricting the qualifications to hold a seat in parliament. The intent of this law was to exclude trading people from the House of Commons, and to lodge the legislative power with the land-owners. A third act passed, permitting the importation of French wine in neutral bottoms; that against which the whigs loudly exclaimed, as a national evil, and a scandalous compliment to the enemy.

§ XXIII. A violent party in the House of Commons began to make war on Harley in a warm, tory, because he would not enter precipitately into all their factious measures: they even began to suspect his principles, when his credit was re-established by a very singular accident. Giscard, the French parion, of whom mention hath already been made, thought himself very ill rewarded for his services, with a pecunious pension of four hundred pounds, which he enjoyed from the queen's bounty. He had been denounced by St. John, the former companion of his pleasures; he had in vain endeavoured to obtain audience of the queen, with a view to command more considerable appointments. Harley was his enemy, and all access to her majesty was denied. Enraged at these disappoiments, he attempted to make his peace with the court of France, and offered his services in a hundred thousand pounds a-year to a person in a high station. Moreau, a banker, in Paris. This packet, which he endeavoured to transmit by the way of Portugal, was intercepted, and a warrant issued out to apprehend him for high treason. When the messenger dissatisfied him in St. James's Park, he exhibited marks of guilty confusion and despair, and begged that he would kill him directly. Being conveyed to the Convict, in a sort of frenzy, he perceived a penknife lying upon a table, and took it up without being perceived by the attendants. A committee of counsell was immediately summoned, and Giscard brought before them to examine. Finding that his correspondence with Moreau was discovered, he desired to speak in private with Secretary St. John, whom, in all probability, he had resolved to assassinate. His request being refused, he said, "That's hard I not one word!" St. John being out of his reach, he stepped up to Mr. Harley, and exclaiming, "Have at thee, then!" stabbed him in the breast with the penknife which he had concealed. The instrument broke upon the bone without penetrating into the cavity: nevertheless, he repeated the blow with such force, that the character of the masochist fell to St. John, seeing him fall, cried out, "The villain has killed Mr. Harley!" and drew his sword. Several other members followed his example, and wounded Giscard in several places. Yet he made a desperate defence, until he was supported by the masters and servants, and conveived from the council-chamber, which he had filled with terror, tumult, and confusion. His wounds, though dangerous, were not mortal: but he died of a gangrene occasioned by the bruises he had sustained. This attempt upon the life of Harley by a person wanted to establish a correspondence with France, called the suspicion of those who began to doubt that minister's integrity. The two Houses of parliament, in an address to the queen, declared their belief, that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majesty, and his services, had not removed from him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction. They besought her majesty to take all possible care of her sacred person; and, for that purpose, was appointed, to inquire into what circumstances or encouragement those Palatines had come to England. The papers relating to this affair being laid before them by the queen's order, and perused, the House resolved, That the inquiring and bringing over the poor Palatines of all religions, at the public expense, was an extravagant and unreasonable charge to the kingdom, and a scandalous misapplication of the public money, tending to the increase and oppression of the poor, and of dangerous cooeorence with the constitution in church and state; and, that whoever advised their being brought over was an enemy to the queen and kingdom. Animated by the heat of this inquiry, they passed the bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of some ancient times. But this bill was rejected in the House of Lords. Another bill was enacted into a law, importing, That no person should be deemed qualified for representing a county in parliament, unless he possessed an estate of six hundred pounds a-year; and restricting the qualifications to hold a seat in parliament. The intent of this law was to exclude trading people from the House of Commons, and to lodge the legislative power with the land-owners. A third act passed, permitting the importation of French wine in neutral bottoms; that against which the whigs loudly exclaimed, as a national evil, and a scandalous compliment to the enemy.

§ XXIV. The Commons empowered certain persons to examine all the grants made by King William, and ascertain to what they were, as well as the considerations upon which they were made. Upon their report a bill was formed and passed that House; but the Lords rejected it at the first reading. Their next step was to examine the public accounts, with a view to fix an imputation on the Earl of Godolphin. They voted, That above five-and-thirty millions of the money granted by parliament remained unaccounted for. This sum, however, was afterwards declared, by the Parliaments of Charles and King William. One half of the whole was charged to Mr. Bridges, the paymaster, who had actually accounted for all the money he had received, except about three millions, though these accounts had not passed through the auditor's office. The Commons afterwards proceeded to inquire into the debts of the navy, that exceeded five millions, which, with many other debts, were thrown into one stock, amounting to nine millions four hundred and forty thousand three hundred and three thousand pounds. A fund was formed for paying an interest or annuity of six per cent. until the principal should be discharged; and with this was granted a monopoly of a projected trade in the South Sea, vested in the proprietors of the navy-bills, who were divided into three thousand six hundred and eighty shares, which were incorporated for this purpose. Such was the origin of the South Sea company, founded upon a chimerical supposition, that the English would be permitted to trade upon the coast of Peru in the West Indies. Perhaps the new ministry hoped to obtain this permission, as an equivalent for their abandoning the interest of King Charles, with respect to his pretensions upon Spain. By this time the Emperor Joseph had died of the small-pox, without making issue; so that his brother's immediate aim was to succeed him on the imperial throne. This event was on the twentieth day of April communicated by a message from the queen to both Houses. She told them that the States-General had concurred with her in a resolution to support the house of Austria; and that they had already taken such measures as would secure the election of Charles as head of the empire.

§ XXV. The House of Commons, in order to demonstrate their attachment to the church, in consequence of an address from the lower house of convocation, and a quickening message from the queen, passed a bill for the building of a new church in Westminster, and appropriated for this purpose the duty upon coals, which had been granted for the building of St. Paul's, now finished. This imposition was continued until it should raise the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds. At the close of the session, the Commons presented a rémonstrance or representation to the queen, in which they told her, that they had not only raised the necessary supplies, but also discharged the heavy debts of which the nation had so long and unjustly complained. They said, that, in tracing the causes of this debt, they had discovered fraud, embezzlement, and misapplication of the public money; that they who of late years had the management of the treasury were guilty of notorious breach of trust and injustice to the nation, in allowing above thirty million pounds in arrears. In order that the actual state of things might look like a design to conceal embezzlements. They begged her majesty would give immediate directions for compelling the several imposts accountants speedily to proceed with the settlement of the accounts, as they had neglected their duty in prosecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be intrusted with the public money. They affirmed, that from all these evil practices and worse designs of some persons, who, had by false professions of love to their country, maintained themselves into their royal favour, irreparable mischief would have accrued to the public, had not her majesty, in her great wisdom, seasonably discovered the fatal tendency of such measures, and removed from the administration those who had so ill answered her majesty's favourable opinion, and in so many instances grossly abused the trust reposed in them. They observed that her people could with greater propriety and advantage be restrained, by the frauds and depredations of such evil ministers, had not the same men proceeded to treat her sacred person with undutifulness and disregard. This representation of the conspirators with the desired effect of inflicting the minds of the people against the late ministry. Such expedients were become necessary for the execution of Oxford's project, which was, to send a speedy end to a war that the late ministry projected the people to, and even accumulated money hitherto retained and in themselves to be transmitted to their posterity. The nation was inspired by extravagant ideas of glory and conquest, even to a rage of war-making; so that the new ministers, in order to check this excess, must needs proceed with measures for exciting their indignation and contempt against those persons whom they had formerly idolized as their heroes and patriots. On the twelfth day of June, the queen, having given the royal assent to several public and private bills, made an affectionate speech to both Houses. She thanked the Commons, in the warmest expressions, for having complied with all her desires; for having baffled the expectations of her enemies in finding supplies for the service of the ensuing year; in having granted greater sums than were ever given to any prince in one session; and in having settled funds for the payment of the public debts, so that the credit of the nation was restored. Had a squabble or the succession of the house of Hanover, and her fixed resolution to support and encourage the church of England by law established. Then the parliament was prorogued. § XXVI. Of the convention which was assembled with the new parliament, the lower house chose Dr. Atterbury their procurator. He was an enterprising ecclesiastic, of extensive learning, acute talents, violently attached to Tory principles, and intimately connected with the prime minister, Oxford: so that he directed all the proceedings in the lower house of convolution, in concert with that minister. The queen, in a letter to the archbishop, signified her approbation of the consultations of the clergy must be of use to repress the attempts of loose and profane persons. She sent a licence under the broad seal, empowering them to sit and do business in as ample a manner as ever had been granted since the Reformation. They were ordered to lay before the queen an account of the excessive growth of infidelity and heresy, as well as of other abuses, that necessary measures might be taken for a reformation. The bishops were purposely slighted and overruled. But the council on the Scotch lines was allowed to sit, and the Latin and the late ministers. A committee being appointed to draw up a representation of the present state of the church and religion, Atterbury undertook the task, and composed a representation that most keenly attacked all the stricures upon the administration, as it had been exercised since the time of the revolution. Another was penned by the bishops in more moderate terms: and several regulations were made, but in none of these did the two houses agree. They concurred, however, in censuring some tenets favouring Arminism, broached and supported by Mr. Whiston, mathematician professor in Cambridge. He had been expelled the university, and wrote a vindication of himself, dedicated to the convocation. The archbishop doubted whether this assembly could proceed against a man for heresy: the judges were consulted, and the majority of them gave an opinion, that the convocation had had a jurisdiction. Four of them professed the contrary sentiment, which they maintained from the statutes made at the Reformation. The queen, in a letter to the bishops, said, that as there was no doubt that such of the accountants as had neglected their duty in prosecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be intrusted with the public money, she expected they would proceed in the matter before them. Fresh scruples arising, they determined to examine the book, without proceeding against the author, and this was censured accordingly. An extract of the sentence was sent to the queen; but she did not signify her pleasure on the subject, and the affair remained in suspense. Whiston published a work in four volumes, justifying his doctrine, and maintaining that the apostolical constitutions were not only canonical, but also preferable in point of authority to the Epistles and the Gospel.

§ XXVII. The new ministry had not yet determined to supersede the Duke of Marlborough in the command of the army. This was, at first, a sacrifice to the commonwealth, by the frauds and depredations of such evil ministers, who had not the same men proceeded to treat her sacred person with undutifulness and disregard. This representation of the execution of Oxford's project, which was, to send a speedy end to a war that the late ministry projected the people to, and even accumulated money hitherto retained and in themselves to be transmitted to their posterity. be made, declaring he would attack them the next morning; so that Villars drew all his forces on that side, in full expectation of an engagement. The duke, on the supposition that the enemy was on the left unsupported, had ordered the Generals Cadogan and Hompesch to assemble twenty battalions and seventeen squadrons from Douay and the neighbouring garrisons, to march to Arleux, where they should endeavour to pass the Sambre. But such an attempt was delayed with the earthen bridges and pontoons, to lay bridges over the canal near Goulezen, and over the Scarpe at Vitry, while the duke, with the whole confederate army, began his march for the same place about nine in the evening. He proceeded with such expedition, that by five in the morning he passed the river at Vitry. There he received intelligence that Hompesch had taken possession of the passes on the Sainct and Schelde without opposition, the enemy having withdrawn their detachments from that side, just as he had imagined. He himself, with his vanguard of fifty squadrons, hastened his march towards Arleux, and before eight of the clock arrived at Bouchouchel, where in two hours he was joined by the heads of the columns into which he had divided his infantry. Villars being certified of his intention, about two in the morning, decamped with his whole army, and putting himself at the head of the king's household troops, marched forward with such expedition, that at eight o'clock in the forenoon he was in sight of the Duke of Marlborough, who had by this time joined Count Hompesch. The French general immediately retreated to the main body of his forces, which had advanced to the high ground between Arras and Cambrai, while the allies encamped upon the Schelde, between Rys and Estryn, after a march of ten leagues without halting, scarcely to be paralleled in history. By this plan, so hastily executed, the Duke of Marlborough fairly surprised Villars, without the loss of one man, entered the lines which he had pronounced impracticable. This stroke of the English general was extolled as a master-piece of military skill, while Villars was assailed with ridicule even by his own officers. The field-deputies of the States-general proposed that he should give battle to the enemy, who passed the Schelde at Crevecoeur, in order to cover Bouchain; but the duke would not hazard an engagement, considering how much the army was fatigued by the long march; and that any misfortune, while they continued within the French lines, might be fatal. His intention was to besiege Bouchain; an enterprise that was deemed impracticable, inasmuch as the place was situated in a morass, strongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garrison, in the neighbourhood of an army superior in number to that of the allies. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, and the dissensions of last winter, the duke resolved to enter in upon the campaign in the mean time, despatched Brigadier Sutton to England, with an account of his having passed the French lines; which was not at all agreeable to his enemies. They had prognosticated that nothing would be done during this campaign, and began to insinuate that the duke could strike no stroke of importance without the assistance of Prince Eugene. They now endeavoured to lessen the glory of his success; and even taxed him with having removed his camp from a convenient situation to a place where the troops were in danger of starving. Nothing could be more provoking than this scandalous malevolence to a great man who had done so much honour to his country. He was then actually expiring his life in service. § XXIX. On the tenth day of August Bouchain was invested, and the Duke of Marlborough exercised himself to the utmost extent of his vigilance and capacity, well knowing the difficulties of the undertaking, and how much his reputation would depend upon his success. Villars had taken every precaution that his skill and experience could suggest, to humble the endeavours of the English general, and to confound the skill and activity of the Duke of Marlborough. Then he laid a scheme for surprising Douay, which likewise miscarried. If we consider that the English general, in the execution of his plan, was obliged to form lines, erect regular forts, raise batteries, throw bridges over a river, make a casemake through a deep morass, provide for the security of convoys against a numerous army on one side, and the Duke of Marlborough on the other, we must allow this was the boldest enterprise of the whole war: that it required all the fortitude, skill, and resolution of a great general, and all the valour and intrepidity of the confederate troops, who had scarce ever exhibited it on a similar occasion. It was not performed by the Duke of Marlborough: the breaches of Bouchain were no sooner repaired than the opposite armies began to separate, and the allied forces were quartered in the frontier towns, that they might be at hand to take the field early in the spring. They were now in possession of the Maes, almost as far as the Sambre; of the Schelde from Tournay; and of the Lys as far as it is navigable. They had reduced Spanish Guelderland, Limburg, Brabant, Flanders, and the greatest part of Hanover; they were masters of the Scarpe; and, by the conquest of Bouchain, they had opened to themselves a way into the very bowels of France. All these acquisitions were owing to the valour of the Duke of Marlborough. After the loss of Bouchain, he returned to the Hague, and arrived in England about the middle of November.

§ XXX. The queen had conferred the command of her forces in Flanders upon the Duke of Argyile, who had been removed from the service in Flanders for that purpose. He had long been at variance with the Duke of Marlborough; a circumstance which recommended him the more strongly to the ministry. He landed at Barcelona in the twen-tieth of May, and found the British troops in such desperate distress for want of subsistence. The treasurer had promised to supply him liberally; the Commons had granted one million five hundred thousand pounds for that service. There were all their former acquisitions and acquisitions which the British forces were still capable of maintaining in that kingdom; and indeed the army commanded by the Duke de Vendome was in such a wretched condition, that if Staremberg had been properly supported by the allies, he might have obtained signal advantages. The Duke of Argyile, having waited in vain for the promised remittances, was obliged to borrow money on his own credit, before the British troops could take the field. At length, Staremberg determined to march towards the enemy, and attacked him at the pass of Porto del Rey, where they were repulsed with considerable damage. After this action the Duke of Argyile was seized with a violent fever, and conveyed back to Barcelona. Vendome invested the castle of Cadiz, which the British soon resolved to abandon. In the mean time, despatched Brigadier Sutton to England, with an account of his having passed the French lines; which was not at all agreeable to his enemies. They had prognosticated that nothing would be done during this campaign, and began to insinuate that the duke could strike no stroke of importance without the assistance of Prince Eugene. They now endeavoured to lessen the glory of his success; and even taxed him with having removed his camp from a convenient situation to a place where the troops were in danger of starving. Nothing could be more provoking than this scandalous malevolence to a great man who had done so much honour to his country. He was then actually expiring his life in service. The Duke of Argyile wrote pressing letters to the ministry, and loudly complained that he was altogether unsupposed; but all his remonstrances were ineffectual; no remittances arrived; and he returned to England without having been able to attempt any thing of importance. In September, King Charles, leaving his queen at Barcelona, set sail for Italy, and at Milan had an interview with the Duke of Savoy, who still disputes were concluded. The emperor, who had forced his way into Savoy and penetrated as far as the Rhine; but he suddenly halted in the middle of his career, and after a short campaign repulsed the mountains. Prince Eugene, at the head of the German forces, protected the Electors at Frankfurt from the designs of the enemy, and Charles was unanimously chosen emperor; the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria having been excluded from voting, because they lay under the bao of the empire. The war was reduced to the number of six thousand choise men, commanded by officers of known courage and ability. He made some efforts to raise the siege; but they were rendered ineffectual by the consummation of the campaign, and by the activity of the Duke of Marlborough. Then he laid a scheme for surprising Douay, which likewise miscarried. If we consider that the English general, in the execution of his plan, was obliged to form lines, to Spain should enjoy all advantages granted by that crown to the most favoured nation; that she should be put in possession of Newfoundland and Hudson's Bay, either by purchase or cession, and that no nation should continue to enjoy whatever territories they might be possessed of in North America at the ratification of the treaties. She likewise insisted upon a security that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united in the same head. Her majesty no longer insisted upon Philip's being expelled from the throne of Spain by the arms of his own grandfather. She now perceived that the extermination of the house of Austria would be dangerous to the liberty of Europe. She was ever of the opinion that the family of Bourbon had been in the zenith of its glory. She might have remembered the excessive power, the insolence, the ambition of Charles V. and Philip II. who had enslaved so many countries, and embroiled all Europe. She was sincerely desirous of peace, from motives of humanity and compassion to her subjects and fellow-creatures; she was eagerly bent upon procuring such advantages to her people, as would enable them to discharge the heavy load of debt under which they laboured, and compensate them in some measure for the blood and treasure they had so lavishly expended in the prosecution of the war. These were all Christian princes; of an amiable and pious sovereign, who bore a part in the grievances of her subjects, and looked upon them with the eyes of maternal affection. She thought she had the better title to insist upon those advantages, as they had been already granted to her subjects in a private treaty with King Charles.

§ XXXV. As Peace's powers were limited in such a manner that he could not negotiate, Mr. Menazer, a deputy from the city of Boulogne to the board of trade, accompanied the English minister to London, with full powers to settle the preliminaries of the treaty. On his arrival in London, the queen immediately commissioned the Duke of Savoy, the Earls of Jersey, Dartmouth, Oxford, and Mr. St. John, to treat with him; and the conferences were immediately begun. After long and various disputes, they agreed upon certain preliminary articles, which, on the eighth day of October, were signed by the French minister, and by the two secretaries of state, in consequence of a written order from her majesty. Then Menazer was privately introduced to the queen at Windsor. She told him she was averse to war: that she should exert all her power to conclude a speedy peace; that she should be glad to live upon good terms with the King of France, to whom she was so nearly allied in blood: she expressed her hope that there would be a closer union after the peace between the two subjects, cemented by a perfect correspondence and friendship. The Earl of Strafford, who had been lately recalled from the Hague, where he resided as ambassador, was now sent back to Holland, with orders to communicate to the pensions the proposals of peace which France had made; to signify the queen's approbation of them, and propose a place where the plenipotentiaries should assemble. The English ministers now engaged in an intimate correspondence with the court of Versailles; and Mareschal Tallard being released from his confinement at Nottingham, was allowed to return to his own country on his parole. After the departure of Menazer, the preliminaries were communicated to Count Galis, the emperor's minister, who, in order to inflame the minds of the people, caused them to be inserted in one of the daily papers. This step was so much resented by the queen, that she sent a message, desiring he would come no more to court; but that he might leave the kingdom as soon as he should think proper. He took the hint, and retired accordingly; but the queen gave the emperor to understand, that any other minister he should appoint would be admitted by her without restraint, if it had her approbation.

§ XXXVI. The States of Holland, alarmed at the preliminaries, sent over Bussy, as envoy extraordinary, to intercede with the queen, that she would alter her resolutions: she manifested the greatest anxiety for peace, and the Earl of Strafford demanded the immediate concurrence of the States, declaring in the queen's name, that she would look upon any delay, on their part, as a refusal to comply with her propositions. Intimidated by this declaration, they agreed to open the general conferences at Utrecht on the first day of January. They granted passports to the English ministers, on condition that both nations should continue to enjoy whatever territories they might be possessed of in North America at the ratification of the treaties. She likewise insisted upon a security that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united in the same head. Her majesty no longer insisted upon Philip's being expelled from the throne of Spain by the arms of his own grandfather. She now perceived that the extermination of the house of Austria would be dangerous to the liberty of Europe. She was ever of the opinion that the family of Bourbon had been in the zenith of its glory. She might have remembered the excessive power, the insolence, the ambition of Charles V. and Philip II. who had enslaved so many countries, and embroiled all Europe. She was sincerely desirous of peace, from motives of humanity and compassion to her subjects and fellow-creatures; she was eagerly bent upon procuring such advantages to her people, as would enable them to discharge the heavy load of debt under which they laboured, and compensate them in some measure for the blood and treasure they had so lavishly expended in the prosecution of the war. These were all Christian princes; of an amiable and pious sovereign, who bore a part in the grievances of her subjects, and looked upon them with the eyes of maternal affection. She thought she had the better title to insist upon those advantages, as they had been already granted to her subjects in a private treaty with King Charles. cil of all the proposals of peace which had been made; and had not desired instructions for his conduct on that subject. He declared, upon his conscience, and in presence of the Supreme Being, before whom he expected soon to appear, that he was ever desirous of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace; and that he should not attempt to make or arrange any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. At last the question being put, Whether the Earl of Nottingham, when he speaks of the Queen to take a personal character at the bar, whether in the affirmative or in the negative by a small majority. The address was accordingly presented, and the queen, in her answer, said, she should be very sorry any one should think she would shew her contempt of the Crown in quitting the Court from the house of Bourbon. Against this advice, however, several peers protested, because there was no precedent for inserting a clause of advice in an address of thanks; and because they looked upon it as an invasion of the royal prerogative. In the address of the Commons there was no such article; and, therefore, the answer they received was warm and cordial.

§ XXXVIII. The Duke of Hamilton claiming a seat in the House of Peers, as Duke of Brandon, a title he had lately received, was opposed by the anti-courtiers, who pretended to foresee great danger to the constitution for admitting into the House a greater number of Scottish peers than the act of union allowed. Cornwall was heard upon the question. The object of the objection could be made to the Queen's prerogative in conferring honours: and that all the subjects of the United Kingdom were equally capable of receiving honour. The House of Lords had already decided the matter, in admitting the Duke of Queensberry upon his being created Duke of Devon. The debate was managed with great ability on both sides. The Scottish peers united in defence of the Duke's claim; and the court exerted its whole strength to support the patent. Nevertheless, the question being put, Whether Scottish peers, created peers of Great Britain since the union, had a right to sit in that House; it was carried in the negative by a majority of five voices; though not without a protest signed by the Lords in the opposition. The Scottish peers were so incensed at this decision, that they drew up a representation to the queen, complaining of it as an infringement of the union, and a mark of disgrace put upon the whole people of Scotland. The bill against occasional conformity was revived by the Earl of Nottingham, in more moderate terms than those that had been formerly rejected; and it passed both Houses by one paragraph, in which the author allowed he had been once fortunate, the prince observed it was the greatest commendation that could be bestowed upon him, as it implied that all his other successes were owing in his courage and conduct. While the nobility concurred with each other in demonstrations of respect for this noble stranger; while he was adored by the wisps, and admired by the people, who gazed at him in crowds when he appeared in public; even in the midst of all these caresses, party riots were excited to insult his person, and some scandalous reflections upon his mother were inserted in one of the public papers. The queen treated him with distinguished marks of regard; and, on her birth-day, presented him with a sword worth five thousand pounds. Nevertheless, she looked upon him as a patron and friend of that turbulent faction to which she owed so much disquiet. She knew he had been pressed to come over by the whig noblemen, who hoped his presence would in¬ fluence the people to some desperate attempt upon the new ministry: she was not ignorant that he held private conferences with the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lords Somers, Halifax, and all the chiefs of that party; and that he entered into a close connexation with the Baron de Botham, the Hanoverian envoy, who had been very active in fomenting the disturbances of the people.

of Warwiek; Sir Thomas Trevor, Baron Trevor, of Pembroke, in the county of Pembroke; Sir Thomas King, Baron King of Ayr, in the county of Ayr; Lord Lister, Baron Lister of Bethune, in the county of York; Lord Talbot, Baron Talbot of Malahide, in the county of Dublin; Lord Blount, Baron Blount of Chandos, in the county of Middlesex; Lord Loughborough, Baron Loughborough of Kinloss, in the county of Elgin; Lord Bute, Baron Bute of Whitland, in the county of Glamorgan. Sir Thomas Williams, Baron Williams of Warfield, in the county of Berkshire.
§ XLI. Her majesty, who had been for some time afflicted with the gout, sent a message to both Houses, on the seventeenth day of January, signifying that the plenipotentiaries, who had been so long detained, had arrived at Utrecht, and that she would employ in making preparations for an early campaign: she hoped, therefore, that the Commons would proceed in giving the necessary despatch to the supplies. The lord treasurer, in order to delay the attachment to the protestant succession, brought in a bill which had been proposed by the Duke of Devonshire, giving precedence to the whole electoral family, as children and nephews to the crown; and, when it was passed into an act, he sent it to the crown by Mr. Lord Chamberlayne. Much notice was taken of the proceedings for Scotland were prevailed upon, by promise of satisfaction, to resume their seats in the upper House, from which they had abjured themselves since the decision against the patent of the Duke of Hamilton; but whatever pecuniary recompense they might have obtained from the court, on which they were mainly dependent, they received no satisfaction from the parliament. The Commons, finding Mr. Walpole very troublesome in their House, by his talents, activity, and zealous attachment to the king's interest, found means to discover some clandestine practices in which he was concerned as secretary at war, with regard to the foreign contract in Scotland. The evidence was not less than afraid it should be discovered by a person whom he had recommended for that purpose, chose to present his friends with five hundreds pounds. Their bill was addressed to Mr. Walpole, who indorsed it, and his friends, at large. The whole article of prosecution was interpreted into a bribe. Mr. Walpole was voted guilty of corruption, imprisoned in the Tower, and expelled the House. Being afterwards re-chosen by the same borough of Leeds-Helig, in which he had before represented, a petition was lodged against him, and the Commons voted him incapable of being elected a member to serve in the present parliament.

They disliked the most injudicious reports against Oxford and Secretary St. John. Buys, their envoy at London, acted the part of an incendiary, in suggesting violent and seditious sentences, as well as to the government. The ministers, by way of reprisal, influenced the House of Commons to pass some acrimonious resolutions against the States-general. They alleged that the States had been engaged in a war against the States by Lord Townshend, after the conferences at Gerschymen. By this agreement, England guaranteed a barrier in the Netherlands to the Dutch, and the States bound themselves to maintain, with their whole force, the queen's title and the protestant succession. The tone affirmed that England was disgraced by engaging any other State to defend a succession which the nation might see cause to alter; that by this treaty, the States were authorized to interpose in British councils: that, being possessed of all those strong towns, they might exclude the English from trading to them, and interfere with the manufactures of Great Britain. The House of Commons was satisfied, The House of Commons were destroyed. The House of Commons were destroyed. The House of Commons were destroyed. The House of Commons were destroyed. They advised it being ratified was enemies to the queen and kingdom. All their votes were digested into a long representation presented to the queen, in which they averred that England, during the war, had been overcharged nineteen millions; a circumstance that implied mismanagement or fraud in the old ministry. The States, alarmed at these resolutions, wrote a respectful letter to the queen, expressing the necessity of a bargain, for the mutual security of England and the United Provinces. This letter afterwards drew up a large memorial in vindication of their proceedings during the war; and it was published in one of the English papers. The Commons immediately voted it a false, scandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting upon the resolutions of the House; and the printer and publisher were taken into custody, as guilty of a breach of privilege.

§ XLI. They now repealed the naturalization act. They passed a bill granting a toleration to the episcopal clergy in Scotland, without paying the least regard to a representation from the general assembly to the House of Lords, desiring it to be granted. This presbyterian government was an essential and fundamental condition of the treaty of union. The House, notwithstanding this remonstrance, proceeded with the bill, and inserted a clause prohibiting civil magistrates from executing the sentences of the Kirk-judges. The episcopal as well as the presbyterian clergy, were required to take the oaths of abjuration, that they might be upon an equal footing in case of disobedience; for the Commons well knew that this condition would be rejected by both from very different motives. In order to exasperate the presbyterians with further provocations, another act was passed for discontinuing the courts of judicature, during the Christian year, which had received the glory which this bill was to have taken up for itself. When this bill was read for the third time, Sir David Dalrymple said, "Since the House is resolved to make no toleration on the body of this bill, I acquiesce; and only desire it may be mutilated. A bill for establishing Jacobinism and immorality." The charter of the Scottish presbyterians was completed by a third bill, restoring the right of patronage, which had been taken from the pleasure of this House, and that Mr. Speaker do move his warrant as usual.

b The commoners appointed for taking, stating, and examining the public accounts, having made their report naming the conduct of Mr. Walpole as much long detaining, came to the following resolution, viz.: 1. That the right Walpole, Esq., a member of this House, in receiving the money granted from the Crown, for the purpose of furnishing the army with bread, is charged with no account on account of two contracts for forage of her majesty's troops quartered for the foreign army, by which was given to the said house of Commons, in a letter from the war, pursuant to power granted to him by the late king: an act, of a high and we presume, is a great deliverance to the House, as the character of Robert Walpole being in the first instance, to be for the said offence committed prisoner to the Tower of London, during away when the discipline of the kirk was last established. Prince Eugene having presented a memorial to the queen, touching the conduct of the emperor during the war, and complained of the neglect to which his requests for supplies were at length, the queen communicated the scheme to the House of Commons, who treated it with the most contemptuous neglect. The prince, finding all his efforts ineffectual, retired to the continent, as much as his present situation and the state of the ministry would admit, and was satisfied with the people of England. The Commons having settled the funds for the supplies of the year, amounting to six millions, the treasurer formed the plan of a bill appointing commissioners to consider the various grants made since the revolution. His design was to make a general assessment; but as the interest of so many noblemen was concerned, the bill met with a very warm opposition. Mr. Warton, who had so long passed, had not the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Strafford abstained themselves from the House during the debate.

§ I. In the month of January the conferences for peace began at Utrecht. The Earl of Jersey would have been appointed the plenipotentiary for England, but he dyed after the correspondence with the court of France was established, the queen conferred that charge upon Robinson, Bishop of Bristol, lord privy-seal, and the Earl of Strafford. The chief of the Dutch deputies named for the congress were Buys and Vanderveldes; the latter was entrusted with his powers to the Marchioness D’Uxelles, the Abbot (afterwards Cardinal) de Polignac, and Menger, who had been in England. The ministers of the emperor and Savoy likewise assisted at the conferences, to which the empire and the other allies were sent their plenipotentiaries. The conferences seemed calculated rather to retard than accelerate a pacification. The queen had so long been engaged and involved against these difficulties. Her great end was to free her subjects from the miseries attending an unprofitable war, and to restore peace to Europe; and this aim she was resolved to accomplish at spite of all opposition. She had striven to procure reasonable moderation for her allies, without, however, continuing to lavish the blood and treasure of her people in supporting their extravagant demands. The emperor obstinately insisted upon his claim to the whole Spanish monarchy, refusing to give up the last title of his pretensions; and the Dutch adhered to the pretensions of Sophia, which the queen communicated to the House of Commons, who treated it with the most contemptuous neglect. The prince, finding all his efforts ineffectual, retired to the continent, as much as his present situation and the state of the ministry would admit, and was satisfied with the people of England. The Commons having settled the funds for the supplies of the year, amounting to six millions, the treasurer formed the plan of a bill appointing commissioners to consider the various grants made since the revolution. His design was to make a general assessment; but as the interest of so many noblemen was concerned, the bill met with a very warm opposition. after the death of his wife, Mary Adelphile of Savoy. The parents were soon followed to the grave by their eldest offspring, the Prince of Beaujolais, in the month of March, at the age of 10; so that the Duke of Burgundy's children none remained alive but the Duke of Alençon, the late French king, who was at that time a sickly infant. Such a series of calamities could not fail of being extremely shocking to Lewis and his queen; but they were still more French to the Queen of England, who saw that nothing but the precarious life of an unhealthy child divided the two monarchies of France and Spain, the union of which she reckoned the only possible means to prevent. She therefore sent the Abbé Gualtier to Paris, with a memorial, representing the danger to which the liberty of Europe would be exposed, should Philip ascend the throne of France; and demanding, that his title should be transferred to his brother, the Duke of Berry, in consequence of his pure, simple, and voluntary renunciation.

§ IV. Meanwhile the French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht were prevailed upon to deliver their proposals in writing under the name of specific offers, which the allies received with indignation. They were treated in England with universal scorn. Lord Halifax, in the House of Peers, termed them trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majesty and her allies. An address was presented to the queen, in which they expressed their resentment against the insolence of France, and promised to assist her with all their power in prosecuting the war, until a safe and honorably peace should be obtained. The plenipotentiaries of the allies were not less extravagant in their specific demands than the French had been arrogant in their offers. In a word, the empress seemed to have been assembled at Utrecht, rather to start new difficulties, and widen the breaches between her enemies, and concert a plan of pacification. They amused one another with fruitless conferences, while the Queen of Great Britain endeavoured to engage the States-general in her measures, the Duke of Marlborough and the French plenipotentiaries exerted themselves to divide the allies, and give law to the rest of the allies. She departed from some of her own pretentions, in order to gratify them with the possession of some towns in Flanders. She consented to their being admitted into participation of some advantages in commerce; and ordered the English ministers at the congress to tell them, that she would take her measures according to the return they should make on this occasion. Finding them still obstinate in attacking to their first chimerical preliminaries, she gave them to understand, that all her offers for adjusting the differences were founded upon the express condition, That they should come into her measures, and co-operate with her openly and sincerely; but they replied, they had no such land to receive it, and return towards them, that she looked upon herself as released from all engagements. The ministers of the allies had insisted upon a written answer to their specific demands, which the French plenipotentiaries desired, until they should receive fresh instructions from their master. Such was the pretense for suspending the conferences; but the real bar to a final agreement between England and France, was the delay of Philip's renunciation, which at length, however, arrived, and produced a cessation of arms.

§ V. In the meantime the Duke of Ormond, who was now invested with the supreme command of the British forces, received in particular order, that he should not hazard an engagement. Louis had already undertaken for the compliance of his grandson. Reflecting on his own great age, he was shocked at the prospect of leaving his kingdom involved in a pernicious war during a minority, and determined to procure a peace at all events. The queen, knowing his motives, could not help believing his procrastinations, and resolved to avoid a battle, the issue of which might have considerably altered the situation of the affairs, and consequently retarded the conclusion of the treaty. Preparations had been made for an early campaign. In the beginning of March, the Earl of Albemarle, had assembled a body of thirty-six battalions, marched towards Arras, which he reduced to a heap of ashes by a most terrible cannonading and bombardment. In May, the Duke of Ormond conferred with the deputies of the States-general at the Hague, and assured them that he had orders to act vigorously in the prosecution of the war. He joined Prince Eugene at Tournay; and, on the twenty-first of May, the Duke of Marlborough, the Duke of Schelde, encamped at Haspe and Solemunes. The imperial general proposed that they should attack the French army under Villars; but by this time the duke was restrained from hazarding a siege or battle, a circumstance known to the imperial commander, who therefore abated of his usual vigilance. It could not be long concealed from Prince Eugene and the deputies, who forthwith despatched an express to their principals on this subject, and afterwards presented a long memorial to the duke, representing the injury which the grand alliance would sustain from his obstinacy of such an order. He seemed to be extremely uneasy at his situation; and in a letter to Secretary St. John, expressed a desire that the queen would permit him to return to England.

§ VI. Prince Eugene, notwithstanding the queen's order, which Ormond had not yet formally declared, invested the town of Quessoy, and the duke furnished towards this enterprise seven battalions and nine squadrons of the foreign troops maintained by Great Britain. The Dutch deputies at Utrecht expostulating with the Bishop of Bristol upon the duke's refusing to act against the enemy, that prince, that declared to him, that he could not express, with a letter from her majesty, in which she complained, that as the States-general had not properly answered her advances, they ought not to be surprised, if she thought fit to begin a fresh negociation in order to obtain a peace for her own convenience. When they remonstrated against such conduct as contradictory to all the alliances subsisting between the queen and the States-general, the bishop declared his instructors further to possess the confidence of his new sovereign, and that he was intent on obtaining a peace for his majesty, she thought herself disengaged from all alliances and engagements with their high magnitudes. The States and the ministers of the allies were instantly in correspondence to agree upon moderate terms, which would satisfy the Elector of Hanover, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and some other princes of the empire, concerning the troops belonging to those powers in the pay of Great Britain. The States-general wrote a long letter to the queen, and ordered their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. Count Zinzendorf, the emperor's plenipotentiary, despatched expresses to his master, to Prince Eugene, and to the imperial ambassadors for the Dutch. The latter held a council at Kensington upon the subject of the letter; and a fresh order was sent to the Duke of Ormond, directing him to conciliate with the general of the allies in a siege.

§ VII. On the twenty-eighth day of May, Lord Halifax, in the name of all her representatives, concluded an armistice of the duke's refusing to co-operate with Prince Eugene, and moved for an address, desiring her majesty would order the general to act offensively, in concert with the Dutch allies. The imperial general urged his excellency to make a battle on the eve of a peace, especially considering they had to do with an enemy so apt to break his word. The Earl of Wharton replied, this was a strong reason for keeping no measures with such an enemy. When Orford declared, that the Duke of Ormond had received orders to join the allies in a siege, the Duke of Marlborough affirmed it was impossible to carry on a siege without either hazarding a battle, in case the enemy should attempt to relieve the place, or shamefully abandon the enterprise. The Duke of Argyle having declared his opinion, that since the time of Julius Cæsar there had not been a greater general than Prince Eugene of Savoy, observed, that, considering the different interests of the house of Austria and of Great Britain, it might not consist with prudence to trust him with the management of the war, because a battle won or lost might entirely break off a negociation, the conclusion of which, in all probability was being concluded. He added, that two years before, the confederates might have taken Arras and Cambrai, instead of amusing themselves with the insignificant conquests of airy, Bethune, and St. Venant. The Duke of Devonshire said he was, by proximity of blood, more concerned than any other in the reputation of the Duke of Ormond: and, therefore, could not help expressing his surprise, that any one would dare to make a noblesman of the first rank, and of so distinguished a character, the instrument of such proceedings. Earl Pulteney answered, that nobody could doubt the Duke of Ormond's courage; but he was not like a certain general, who led troops to the slaughter, to cause a great number of officers to be knocked on the head, that he might fill his pockets by disposing of their commissions. The Duke of Marlborough was so deeply affected by this reflection, that he resolved to remonstrate in the House, he took the first opportunity to send Lord Mohun to the earl with a message, importing, that he should be glad to come to an explanation with his lordship about some expressions he had used in that day's debate, and that he wished to have some explanation of them afterwards. The earl understood his meaning; but could not conceal his emotion from the observation of his lady, by whose means the affair was communicated to the Earl of Dartmouth, secretary of state. Two sentinels were immediately placed at his lordship's gate: the queen, by the channel of Lord Dartmouth, desired the Duke of Marlborough would proceed no further in the quarrel; and he assured her he would punctually obey her majesty's commands. The Earl of Oxford assured the House, that a separate peace was never intended; that such a peace would be so base, so knavish, and so villanous, that every one who heard the report might answer it with their heads to the nation: but that it would appear to be a safe and glorious peace, much more to the honour and interest of the nation, than the first preliminaries insisted upon by the ministers. The earl then said, there was, after a long debate, carried in the affirmative; but twenty lords entered a protest. The Earl of Strafford, who had returned from Holland, proposed, that they should examine the negotiations of the Hague and Gertrudenberg, before they considered that of Utrecht. He observed, that in the former negotiations the French ministers had conferred only with the pensionary, who communicated no more of it to the ministers of the allies than was judged absolutely necessary to the transaction; but that the French were absolute masters of the secret. He asserted that the States-general had consented to give Naples and Sicily to King Philip; a circumstance which proved that the recovery of the Spanish dominions was looked upon as impeachable. He concluded with a motion for an address to her majesty, desiring that the papers relating to the negotiations of the Hague and Gertrudenberg should be laid before the House. This was carried without a division.

§ VIII. In the House of Commons Mr. Pulteney moved for an address, acquainting her majesty that her faithful Commons were justly alarmed at the intelligence received from Holland, that in France last day, declined acting offensively against France in concurrence with her allies; and beseeching her majesty, that he might receive speedy instructions to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour. This motion was rejected by a great majority. A certain motion having been made, that the committee appointed for the business of the Spanish negotiations had been carried on in a clandestine and treacherous manner, Mr. Secretary St. John said, he hoped it would not be accounted treachery to act for the good and advantage of Great Britain; that he glozed in the small share he had in the transaction; and whatever censure he might undergo for it, the bare satisfaction of acting in that view would be a sufficient recompence and comfort to him during the whole course of his life. The House resolved that the Commons had an entire confidence in her majesty's promise, to communicate to her parliament the terms of the peace before it should be concluded; and, that they would support the king against all such persons, either at home or abroad, as should endeavour to obstruct the pacification. The queen thanked them heartily for this resolution, as being dutiful to her, honest to their country, and very seasonable. She further, in the full confidence, that the peace would be a good peace, or to force one disadvantageous to Britain. They likewise presented an address, desiring they might have an account of the negotiations and transactions at the Hague and Gertrudenberg, and know who were the persons who had been employed in the said transactions, and the force used to obtain a good peace, or to force one disadvantageous to Britain. They likewise presented an address, desiring they might have an account of the negotiations and transactions at the Hague and Gertrudenberg, and know who were the persons who had been employed in the said transactions, and the force used to obtain a good peace, or to force one disadvantageous to Britain. She declared, that France offered to make the Blantu the barrier of the empire, to yield Brusa, Fort Kehl, and Ludau, and raise all the fortresses both on the other side of the Rhine, and in the islands of that river; that the protestant interest in Germany would be entirely confined to the fortunes of Westphalia: that the Spanish Netherlands, the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the duchy of Milan, and the places belonging to Spain on the coast of Tuscany, might be yielded to his imperial majesty; but that of Sicily was not. She declared, that the demands of the States-general with relation to commerce, and the barrier in the Low Countries, would be granted with a few exceptions, which might be compensated by other expedients; that no great progress had yet been made upon the pre-HAMPDEN moved for an address to her majesty, that she would give particular instructions to her plenipotentiaries, that in the conclusion of the treaty of peace, the several powers in the council and council chamber, and that which France now offered, was very considerable: that the elector palatine should maintain his present rank among the electors; and that France would acknowledge the electoral dignity in the house of Hanover. Such were the conditions the queen hoped would make some amends to her subjects, for the great and unequal burthen they had borne during the whole course of the war, carried with acting no doubts that they were fully persuaded, that nothing would be neglected on her part, in the progress of this negociation, to bring the peace to a happy and speedy issue; and she expressed her dependence upon the entire confidence and cheerful concurrence of her parliament.

§ XI. An address of thanks and approbation was immediately voted, drawn up, and presented to the queen by the Commons in a body. When the House of Lords took the speech into consideration, the Duke of Marlborough assented, that the measures pursued for a year past were directly contrary to her majesty's engagements with the allies: that they sufficed the triumphs and glories of her reign, and rendered the English nation famous all nations. The Earl of Strafford said, that some of the allies would not have shown such backwardness to a peace, had they not been persuaded and encouraged to carry on the war by a member of that illustrous assembly, who had entered into secret correspondence with them, and fed them with hopes that they would be supported by a strong party in England. In answer to this retribution against Marlborough, Lord Cowper observed, that it could never be suggested as a crime in the meanest subject, much less in any member of that august assembly, to hold correspondence with the allies of the nation; such allies, especially, whose interest her majesty had declared to be involved in her own, in her speech at the opening of the session; whereas it would be a hard matter to justify and reconcile either with our laws, or with the laws of honour and justice, the conduct of some persons, in treating clandestinely with the common enemy, without the participation of the allies. This was a frivolous argument. A correspondence with any persons whatsoever becomes criminal, when it tends to form the divisions of one's country, and arm the people against their sovereign. If England had it not in her power, without infringing the laws of justice and honour, to withdraw herself from a confederry which she could no longer support, and treat for peace on her own bottom, then was she not an associate but a party to the alliance. The French, it was affirmed, that the trade of Spain was such a trade as deserved no consideration; and that it would continually diminish, until it should be entirely engrossed by the French merchants. Notwithstanding these remonstrances against the plan of peace, the majesty agreed to an address, in which they thanked the queen for her extraordinary cendescension in communicating those conditions to her parliament; and expressed an entire satisfaction with her conduct. A motion was made for a clause in the address, desiring her majesty would take such measures, in concert with her allies, as might induce them to join with her in a mutual guarantee. A debate ensued, the question was put, and the clause rejected. Several noblemen presented a protest, which was expunged from the journals of the House by the decision of the majority.

§ XII. In the House of Commons, a complaint was exhibited against Bishop Fleetwood, who, in a preface to four sermons which he had published, took occasion to extol the last ministry, at the expense of the present administration. This piece was voted malicious and factious, tending to create discord and sedition among her majesty's subjects, and likely to be prejudicial to the common hangman. They presented an address to the queen, assuring her of the just sense they had of the indignity offered to her, by printing and publishing a letter from the bishop, in which he had grossly misrepresented her majesty, and that such recent insults as to give no answer for the future to any letters or memorial that should be thus ushered into the world as inflammatory appeals to the public. Mr.
§ XIV. The Bishop of Bristol imported to the other plebiscitaries at Utrecht the concessions which France would make to the allies; and proposed a suspension of arms for two months, that they might treat in a friendly manner. But this was not agreeable to the Confederates. To this proposal they made no other answer, but that they had no instructions on the subject. Count Zinzendorf, the first imperial plebiscitarius, presented a memorial to the States-General, explaining and defending the common cause against the cessation of arms; and exhorting them to persevere in their generous and vigorous resolutions. He proposed a renewal of the alliance for recovering the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria, and a certain French territory. The States-General bad authorized Prince Eugene, in order to dazzle the confederates with some bold enterprise, detached Major-General Grovezstein, with fifteen hundred cavalry, to penetrate into the heart of France. This officer, about the middle of June, advanced into Champagne, passed the Nore, the Maase, the Moeller, and the Sair, and retired to Trabach with a rich booty, and a great number of hostages, after having executed contributions as far as the gates of Metz, ravaged the country, and reduced a great number of villages and towns to ashes. The consternation produced by this interruption reached the city of Paris: the King of France did not think himself safe at Versailles with his ordinary guards: all the men of war in the surrounding country assembled about the palace. Villars sent a detachment under Grovezstein, as soon as he understood his destination: but the other had gained a day's march of the French troops, and had made so considerable a force that they found the flames still burning in the villages he had destroyed. By way of retaliation, Major-General Pasteur, a French partisan, made an excursion beyond the spoars-opi and ravaged the island of Tortola belonging to Zealand.

§ XV. The Earl of Strafford having returned to Holland, proposed a cessation of arms to the States-General, by which he was rejected. Then he proceeded to the army of the Duke of Ormond, where he arrived in a few days after the reduction of Quequoy, the garrison of which were made prisoners of war on the fourth day of July. The officers of the foreign troops had a second time refused to obey a written order of the duke; and such a spirit of amosity began to prevail between the English and allies, that it was absolutely necessary to effect a speedy separation. Prince Eugene resolved to undertake the siege of Lens: a design is said to have been formed by the German kings, and the duke, on purpose of the arrangements that were due to them; and to distress the British troops, lest they should join the French army. In the mean time a literary correspondence was maintained between them. Respect, curiosity, and a lively interest in the affairs of each other were the causes that led to these conferences. The duke was in possession of the town on the seventh day of July; the French garrison retired to Winneberg. On the sixteenth of the same month Prince Eugene marched from his camp at Hasper, and was followed by all the auxiliaries in the British pay, except a few battalions of the troops of Holsten-Gottorpe, and Walef's regiment of dragoons, belonging to the State of Lieven.

§ XVI. Landrecy was immediately invested: while the Duke of Ormond, with the English forces, removed from Chateauguay, and encamping at Avenien-le-Sec, proclaimed by sound of trumpet a cessation of arms for two months. On the same day the like armistice was declared in the French army. The Dutch were so exasperated at the secession of the English troops, that the governors would not allow the Earl of Strafford to enter Bouchain, nor the British army to pass through Douay, though in that town they had left a great quantity of stores, together with their general hospital. Prince Eugene and the Dutch deputies, understanding the wish of the English, made the Duke of Orleans a mark of their regard. At length, on the 7th of August, Bouchain began to be in peace for that city, and sent Count Nassau Woodemunth to him with a written apology, confounding and disavowing the conduct and commandants of Bouchain and Douay: but the English afterwards met with the same treatment at Tournay, Oudenarde, and Lisle: insults which were resented by the whole British nation. The duke, however, pursued his march, and took possession of Ghent and Bruges for the Queen of England; then he reinforced the garrison of Brussels. The English ambushes were supported by the French garrison at Dunkirk, which Prince Eugene aided. His conduct was so less agreeable to his sovereign, than mortifying to the Dutch, who never dreamed of leaving Ghent and Bruges in the hands of the English, as being so completely invested and occupied by the motions and expeditions of the British general.

§ XVII. The loss of the British forces was soon severely felt in the allied army. Villars attacked a separate body of their troops, encamped at Denaum, under the command of the Earl of Ormond. They were surprised and driven back, and seventeen battalions either killed or taken. The earl himself and all the surviving officers were made prisoners. Five hundred waggonets loaded with bread, twelve pieces of brass cannon, a large quantity of ammunition and provisions, a great number of horses, and considerable booty, fell into the hands of the enemy; this advantage they gained in sight of Prince Eugene, who advanced on the other side of the Scheldischel to sustain Albermarle: but the bridge over that river was broken down by accident; so that he was prevented from lending the least assistance. Villars immediately invested Merchines, where the principal stores of the allies were lodged. The French last day of December carried the garrison, consisting of five thousand men, were conducted prisoners to Valenciennes. He afterwards undertook the siege of Douay; an enterprise, in consequence of which they had the death of Prince Eugene and his chief deputy. The allies marched towards the French, in order to hazard an engagement. The States, however, would not run the risk; and the prince had the mortification to see Douay reduced by the enemy. Eugene could not even prevent the retaining of Quequoy and Bouchain, of which places they were in possession before the tenth day of October. The allies enjoyed no other compensation for their great losses, but the conquest of Forcoque, which was surprised by one of their partisans.

§ XVIII. The British ministers at the congress continued to press the Dutch and other allies to join in the armistice; but they were deaf to the proposal, and concerted measures for a vigorous prosecution of the war. Then the Earl of Strafford insisted upon their admitting to the congress the plebiscitaries of King Philip: but he found them equally averse to this expedient. In the beginning of August, Secretary St John, now created Lord viscount Bolingbroke, was sent to the court of Versailles in order to remove all obstructions to the treaty between England and France. He was accompanied by Mr. Prior, and the Abbe Guatier, treated with the most distinguished marks of respect, curiosity, and a lively interest in the French king's service. He went to the Duke of Savoy and the Elector of Bavaria. He settled the time and manner of the remittance, and agreed to a suspension of arms by sea and land for four months between the crowns of France and England: this was accordingly proclaimed at Paris and London. The negotiation being finished in a few days, Bolingbrooke returned to England, and Prior remained as resident at the court of France. The States-General breathed nothing but war; the Pensionary Heinsius pronounced an oration in their assembly, represented the impossibility of concluding a peace without losing the fruits of all the blood and treasure they had expended in the war. The conferences were interrupted by a quarrel between the domestics of Menager and those of the Count de Rechteren, one of the Dutch plebiscitaries. The populace insulted the Earl of Strafford and the Marquis del Borgo, minister of the king, whose master was reported to have agreed to the armistice. These obstructions being removed, the conferences were renewed, and the British plebiscitaries exerted all their abilities, both in public and private, to engage the allies in a war for the recovery of Flanders. The conferences between the French and the English in passing to the other side of the Scheldischel, with the intention of removing all obstructions to the treaty, and of sending an address to the States-General, with a view to persuade the elector that it would be for his interest to cooperate with them in the enterprise, the resolution was already taken. * Whenever it shall please God (said he) to call me to the throne of Britain, I hope to act as becomes me for the advantage of my people; in the mean time, speak to me as to a German prince, and a prince of the empire." Nor was she more successful in her endeavours to draw over the Court of Prussia to her sentiments. In the mean time, LordINGTON was appointed ambassador to Madrid, where King Philip solemnly swore to observe the renunciation, which was approved and confirmed by the Cortes. The like renunciation of Spain was made by the Princes of France; and Philip was declared incapable of succeeding to the crown of that realm. The court of Portugal held out against the renonciations of England, and of the whole of Europe. The king in his name issued, and the queen, his regent, in her own, a declaration that the king would maintain his arms against the insurgents. (said she) So long as the king was in being, their arms were in the field. The queen ordered the seige of Campo-Major, and they found they had no longer any hope of being assisted by her Britannic majesty. The Portuguese minister at Utrecht signed the suspension of arms on the seventh day of November, and excused this step to the allies, as the pure effect of necessity. The English troops in Spain were ordered to separate from the army of Count Staremburg, and march to the neighbourhood of Barcelona, where they were to embark on board an English squadron, commanded by Sir John Jenings, and transported to Minorca.

§ XV. The campaign being at an end in the Netherlands, and the determination of Portugal for England, where the party disputes were become more violent than ever. The sighs of those who had celebrated the birthday of the king, in London, with extraordinary rejoicings. The English were only a few days in that city, and the whole city was filled with riot and uproar. A ridiculous scheme was contrived to frighten the lord treasurer with some squibs in a hand-box, which the ministers magnified into a conspiracy. The Duke of Hamilton having been appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of France, his followers were alarmed on the supposition that this nobleman favoured the pretender. Some dispute arose between the duke and Lord Mohun, on the subject of a law-suit, formerly settled for a quartet. Mohun, who had been twice tried for murder, and was counted a mean tool, as well as the hereditary party, sent a message by General Macartney to the duke, challenging him to single combat. The principals met by appointment in Hyde Park, attended by Macartney and Colinet Hamilton. They fought with such fury, that Mohun was killed upon the spot, and the duke expired before he could be conveyed to his own house. Macartney disappeared and escaped in disguise; and the colonel Hamilton declared upon oath before the privy council, that when the principals engaged, he and Macartney followed their example; that Macartney was immediately disarmed; but the colonel seeing the duke fall upon his antagonist, threw away the sword in his attendance, but with the shriek of a piece of plate in raising the duke, Macartney having taken up one of the swords, stabbed his grace over Hamilton's shoulder, and retired immediately. A proclamation was issued, promising a reward of five hundred pounds to those who should apprehend or discover Macartney, and the Duchess of Hamilton offered three hundred pounds for the same purpose. The forces exclaimed against this event as a party duel: they treated Macartney as a cowardly assassin; and affirmed that the whistle had posted others of the same stamp, all round Hyde Park, to murder the Duke of Hamilton, in case he had triumphed over his antagonist, and revenge the treachery of Macartney. The whigs on the other hand affirmed, that it was altogether a private quarrel: that Macartney was entirely innocent of the perfidy to his charge; that he afterwards submitted to a fair trial, at which Colonel Hamilton prevaricated in giving his evidence, and was convicted by the testimony of divers persons, who saw the combat at a distance. The Duke of Marlborough, hearing himself accused as the author of those party mischief, and seeing his enemies grown stronger every day, and more incomprehensible, thought proper to retire to the continent, having lost his duke. His friend Godolphin had died in September, with the general character of an able, cool, dispassionate minister, who had rendered himself necessary to four successive sovereigns, and managed the finances with equal skill and integrity. The Duke of Shrewsbury was nominated ambassador to France, in the room of the Duke of Hamilton; the Duke d'Aumont arrived at London in the same quality from the court of Versailles; and he bestowed the bare marks of respect upon the queen, to gain an audience to the Marquis de Montecelone, whom Philip had appointed one of his plenipotentiaries at the congress.

§ XV. In vain had the British ministers in Holland endeavoured to overcome the obstinacy of the States-General; but by a hint from the queen, the English, in vain did they represent, that the confederacy against France could be no longer supported with any prospect of success; that the queen's aim had been to procure reasonable terms for the treaty of peace, that the ministers' measures prevented her from obtaining such conditions as she would have a right to demand in their favour, were they unanimous in their consultations. In November, the Earl of Strafford presented a new plan of peace, in which the queen promised to move upon France's ceding to the States the city of Tournay, and some other places which they could not expect to possess, should she conclude a separate treaty. They now began to waver in their counsels. The ministers dreaded their reverse; they conceived that the allies would plainly perceive that the continuation of the war would entail upon them a burden which they could not bear, especially since the Duke of Savoy and the King of Spain were at this moment engaged in the war; and were staggered by the affair of the new barrier, so much more advantageous than that which France had proposed in the beginning of the conferences. They were influenced by another motive: namely, the apprehension of new mischief; and the desire to preserve the empire from the King of Sweden, whose affairs seemed to take a favourable turn at the Ottoman Porte, through the intercession of the French monarch. The czar and King Augustus had penetrated into Pomerania: the King of Denmark had taken part in the war, and laid Holstein under contribution; but Count Steinback, the Swedish general, defeated the Danish army in Mecklenburg, ravaged Holstein with great barbarity, and reduced the town of Altens to ashes. The grand augur threatened to declare war against the czar, on pretext that he had not performed some essential articles of the late peace; but his real motive was an inclination to support the King of Sweden. This disposition, however, was defeated by a powerful party real the Porte, who were averse to war. Charles, who still remained at Bender, was desired to return to his own kingdom, and given to understand, that the sultan would procure his safe conduct. Steinback, who brought this intimation with the most outrageous insolence; rejected the proposal; fortified his house, and resolved to defend himself to the last extremity. Being attacked by a considerable body of Turkish forces, he and his attendants fought with so much spirit, that he slew some hundreds of the assailants; but at last he was set fire in the house: so that he was obliged to surrender himself and his followers, who were generally sold for slaves. He himself was conveyed under a strong guard to Adrianople. Meanwhile the czar landed with an army in Finland, which he totally reduced. Steinback maintained himself in Tommingen until all his supplies were cut off, and then he was obliged to surrender himself and his troops prisoners of war. But this reverse was not foreseen when the Dutch dreaded a rupture between the Porte and the Muscovites, and were given to understand that the Turks would revive the troubles in Hungary. In that case, they knew the emperor would recall great part of his troops from the Netherlands, where the burthen of the war must lie upon their shoulders. After various consultations in their different assemblies, they came into the queen's councils by the treaty of Utrecht, having submitted their treaties. They were given to understand, that if they should not obtain what they desired, they themselves would be justly blamed as the authors of their own disappointment: that they had been deficient in furnishing their proportion of troops and other necessaries; and let the whole burden of the war to fall upon the queen and the States to the Netherlands: that when a cessation was just, to transfer the heads of men and states to the chimerical projects of France Eugene; that while she prosecuted the war with the utmost vigour, they had acted with coldness and indifference; but when she inclined to peace, they began to exert themselves in procuring peace with uncommon eagerness; that, nevertheless, she would not abandon their interests, and endeavour to procure for them as good conditions as their preposterous conduct would allow her to demand. Even the emperor's plenipotentiaries began to talk in most moderate terms. Zinzendorf declared that his master was very well disposed to promote a general peace, and no longer insisted on a cession of the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria. Philip's ministers, together with those of Bavaria and Cologne, were admitted to the congress; and now the plenipotentiaries of Britain acted as mediators for the rest of the allies.

[XXI. The pacification between France and England was retarried, however, by some unforeseen difficulties that arose in adjusting the commerce and the limits of the countries possessed by both nations in North America. A long dispute ensued; and the Dutch plenipotentiaries and French plenipotentiaries were in the French minister at length it was compromised, though not much to the advantage of Great Britain; and the English plenipotentiaries received an order to sign a separate treaty. The minister of Hanover's Bay, for the first time, said that they and some other plenipotentiaries were ready to sign their respective treaties on the eleventh day of April. Count Zinzendorf endeavoured to postpone this transaction until he should be furnished with fresh instructions from Vienna; and even threatened that if the States of the Dutch of Hanover's Bay and the empress would immediately withdraw his troops from the Dutch country, how vain all attempts would be to divide them. She left it entirely to the House of Commons to determine what force might be necessary for the security of trade by sea, and for guards and garrisons. 1 "Make yourselves safe (said she) and I shall be satisfied."

Next to the protection of the Divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people. I want no other guarantee." She recommended to their protection the same equity, the same respect for the persons of the men of their country, and could not be employed in time of peace. She desired they would concert proper measures for easing the foreign trade of the kingdom, for improving and perfecting the Portuguese wines; and for employing the hands of idle people. She expressed her displeasure at the scandalous and seditions labels which had been lately published. She exhorted them to consider of new laws to prevent this licentiousness, as well as for putting a stop to the impious practice of duelling. She conjured them to use their utmost endeavours to calm the apprehensions of men and states to fall the chimerical projects of France Eugene; and that groundless jealousies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by party rage, might not effect that which their foreign enemies could not accomplish. This was the language of a candid, and benevolent sovereign, who loved her subjects with a truly parental affection. The parliament considered her in that light. Each House presented her with a warm address of thanks and congratulation. Expressing, in particular, their invaluable attachment to the person and present successions of the house of Hanover. The ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed on the fifth of May, with the usual ceremonies, to the insensible joy of the nation in general. It was about this period that the Chevalier de St. George conveyed a printed remonstrance to the ministers at Utrecht, solemnly protesting against all that might be stipulated to his prepossession. The Commons, in a second address, had besought her majesty to communicate to the House in due time the treaties of peace and commerce with France; and now they were produced by Mr. Benson, chancellor of the exchequer.

[XXIV. By the treaty of peace the French king obliged himself to abandon the pretender, and acknowledge the queen's title and the protestant succession: to raise the fortifications of Dunkirk within a limited time, on condition of receiving an equivalent; to cede Newfoundland, to the Duke of Savoy, to the Trinity and Bay Islands, and to the French were left in possession of Cape Breton, and at liberty to dry their fish in Newfoundland. By the treaty of commerce a free trade was established, according to the tariff of the year one thousand six hundred and fifty-four, except in some commodities that were subject to new regulations in the year sixteen hundred and ninety-nine. It was agreed, That no other duties should be imposed on the productions of France, imported into England, than such as are paid by the respective countries; and, that commissioners shall meet at London, to adjust all matters relating to commerce; as for the tariff with Spain, it was not yet finished. It was stipulated, That the emperor should possess the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, and the Spanish Netherlands: that the Duke of Savoy should enjoy Sicily, with the title of king; that the same title, with the island of Sardinia, should be allotted to the Elector of Bavaria, as an indemnification for his losses: that the States-general should restore Lisle and its dependences: that Namur, Charleroy, Luxembourg, Ypres, and Newport should be added to the other places they already possessed in Flanders; and, that the King of the Two Sicilies should have the title of King of Orange and the other states belonging to that family in Franche Comte. The King of Portugal was satisfied: and the first day of June was fixed as the period of time to be agreed upon by the emperor for consideration.

XXV. A day being appointed by the Commons to deliberate upon the treaty of commerce, very just and weighty objections were made to the eighth and ninth articles, importing, That Great Britain and France should mutually enjoy all the privileges in trading with each other that either granted to the most favoured nation; and that no higher customs should be exacted from the commodities of France, than those that were drawn from any productions of any other people. The balance of trade having long inclined to the side of France, severe duties had been laid on all the productions and manufactures of that kingdom, so as almost to amount to a total prohibition. Some members observed, that by the treaty between England and Portugal, the duties charged upon the wines of that country were lower than those laid upon the wines of France; that should they now be reduced to such a figure, the trade of foreign wines would be found much cheaper than those of Portugal; and, as they were more agreeable to the taste of the nation in general, there would be no market for the English. The Commons observed, that in such a case, the English would lose their trade with Portugal, the most advantageous of any traffic which they now carried on; for it consumed a great quantity of their manufactures, and returned a yearly sum of six hundred thousand pounds in gold. Mr. Nathaniel Gould, formerly governor of the bank, affirmed, that as France had, since the interview, been importuned to encourage woollen manufactures, he was prepared at home several commodities which formerly they drew from England; so the English had learned to make silk stuffs, paper, and all manner of toys, formerly imported from France: by which means an infinite number of idle persons were employed, and much money was saved to the nation; but these people would now be reduced to beggary, and that money lost again to the kingdom, should French commodities of the same kind be imported, as an ordinary duty. The labour was cheaper in France than in England, consequently the British manufactures would be under-sold and ruined. He urged, that the sum of the silk manufactures would be attended with another disadvantage. Great quantities of woollen cloths were vended in Italy and Turkey, in consequence of the raw silk which the English merchants bought up in those countries; and, should the silk manufacture at home be lost, those manufactures for British commodities would fail of course. Others alleged, that if the articles of commerce had been settled before the English troops separated from those of the confederates, the French king would not have presumed to insist upon such terms, but the latter would have consented to more moderate conditions. Sir William Wyndham reflected on the late ministry, for having neglected to make an advantageous peace when it was in their power. He said that Portugal would have been the occasion for the war, and the corn of England, and be obliged to buy them at all events. After a violent debate, the House resolved, by a great majority, that a bill should be brought in to make good the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce with France. Against these articles, however, the Portuguese minister presented a memorial, declaring, that should the duties on French wines be lowered to the same level with those that were laid on the wines of Portugal, it would be prejudicial to the weavers, woollen manufactures, and other products of Great Britain. Indeed, all the trading part of the nation exclaimed against the treaty of commerce, which seems to have been concluded in a hurry, before the ministers fully understood the nature of the subject. This precipitation was owing to the fears that their endeavours after peace would miscarry, from the intrigues of the whig faction, and the obstinate opposition of the confederates.

§ XXVII. Another bill was introduced, that granted an aid of two millions in gold, in order to renew the duty on malt for another year, and extended this tax to the whole island, notwithstanding the warm remonstrances of the Scottish merchants, who represented, that their country could not bear it. They insisted upon an express article of the union, stipulating, that no duty should be laid on the malt in Scotland during the war, which they affirmed was not yet finished, inasmuch as the peace with Spain had not been proclaimed. During the adjournment of the parliament, on account of the Whitsun holidays, the Scots of both Houses, laying aside all party distinctions, met and deliberated on this subject. They deputed the Duke of Argyle, the Earl of Mar, Mr. Cockburn, and Mr. Cockburn to lay their grievances before the queen. They represented, that their countrymen bore with impatience the violation of some articles of the union; and that the imposition of a duty so burdensome, as the malt-tax would, in all probability, prompt them to declare the union dissolved. The queen, alarmed at this remonstrance, answered, that she wished they might not have cause to repent of such a precipitate resolution; but that she would endeavour to make all things easy. On the first day of June, the Earl of Findlater, in the House of Peers, represented that the Scottish nation was aggrieved in many instances; that they were deprived of a privileged trade, receiving a bounty from the English nation; and so many solid arguments advanced by the merchants who were examined on the subject, that even a great number of tory members were convinced of the bad consequence it would produce to trade, and voted against the motion on this occasion; so that the bill was rejected by a majority of nine voices. At the same time, however, the House agreed to an address, thanking her majesty for the great care she had taken of the security and honour of her kingdoms in the late depositions of laws in cases of a nature to give her good a foundation for the interest of her people in trade. They likewise besought her to appoint commissioners to treat with those of France, for adjusting such matters as should be necessary to be settled on the continent. Moreover, that the treaty might be explained and perfected for the good and welfare of her people. The queen inter-
The queen, by her remonstrances to the court of Versailles, had procured the enlargement of one hundred and thirty-six protestants from the galleys: understanding afterwards that they were not employed on that business, she made such application to the French ministry, that they too were released. Then she appointed General Ross her envoy extraordinary to the King of France.

§ XXIX. The Duke of Shrewsbury was nominated Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, assembled the parliament of that kingdom on the twenty-fifth day of November, and found the two Houses still at variance, on the opposite principles of whig and Tory. Allan Broderick being chosen Speaker of the Commons, he ordered a list to be taken in to attain the pretender and all his adherents. They prosecuted Edward Lloyd, for publishing a book entitled, "Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George," and they agreed upon an address to the queen, to remove from the chancellorship Sir Constantine Phipps, who had countenanced the tories of that kingdom. The Lords, however, resolved, that Chancellor Phipps had, in his several stations, acquitted himself with honour and integrity. The two houses of conviction presented an address to the same purpose. They likewise complained of Mr. Molyneux, for having insulted them, by saving, when they appeared in the castle of Dublin, "They that have turned the world upside down also, may be here, and in them, by the ear from the privy council. The Duke of Shrewsbury received orders to prorogue this parliament, which was divided against itself, and portended nothing but domestic broils. The queen, he obtained leave to return to England, leaving Chancellor Phipps, with the Archbishops of Armagh and Tuam, justices of the kingdom.

§ XXX. The parliament of England had been dissolved; and the elections were managed in such a manner as to retain the legislative power in the hands of the Tories; but the meeting of the new parliament was delayed, by repeated prorogations, to the tenth day of December; a delay partly owing to the queen's indisposition, and partly to the demands of Oxford and Cambridge for the Ionian Islands, which were competitors for power, and rivals in reputation for ability. The treasurer's parts were deemed the more solid, the secretary's more shining; but both ministers were aspiring and ambitious. The first was bent upon maintaining the first rank in the administration, which he had possessed since the revolution in the ministry; the other disdained to set as a subordinate to the man whom he thought he excelled in genius, and equalled in importance. They began to form separate cabals, and adopt different principles. Bolingbroke insinuated himself into the confidence of Lady Masham, to whom Oxford had given some cause of disgust. By this communication he gained ground in the good opinion of his sovereign, who, in order to the same purpose. Thus she, who had been the author of his elevation, was now used as the instrument of his disgrace. The queen was sensibly affected with these dissensions, which she interposed her advice and authority; by turns, to appease: but their mutual animosity continued to rankle under an exterior accommodation. The interest of Bolingbroke was powerfully supported by Sir Simon Harcourt, the chancellor, Sir William Wyndham, and Mr. Secretary Bromley. Oxford perceived his own influence was on the wane, and began to think of retirement. Meanwhile the Earl of Peterborough was appointed ambassador to the King of Sicily, and set out for Turin. The queen retired to Windsor, where she was very dainty of her person. The hopes of the Jacobites visibly rose: the public funds immediately fell: a great run was made upon the bank, the directors of which were overwhelmed with consternation, which was not a little increased by the report of an armament embarking in the ports of France. They sent one of their members to represent to the treasurer the danger that threatened the public credit. The queen being made acquainted with this circumstance, she demurred to this, the lord mayor of London, declaring, that now she was recovered of her late indisposition, she would return to the place of her usual residence, and open the parliament on the sixteenth day of February. This intimation she sent to her loving subjects of the city of London, to the intent that all of them, in their several stations, might discounteinance those malicious rumours, spread by evil-minded persons, to the prejudice of credit, and the imminent hazard of the public peace and tranquillity. The queen's recovery, together with the groundless imaginations that the armament was a phantom, and the pretender still in Lorraine, helped to assuage the ferment of the nation, which had been indistinctly raised by party writings. Mr. Richard Steele published a performance, entitled, "The Cruze," so defensive of the resolution and the protestant establishment, and enlarging upon the danger of a popish successor. On the other hand, the hereditary right to the crown of England was asserted in a large volume, supposed to be written with a view to pave the way to the restoration of the Pretender. One Bedford, who had been apprehended, tried, convicted, and severely punished, as the publisher of this treatise.

§ XXX. While England was harassed by these intestine commotions, the emperor, rejecting the terms of peace proposed by France, resolved to maintain the war at his own expense, with the assistance of the empire. His forces on the Rhine, commanded by Prince Eugene, were so much assisted by the French under Villars, that they could not prevent the enemy from reducing the two important fortresses of Landau and Fribourg. His imperial majesty hoped that the death of Queen Anne, or that of Louis XIV. would produce an alteration in Europe that might be of advantage to his interests. He depended upon the conduct and fortune of Prince Eugene for some lucky event in war. But finding himself disappointed in all these expectations, and absolutely unable to support the extensive campaigns, the emperor resolved to overtake the peace that was made by the Electors of Cleon and Palatine; and conferences were opened at the castle of Altrastadt, between Prince Eugene and Marschal de Villars, on the twentieth-day of November. In the beginning of February these ministers separated, without seeming to have come to any conclusion: but all the articles being settled between the two courts of Vienna and Versailles, they met again the latter end of the month: the treaty was signed on the third day of March; and orders were sent to the governors and commanders on both sides to desist from all hostilities. By this treaty, the French king yielded to the emperor Old Brasse, with all its dependences, Fribourg, the forts in the Brigau and Black Forest, together with Fort Kehl. He engaged to demolish the fortifications opposite to Huyingen, the fort of Sellinen, and all between that and Fort Louis. The town and fortress of Landau were ceded to the King of France, who acknowledged the Elector of Hanover. The Electors of Bavaria and Cologne were restored to all their dignities and domains. The emperor was put in immediate possession of the Spanish Netherlands, and the King of France, by the treaty, resolved to refrain from infringing the Guelphs. Finally, the contracting parties agreed that a congress should be opened on the first of May, at Baden in Switzerland, for terminating all differences; and Prince Eugene and Marschal de Villars were appointed their first plenipotentiaries.

§ XXXII. The ratifications of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed on the first day of March, in London, and the articles were not disagreeable to the English nation. The kingdoms of France and Spain were separated for ever. Philip acknowledged the protestant succession, and renounced the pretender. He agreed to a renewal of the treaty of navigation, and ceded to the king of France, in the year one thousand six hundred and sixty-seven. He granted an exclusive privilege to the English for furnishing the Spanish West Indies with negroes, according to the act of parliament. He ceded Gibraltar to England, as well as the island of Minorca, on condition that the Spanish inhabitants should enjoy their estates and religion. He obliged himself to grant a full pardon to the Catalonians, with all their estates, honour and privileges, and to yield the kingdom of Sicily to the Republic of Venice. The new parliament was opened by commission in February, and Sir Thomas Hamer was chosen speaker of the House of Commons. On the second day of March, the queen being carried in a sedan to the House of Lords, signified to both Houses, that she had obtained an honourable and advantageous peace for her own people, and for the greatest part of her dominions; and she declared that her independent position might prove effectual to complete the settlement of Europe. She observed, that some persons had been so malicious as to insinuate that the protestant succession, in the House of Bourbon, was brought under her government, but that those who endeavoured to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers could only mean to disturb the public tranquillity. She said, that after all she had done to secure the religion and liberties of her people, she could not for a moment endure the suggestions of those warm; and she hoped her parliament would agree with her, that attempts to weaken her authority, or to render the possession of the crown uneasy to her, could never be proper means to strengthen the protestant succession. Affectation addresses were presented by the Lords, the Commons, and the convocation; but the ill humour of party still subsisted, and was daily inflamed by new pamphlets and papers. Steele, supported by Anson and Halifax, appeared in the front of those who drew their pens in defence of whig principles; and Swift was the champion of the ministry.

§ XXXIII. The Earl of Wharton complained in the House of Lords, that a libel, entitled, "The public spirit of the whigs set forth in their generous encouragement of the author of the Crisis." It was a sarcastic performance, imputed to Lord Bolingbroke and Swift, interspersed with drivelling nonsense. He was accused by Lord Wharton of being the Duke of Argyll in particular. The lord treasurer disclaimed all knowledge of the author, and readily concurred in an order for taking into custody John Morpeth, the publisher, as well as John Barber, printer of the Gazette, from whose house the copies were brought to Morpeth. The Earl of Wharton said it highly concerned the honour of that august assembly, to find out the villain who was author of that false and scandalous libel, that justice might be done to the Scotchman. His demand that Barber and his servants might be examined; but, next day, the Earl of Mar, one of the secretaries of state, declared, that, in pursuance to her majesty's command, he had directed John Barber to be prosecuted. Notwithstanding this interposition, which was calculated to set the offenders, the lords presented an address, beseeching her majesty to issue out her royal proclamation, promising a reward to any person who should discover the author of the libel, which they conceived to be false, malicious, and insidious, highly dishonourable and scandalous to her majesty's subjects of Scotland, most injurious to her majesty, and tending to the ruin of the constitution. In compliance with their request, a warrant was issued for the removal of the persons, with an affected air of self-confidence and unconcern. A day being appointed for his trial, he acknowledged the writings, and entered into a more ecclesiastical defence. He was assisted by Mr. Addison, General Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole: and attacked by Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the attorney-general. Whatever could be urged to his favour was but little regarded by the majesty, who voted, "that the pamphlets, entitled, "The Eng." and the "Crisis," and the Duke of Argyll, Sir John Steele, Esquire, were scandalous and seditious libels; and that he should be expell'd the House of Commons.

§ XXXV. The Lords, taking into consideration the state of the nation, resolved upon addresses to the queen, desiring they might know what steps had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the Duke of Lorraine; that she would impart to them a detail of the negociations which had taken place, to that effect, which had been made in favour of the Catalans, and an account of the monies granted by parliament since the year one thousand seven hundred and ten, to carry on the war in Spain and Portugal. They afterwards agreed to other addresses, beseeching her majesty to lay before them the debts and state of the navy, the particular writs of mili subjects granted since her accession to the throne, and a list of such persons as, notwithstanding sentence of outlawry or attainder, were allowed to continue in, or to have any connexion with, other of her majesty's dominions, since the revolution.

Having voted an application to the queen in behalf of the distressed Catalans, the House adjourned itself to the last day of March. As the minds of men had been artificially irritated by false reports of a design undertaken by France in behalf of the pretender, the ambassador of that crown at the Hague disowned it in a public paper, by command of his most christian majesty. The suspicions of many people, however, had not been wholly dispelled by the arts and simulacra of the wig leaders, to be eradicated by this or any other declaration; and what served to rivet their apprehensions, was a total removal of the whigs from all the eminence and influence of that order.

They were now bestowed upon profess'd Tories, some of whom were attached at bottom to the supposed heir of blood. At a time when the queen's views were maliciously misrepresented to the Marquis of Whig and the government were actually impeded, and her servants threatened with proscription, by a powerful, turbulent, and implacable faction; no wonder that she disapprov'd the partiality of that faction from her service, and filled their places with those who were distinguished by a warm affection to the House of Stuart, and by a submissive respect for the regal authority. Those were steps which her own sagacity had suggested; and they seemed to be naturally advise as necessary for their own preservation. The whigs were all in communion, either approving, or affecting to approve, that a design was formed to secure the pretended successor to the throne of Great Britain. Their chiefs held secret consultations with Baron S-h-z, the resident from Hanover. They communicated their observations to the elector: they received his instructions: they maintained their ground; and they concerted measures for opposing all efforts that might be made against the pretender's succession upon the death of the queen, whose health was by this time so much impaired. This conduct of the whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation: but they, moreover, employed all their arts to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

A.D. 1711. Lord Wharton was now dead.

The Duke of Wharton proposed an address to the queen, that she would name the last of that illustrious house, and would naturally advise as necessary for their own preservation. The whigs were all in communion, either approving, or affecting to approve, that a design was formed to secure the pretended successor to the throne of Great Britain. Their chiefs held secret consultations with Baron S-h-z, the resident from Hanover. They communicated their observations to the elector: they received his instructions: they maintained their ground; and they concerted measures for opposing all efforts that might be made against the pretender's succession upon the death of the queen, whose health was by this time so much impaired. This conduct of the whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation: but they, moreover, employed all their arts to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

§ XXXVI. The House of Peers resounded with debates upon the Catalans, the pretender, and the danger that threatened the pretender's succession. With respect to the Catalans, they represented, that Great Britain had prevailed upon them to declare for the House of Austria, with promise of support; and that these engagements ought to have been made good. Lord Bolingbroke declared that the queen had used all her endeavours in their behalf: and that the engagements with them subsisted no longer than King Charles resided in Spain. They agreed, however, to an address, acknowledging her majesty's endeavours in favour of the Catalans, and requesting the queen to continue her interposition in their behalf. With respect to the pretended, the whig lords expressed such a spirit of persecution and execration, as would have disgraced the members of any, even the lowest, assembly of Christians. Not content with this, the House joined in the following resolution: they seemed eagerly bent upon extirpating him from the face of the earth, as if they had thought it a crime in him to be born. The Earl of Sunderland declared, from the information of the minister of Lorraine, that, notwithstanding the application of both Houses to her majesty, during the last session, concerning the pretender's being removed from Lorraine, no instances had yet been made to the Duke for that purpose. Lord Bolingbroke explained that he himself had made those instances, in the queen's name, to the Emperor, and that his Majesty was resolved to press them on England. The Earl of Wharton proposed a question: "Whether the pretender's succession was in danger under the present administration?" A warm debate ensued, in which the Archbishop of York and the Earl of Anglesey joined in the opposition to the ministry. It was pretended to be convinced and converted by the arguments used in the course of the debate. He had given his assent to thecession of arms, for which he took shame into his hand, as it was inconsistent with his conscience. He affirmed that the honour of his sovereignty, and the good of his country, were the rules of his actions; but that, without respect of persons, should he find himself imposed upon, he must pursue an evil minister from the queen's closet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the scaffold. This conversion, however, was much more owing to a full persuasion, that a ministry divided against itself could not long subsist, and that the pretender's succession was firmly secured. He therefore resolved to put a merit of withdrawing himself from the interests of a tottering administration, in whose ruin he might be involved.

The Duke of Argyll charged the ministers with maladministration, because they had refused to offer to prove that the lord treasurer had yearly remitted a sum of money to the highland clans of Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the pretender. He added, that the adhering of the highland clans to the ministry was the result of disbanding some regiments out of their turn, and removing a great number of officers, on account of their affection to the House of Hanover, were clear indications of the ministry's designs: that it was a disgrace to the nation to see men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advance to the posts of several brave officers, who, after they had often exposed their lives for their country, were now starving in prison for debt, on account of their pay being defrauded by the ministry.

They were now bestowed upon profess'd Tories, some of whom were attached at bottom to the supposed heir of blood. At a time when the queen's views were maliciously misrepresented to the Marquis of Whig and the government were actually impeded, and her servants threatened with proscription, by a powerful, turbulent, and implacable faction; no wonder that she disapprov'd the partiality of that faction from her service, and filled their places with those who were distinguished by a warm affection to the House of Stuart, and by a submissive respect for the regal authority. Those were steps which her own sagacity had suggested; and they seemed to be naturally advise as necessary for their own preservation. The whigs were all in communion, either approving, or affecting to approve, that a design was formed to secure the pretended successor to the throne of Great Britain. Their chiefs held secret consultations with Baron S-h-z, the resident from Hanover. They communicated their observations to the elector: they received his instructions: they maintained their ground; and they concerted measures for opposing all efforts that might be made against the pretender's succession upon the death of the queen, whose health was by this time so much impaired. This conduct of the whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation: but they, moreover, employed all their arts to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

§ XXXVII. Lord Halifax proposed an address to the queen, that she would name the last of the illustrious house of Whig, and that she would, in conjunction with the States-general, enter into the guarantee of the pretender's succession in the house of Hanover. The Earl of Wharton moved, that in this address her majesty should be desired to issue a proclamation, promising a reward to any person who should apprehend the pretended dead or alive. He was seconded by the Duke of Bolton; and the House agreed that an address should be presented. When it was reported by the committee, Lord North and Grey expatiated upon the barbarity of setting a price on any one's head; he proved it was an encouragement to murder and assassination: contrary to the precepts of Christianity; contrary to the laws of nature and nations; inconsistent with the dignity of such an august assembly, and with the honour of a nation famed for lenity and mercy. He was supported by Lord Trevor, who moved that the reward should be promised for apprehending and bringing the pretended pretender to justice, in case he should land, or attempt to land, in Great Britain or Ireland. The cruelty of the first clause was zealously supported and vindicated by the Lords Cowper and Halifax; and it was moved by this time that the Earl of Anglesea, who had abdicated the ministry, were brought back in their former principles, by promise of profitable employments; and the mitigation was adopted by a majority of ten voices. To this address, which was delivered by the chancellor and the whig lords only, the queen replied in these words: "My Lords, it would be a real strengthening to the succession in the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end were put to those groundless fears and jealousies which have been so unjustly and faultlessly promoted. I do not at this time see any occasion for such a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be necessary, I shall give my orders for having it issued. As to the other particulars of this address, I will give proper directions."

She was marked for another address, to issue out a proclamation against all Jesuits, popular priests, and bishops, as well as against all such as were outlawed for adhering to the late King James the Second. This person, not included in the articles of Limehouse, and who had borne arms in France and Spain, should be capable of any employment civil or military; and that no person, a natural-born subject of her majesty, should be capable of sustaining the character of a public minister from any foreign potentate. These resolutions were named at Sir Patrick, Lawless, an Irish papist, who had come to England with a credential letter from King Philip, but now thought proper to quit the kingdom.

§ XXXVIII. Then the Lords in the opposition made an attack upon the treasurer, concerning the money he had remitted to the highlanders; but Oxford silenced his opposition by adding, that in so doing he had followed the example of King William, who, after he had reduced that people, thought fit to allow yearly pensions to the heads of clans, in order to keep them quiet. His conduct was approved by the House; and Lord North and Grenvile, moved, that a day might be appointed for considering the state of the nation, with regard to the treaties of peace and commerce. The motion was seconded by the Earl of Clarendon; and the thirteenth day of April fixed for this purpose.

In the mean time, Baron Schantz demanded of the chancellor a writ for the Electoral Prince of Hanover, to sit in the House of Peers as Duke of Cambridge, intimating that his design was to reside in England. The writ was granted with reluctance; but the prince's design of coming to England was so disagreeable to the queen, that she signified her disapprobation of such a step in a letter to the Princess Sophia. She observed, that such a method of proceeding would be dangerous to the succession itself, which was not secure any other way, than as the prince who was in actual possession of the throne maintained her authority and prerogative: she said a great many people in England were sedulously disposed; so she left her highness to judge what tumults they might be able to raise, should they have a pretext to begin a commotion; she, therefore, persuaded herself that her aunt would not consent to any thing which might disturb the peace and quiet of her and her subjects. At the same time she wrote a letter to the electoral prince, complaining that he had formed such a resolution, without first knowing her sentiments on the subject; and told him, nothing could be more dangerous to the tranquillity of her dominions, to the right of succession to the Hanoverian line, or more disagreeable to her, than such conduct at this juncture. A third letter was written to the elector, his father: and the treasurer took this opportunity to assure that prince of his involuntary attachment to the family of Hanover.

§ XXXIX. The whig lords were dissatisfied with the queen's answer to their address concerning the pretender, and they moved for another address on the same subject, which was resolved upon, but never presented. They took into consideration the treaties of peace and commerce, to which the minister was bound by a rescript of the Palatine, and the house of Hanover were printed and published in England, with a view to inform the friends of that family of the reasons which prevented the Duke of Cambridge from executing the commission given to him. The queen considered this step as a personal insult, as well as an attempt to prejudice her in the opinion of her subjects; she therefore ordered the publisher to be taken into custody. At this period the Princess Sophia died, in the eighteenth year of her age, but was immediately suc-

Bolingbroke affected to set the whigs at defiance; he professed a warm zeal for the church; he soothed the queen's inclinations with the most assiduous attention. He and his confidants unmasked that the treasurer was biased in favour of the dissorters, and even that he acted as a spy for the house of Hanover. In the midst of these disputes, he had been deserted by Frederick, Duke of Cufhiau, who took his seat with the cabinet, and the queen'saabrother Jacobites, her house under the name of her brother, and her Hanover, his prince's house, and the queen's minister. They flattered themselves that the queen in secret favou-

The Commons voted an address of thanks for the proclamation; and assured her majesty, that they would cheerfully aid and support her in this her just and necessary undertaking.

§ XLI. The second day of July, the Lords took into consideration the treaty of commerce with Spain; and a great number of merchants being examined at the bar of the House, declared that unless the explanation of the third, fifth, and eighth articles, as made at Madrid after the treaty was signed, were rescinded, they could not carry on their commerce without losing five-and-twenty per cent of the profits. The House agreed that the queen should dress the queen for all the papers relating to the negotiation of the treaty of commerce with Spain, with the name of the person who advised her majesty to that treaty.

The queen was immediately supplied with a draft of the articles of the treaty which were not detrimental to the trade of her subjects, she had consented to being ratified with the treaty. The Earl of Wharton represented, that in the same short space of time the House, had no business in that House. He moved for a remonstrance, to lay before her majesty the insuperable difficulties that attended the Spanish trade on the footing of the late treaty, and the House agreed to his motion. Another member moved, that the House should insist on her majesty's naming the person who advised her to ratify the three explanatory articles. This was a blow aimed at Arthur MOORE, a man of genius, who Lord Belingbroke consulted on the subject of the treaty. He was sworn by the majority in parliament; but a general court of the South sea company resolved, upon a complaint exhibited by the South sea Artilliers, that they could not permit a director to carry on a desperate scheme, and that they were privy and encouraged the design of carrying on a clandestine trade, to the prejudice of the corporation, contrary to his oath, and in breach of the trust reposed in him; that, therefore, he should be declared incapable of being a director of, or having any employment in, this company. The queen had reserved to herself the quarter part of the assent contract, which she now gave up to the company, and received the thanks of the upper House; but she would not communicate the names of those who advised her to ratify the explanatory articles. On the ninth day of July she thought proper to put an end to the session, with a speech on the usual subjects. After having assured them, that her chief concern was to preserve the Protestant religion, the liberty of her subjects, and to secure the tranquility of her kingdoms, she concluded in these words: but I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be obtained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts, unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions among you, be laid aside; and unless you show the same regard for my just prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have already expressed for the rights of my people.

§ XLI. After the peace had thus received the sanction of the parliament, the ministers, being no longer restrained by the tie of common danger, gave a loose to their mutual animosity, and a licence to a levity which was a detail of the public transactions; in the course of which he endeavoured to justify his own conduct, and expose the turbulent and ambitious spirit of his rival. On the other hand, Bolingbroke charged the treasurer with having invited the Duke of Marlborough to return from his voluntary exile, and maintained a private correspondence with the house of Hanover. The Duke of Shrewsbury likewise complained of his having presumed to send orders to him in Ireland, without the privity of her majesty and the council. In all probability his greatest crime was his having given umbrage to the favourite, Lady Masham. Certain it is, on the twenty-seventh day of July, a very acrimonious dialogue passed between that lady, the chancellor, and Oxford, in the queen's presence. The treasurer affirmed he had been wronged, and abused by lies and misrepresentations, but he threatened vengeance, declaring he would leave some people as low as he had found them when they first attacked his notice. In the mean time he was removed from his employment; and Bolingbroke seemed to triumph in the victory he had obtained. He had laid his account with being admitted as chief minister, to all but the aspect of being; and it is said to have formed a design of a coalition with the Duke of Marlborough, who at this very time embarked at Ostend for England. Probably Oxford had tried to play the same game, but met with a rebuff from the Duke, on account of the implacable resentment which the duchess had conceived against that minister.

§ XLI. Whatever schemes might have been formed, the fall of the treasurer was so sudden, that no plan was established for supplying the vacancy occasioned by his departure, nor can it be without pain to recollect the distress and the fatigue of attending a long cabinet council on this event, had such an effect upon the queen's spirits and constitution, that she declared she should not outlive it, and was said to have been in so parlous a situation as to be apprehensive of the men and the means of which the physicians could prescribe, the distemper gained ground so fast, that next day, which was the thirtieth of July, they despaired of the朝代 of her life. Then the divisions of the five and twenty August assembly to the sovereign, they had no business in that House. He moved for a remonstrance, to lay before her majesty the insuperable difficulties that attended the Spanish trade on the footing of the late treaty, and the House agreed to his motion. Another member moved, that the House should insist on her majesty's naming the person who advised her to ratify the three explanatory articles. in that vigour of mind by which a prince ought to preserve his independence, and avoid the tears and letters of sycophants and favourites; but whatever her weakness in this particular might have been, the virtue of her heart were never called in question. She was a pattern of conjugal affection and of filial piety. She never turned her warm embraces of an indulgent mistress, a munificent patron, a mild and merciful prince, during whose reign no subject's blood was shed for treason. She was zealously attached to the church of England; and, with other religious publictions and sermons, Published without pious, just, charitable, and compassionate. She felt a mother's kindness for her people, by whom she was universally beloved with a warmth of affection which even the prejudices of party could not abate. In a word, if she was persecuted, and ridiculed, she was singularly one of the last and most unblemished sovereigns that ever sat upon the throne of England; and well deserved the expressive though simple epithet of the good Queen Anne.

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.

A.D. 1711.

§ I. It may be necessary to remind the reader of the state of party at this important juncture. The Jacobites had been fed with hopes of seeing the succession altered by the Earl of Oxford. These hopes he had conveyed to them in a distant, undetermined, and mysterious manner, without any other than that of preventing them from taking violent measures to embarrass his administration. At least, if he actually entertained at one time any other design, he had, long before his disgrace, hid it wholly abse, probably from an apprehension of the danger which it must have been attended, and seemed bent upon making a merit of his zeal for the house of Hanover; but his conduct was so equivocal and unsteady, that he ruined himself in the opinion of his country, without requiring the confidence of the other. The friends of the pretender derived fresh hopes from the ministry of Bolingbroke. Though he had never explained himself on this subject, he was supposed to have a leaning towards that body, and he might be an implacable enemy to the whigs, who were the most zealous advocates for the pretender's succession. The Jacobites promised themselves much from his affection, but more from his resentment; and they believed the majority of the Jacobites would join them on the same maxim. All Bolingbroke's schemes of power were defeated by the promotion of the Duke of Shrewsbury to the office of treasurer; and all his hopes blasted by the death of the queen, on whose personal favour he depended. The resolute behaviour of the Dukes of Somerset and Argyll, together with the diligence and activity of a council in which the whig interest had gained the ascendency, completed the election of the Prince of Orange without a head, divided, distracted, and irresolute. Upon recollection, they saw nothing so eligible as silence, and submission to those measures which they could not oppose with any prospect of success. They had no interest to raise the succession in the house of Hanover, but the fear of seeing the whig faction once more predominate; yet they were not without hope that their new sovereign, who was reputed a prince of sagacity and experience, would cultivate the same principles of the throne, who were the landholders and proprietors of the kingdom, rather than declare himself the head of a faction which leaned for support on those who were enemies to the church and monocracy, on the bank and the funded-interest, raised upon usury, and maintained by corruption. In a word, the whigs were elated and overbearing; the Jacobites abashed and humble; the Jacobites eager, impatient, and alarmed at a juncture which, with respect to the event, was truly critical.

§ II. The queen had no sooner resigned her last breath than the privy council met, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and the Hanoverian postmaster, Kreyenberg,pronounced the three unrepresented ministers of state. The Elector of Brunswick had nominated the persons* to be added as lords justices to the seven great offices of the realm. Orders were immediately issued for proclaiming King George, in England, Scotland, and Ireland. The regency appointed the Earl of Dorset to carry to Hanover the intimation of his majesty's accession, and attend him in his journey to England. They sent the general officers in whom they could confide to their respective posts: this reinforced the garrison of the queen, of which they appointed Mr. Addison their secretary: while Bolingbroke was obliged to stand at the door of the council-chamber with his bag and papers, and underwent every species of ridicule. The death of the fourth Duke of Marlborough, King George ascended the throne of Great Britain in the fifty-fifth year of his age, without the least opposition, tumult, or sign of popular discontent: and the unprejudiced part of the nation was now fully persuaded that no design had ever been concerted by Queen Anne and her ministers in favour of the pretender. The mayor of Oxford received a letter, requiring him to proclaim the pretender. This being communicated to the vice-chancellor, a copy of it was immediately ordered to be committed to Mr. Secretary, the keeper of the parliament for the University; and the vice-chancellor offered a reward of one hundred pounds to any person who should discover the author. It was either the production of some luminary, or weak constancy to fix an odium on so venerable a body.

§ III. The parliament having assembled, pursuant to the act which regulated the succession, the lord chancellor, on the fifth day of August, made a speech to both Houses in the name of the regency. He told them, that the privy council appointed by the Elector of Brunswick had proclaimed that prince under the name of King George, as the lawful and rightful sovereign of these kingdoms; and that they had taken the necessary care to maintain the public peace. He observed, that the several branches of the public revenue were expired by the demise of her late majesty; and recommended to the Commons the making such provision, in that respect, as might be requisite to support the state and guard the public credit. He likewise expressed his hope, that they would not be wanting in any thing that might conduci to the establishing and advancing of the public credit. Both Houses immediately agreed to address, containing the warmest expressions of duty and affection to their new sovereign, who did not fail to return such answers as were very agreeable to the parliament of Great Britain. In the mean time the queen was the first to pay a visit to her majesty the same civil list which the crown had enjoyed; with additional clauses for the payment of arrears due to the troops of Hanover, which had been in the service of Great Britain; and for a reward of one hundred thousand pounds, to be paid by the treasury to any person who should apprehend the pretended in London, or attempting to land, in any part of the British dominions. Mr. Pulteney would otherwise have sent a message to Hanover if the queen died, returning on the thirteenth day of August, with letters from the king to the regency, they went to the House of Peers; then the chancellor, in another speech to both Houses, intimated his Majesty's satisfaction at the loyalty and affection which he has publicly expressed at his accession. Other addresses were voted on this occasion. The Commons finished the bill for the civil list, and one for making some alterations in an act for the granting of letters of pry secretary. Mr. Pulteney was sent to the lords justices.—Then the parliament was prorogued.

§ IV. Mr. Prior having notified the queen's death to the court of Versailles, Louis declared that he would involuntarily maintain the treaties of peace concluded at Utrecht, particularly with relation to the settlement of the British crown in the house of Hanover. The Earl of Strafford having signified the same event to the States of Holland, and the resident of Hanover having presented them with a letter, in which his master claimed the performance of their guarantee, they resolved to perform their engagements, and congratulated his electoral highness on his succession to the throne of Great Britain. They invited him to proceed to England, if he pleased, and he informed them that his interests were as dear to them as their own. The Chevalier de St. George no sooner received the news of the queen's death, than he posted to Versailles, where he was not likely to be delayed. The king published a statute by which he should quit his territories immediately; and he was accordingly obliged to return to Lorraine. By this time Mr. Murray had arrived in England from Hanover, with notice to the king that he had deferred his departure for some days. He brought orders to the regency to prepare a patent for creating the prince-royal Prince of Wales; and for removing Lord Bolingbroke from his post of secretary. The seals were taken from this minister by the Duke of Somerset, and given to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who at the same time sealed up all the doors of his office.

§ V. King George having vested the government of his German dominions in a council, headed by his brother Prince Ernest, set out with the electoral prince from Herrenhausen on the thirty-first day of August; and in five days arrived at the Hague, where he conferred with the States-General. On the sixteenth day of September he arrived at Arlberg, under escort of an English and Dutch squadron arrived there by the Earl of Berkeley; and next day arrived at the Hope. In the afternoon the yacht sailed up the river; and his majesty, with the prince, were landed at a bank at Greenwich, about six miles from London; where he left the Duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard, and the lords of the regency. From the landing-place he walked to his house in the park, accompanied by a great number of the nobility, and other persons of distinction, who had the honour to kiss his hand as they approached. When he retired to his bed-chamber, he sent for those of the nobility who had distinguished themselves by their zeal for his succession; but the Duke of Ormond, the lord chancellor, and Lord Treasurer, were not of the number. Next morning, the Earl of Oxford presented himself with an air of confidence, as if he had expected to receive some particular mark of his majesty's favour: but he had the mortification to remain a considerable time undistinguished among the crowd; and then was permitted to kiss the king's hand, without being honoured with any other notice. On the other hand, his majesty expressed uncommon regard for the Duke of Marlborough, who had lately arrived in England, as well as for all the leaders of the whig party.

§ VI. It was the misfortune of this prince, as well as a very great prejudice to the nation, that he had been misled into strong prepossessions against the Tories, who constituted such a considerable part of his subjects. They were now excluded from all share of the royal favour, which was wholly engrossed by their enemies: these early marks of aversion, which he was at no pains to conceal, alienated the minds of many from his person and government, who would otherwise have served him as loyal and zealous subjects. An instantaneous and total change was effected in all offices of honour and advantage. The Duke of Ormond was dismissed from his command, which the king restored to the Duke of Marlborough, likewise of ancient and illustrious extraction. The great seal was given to Lord Cowper; the privy seal to the Earl of Wharton; the government of Ireland to the Earl of Sunderland. The Duke of Devonshire was deprived of the lord high steward of England, and the Earls of Ormond and Somers were appointed secretaries of state; the post of secretary for Scotland was bestowed upon the Duke of Montrose. The Duke of Somerset was constituted master of the horse; the Duke of Albany, captain of the band of pensioners; and the Duke of Argyll commander in chief of the forces in Scotland. Mr. Pulteney became secretary at war; and Mr. Walpole, who had already undertaken to manage the House of Commons, was gratified with the double place of paymaster to the army and to Chelsea hospital. A new privy council was appointed, and the Earl of Nottingham declared president; but all affairs of consequence were concerted by a cabinet council, consisting of the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lords Halifax, Townshend, and Somers, and General Stanhope. The regency had already removed Sir Constantine Phipps, who was appointed chancellor; another privy council was formed; and the Duke of Ormond was named as one of the members. The treasury and admiralty were put into commission: all the governments were changed; and, in a word, the whole nation was delivered into the hands of the whigs. At the same time the prince-royal prince of Wales, and took his place in council. The king was congratulated on his accession in addresses from the two universities, and from all the cities and corporations in the kingdom. He expressed particular satisfaction at these expressions of loyalty and affection. He declared in council his firm purpose to support and maintain the churches of England and Scotland as they were by law established: an aim which he ingeniously accomplished without impairing the toleration allowed by law to protestant dissenters, and so necessary to the trade and riches of the kingdom: he, moreover, assured them he would earnestly endeavour to render protection to the several churches in their own ways, and clearly seen as in this happy nation. Before the coronation he created some new peers, and others were promoted to higher titles. On the twentieth day of October, he was crowned in Westminster with the usual solemnities, at which the Earl of Oxford and Lord Bolingbroke assisted. On that very day, the university of Oxford, in full convention, unanimously conferred the degree of doctor of civil law on Sir Constantine Phipps, with particular marks of honour and esteem. As the French king was said to protract the demolition of Dukirk, Mr. Prior received orders to present a memorial to hasten this work, and to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finished. The answer which this minister received was not so encouraging as had been expected; his majesty, however, was recalled, and the Earl of Stair appointed ambassador to the court of France, where he prosecuted this affair with uncommon vigour. About the same time General Collins was sent as plenipotentiary to Austria, to assist at the barrier treaty, negotiated there between the emperor and the States-General.

§ VII. Meanwhile, the number of the malcontents in England was considerably increased by the king's attachment to the whig faction. The clamour of the church's being in danger was revived: jealousies were excited: sediditions laboured disperse; and dangerous tumults raised in different parts of the kingdom. Birmingham, Bristol, Chichester, Norwich, and Reading were filled with con fusions. They were called "Down with the whigs! Sackverel for ever!" Many gentlemen of the whig faction were abused: magistrates in towns and jus tices in the country were reviled and insulted by the populace, and by weight of their authority and pretender to this opportunity to transmit, by the French mail, copies of a printed manifesto to the Dukes of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, Argyle, and other noblemen of the first distinction.
In this case His Majesty mentioned the intentions of the sister towards him, which were prevented by her deploorable death. He observed that his people, instead of doing him and themselves justice, had proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, contrary to the fundamental and incontest able laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of settlement could never abrogate. These papers being delivered to the secretaries of state, the king refused an audience to the Marquis de Lambert, minister from the Duke of Lorraine, on the supposition that this manifesto could not have been prepared or transmitted without the knowledge and countenance of his master. The marquis ha ing communicated this circumstance to the duke, that pretender bought his last, by placing the book in his transaction, and declared that the Chevalier de St. George came into Lorraine by the directions of the French king, whom the duke could not dissemble without exposing his terminable cessation. Notwithstanding this declaration, the marquis was given to understand that he could not be admitted to an audience until the pretender should be removed from the diminions of his master; he, therefore, quieted the kingdom without further hesitation. Religion was still mingled with all political disputes. The highchurchmen complained that impurity and heresy daily mindered ground from the conscience, or at least the supreme negligence, of the whig prelates. The lower house of convention, in the meantime, declared the following in a book published by Dr. Samuel Clarke under the title of "The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," contained assertions contrary to the catholic faith. They sent up extracts from this performance to the bishops; and the doctor wrote an answer to their objections. He was prevailed upon to write an apology, which he presented to the upper house; but apprehending it might be published separately, and misunderstood, he afterwards delivered an explanation to the Bishop of London. This was not satisfactory to the bishops; but the lower house resolved, that it was no recantation of his heretical assertions. The disputes about the Trinity increasing, the archbishop and bishops recurred to. The Duke of Marlborough was a unity in the church, the purity of the Christian faith concerning the Holy Trinity, and for maintaining the peace and quiet of the state. By these every preacher was restrained from delivering any other doctrine than what is contained in the Holy Scriptures with respect to the Trinity; and from intermeddling in any affairs of state or government. The like prohibition was extended to those who should write, baragzn, or dispute on the same subjects.

§ VIII. The parliament being dissolved, another was called by a very extraordinary proclamation, in which the king complained of the evil designs of men disaffected to him in a respectable manner. He represented his conduct and principles. He mentioned the perplexity of public affairs, the interruption of commerce, and the heavy debts of the nation. He expressed his hope that his loving subjects would send up to parliament the fittest persons to deress the present disorders, and that in the elections they would have a particular regard to such as had expressed a firm attachment to the protestant succession when it was in danger; and that no person did not agree in the pro-session was ever in danger. How then was this declaration to be interpreted? People in general construed it into a design to maintain party distinctions, and encouraging the whigs to the full exertion of their influence in the elections into a municipality of the state; and as the first flash of that vengeance which afterwards was seen to burst upon the heads of the late ministry. When the Earl of Stafford returned from Holland, all his papers were seized by an order from the secretaries office. Mr.
Prior was recalled from France, and promised to discover all he knew relating to the conduct of Oxford's administration in the elections; but, by dint of the manoeuvred interest, which prevailed in most of the corporations through the kingdom, and the countenance of the ministry, which will always be advantageously exerted to the ruin of the majority of whigs was returned both in England and Scotland.

§ IX. When this new parliament assembled on the seventeenth day of March at Westminster, Mr. Spencer at the command of the king, on the twenty-first day of the month, the king appeared in the House of Lords, and delivered to the chancellor a written speech, which was read in the presence of both Houses.
His majesty thanked his faithful and loving subjects for that zeal and firmness they had shown in defence of the protestant succession, against all the open and secret practices which had been used to defeat it. He told them that some conditions of the peace, essential to the security and trade of Great Britain, were not yet duly executed; and that the performance of the whole might be looked upon as precarious, until defensive alliances should be formed to guarantee the present treaties. He observed, that the parliament was instructed to settle the great affairs of to repair his former disappointment; that great part of the national trade was rendered impracticable; and that the public debts were surprisingly increased since the declaration of peace. He further observed, that it was understand, that the branches of the revenue formerly called for the support of the civil government, were so far encumbered and alienated, that the produce of them which remained, and had been granted to him, would fall short of what was at first designed for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown; that as it was his and their happiness to see a Prince of Wales who might in due time come to the throne, and to see him blest with many blessings, he was the viceroy of so many children; that he had offered to the nation an expense to which the nation had not been for many years accustomed; and, therefore, he did not doubt but they would think of it with that affection which he had reason to hope from his commons. He declared that unhappy divisions of parties might divert them from pursuing the common interest of their country. He declared that the established constitution in church and state should be the rule of his government; and that the happiness, prosperity, and tranquility of the people should be the chief end of his life. He concluded with expressing his confidence, that with their assistance he should accomplish the designs of those who wanted to deprive him of that blessings which he most valued, and which was an object of so much care and solicitude of his life. The Commons pretended to think that their majesty had no more interest in the success of the kingdom in foreign parts, the loss of which they hoped to converse the world by their actions was by no means to be imputed to the nation in general. The houses said this was an invincible objection; and the majority of its people was inclined to mis inflame the people; for the reputation of the kingdom had never been so high as at this very juncture. The Commons pretended astonishment to find that any conditions of the late peace should not yet be duly executed; and that care was not taken to form such alliances as might have rendered the peace not precarious. They declared their resolution to inquire into these fatal miscarriages; to truce out these misgivings; and to make the protestant succession safe. They promised to the king, and bring the authors of them to condign punishments.
These addresses were not voted without opposition. In the House of Lords, the Dukes of Buckingham and Shrewsbury, the Earl of Anglesey, the Arch Bishop of York, and several peers, as well as a number of common men, observed, that their address was injurious to the late queen's memory, and would serve only to increase those unhappy divisions that distressed the kingdom. In the lower House, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Shippen, General Ross, Sir William Whitefock, and other members, took exceptions to passages of the same nature, in the address and declaration of the House of Commons. The speech was answered by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Pittsley, and Mr. Secretary Stanhope. These gentlemen took occasion to declare, that notwithstanding the endeavours which had been used to p. t. entert a discovery of the late mismanagements, by every means in their power, the secretary’s office, yet the government had sufficient evidence left, to prove the late ministry the most corrupt that ever sat at the helm; that those matters would soon be laid before the House. The Whig oratorism did not, however, the English House of Commons vote in concert with, if not received orders from, Marischal de Villars. Lord Bolingbroke, who had hitherto appeared in public, as usual, with remarkable serenity, and spoke in the House of Lords with great freedom and confidence, thought it was now high time to consult his Boyer, Tacy. Tindal. Reid. Before to the continent, leaving a letter which was bound to be opened afterwards printed in his justification. In this paper, he declared that he had found, for having presumed to information, that a resolution was taken to pursue him to the scaffold; that if there had been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already pre-judged, he did not think the course of the parliament, should not have declined the strictest examination. He challenged the most invertebrate of his enemies to produce any one instance of criminal correspondence, or the least corruption in any part of the administration in which he was concerned. He said, if his zeal for the honour and dignity of his royal mistress, and the true interest of his country, had any where transported him to let slip a warm and unguarded expression, he hoped the most favourable interpretation would be put upon it, but affirmed, that he had served her majesty faithfully and dutifully in that especially which she had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war; and that he had always been too much an Englishman to sacrifice the interest of his country to any foreign ally whatsoever.

§ XVI. In the midst of all this violence against the late ministers, friends were not wanting to espouse their cause in the face of opposition; and even in some addresses to the king their conduct was justified. Nay, some individuals had courage enough to attack the present administration. When a motion was made in the House of Commons, to consider the king’s majesty’s declaration for calling a new parliament, Sir William Whitefock, member for Middlesex university, boldly declared it was unprecedented and unwarrantable. Being called upon to explain himself, he made an apology. Nevertheless, Sir William Wynn rang up, said, the proposition was extremely unwarrantable and inadmissible, but even of dangerous consequence to the very being of parliaments. When challenged to justify his charge, he observed, that every member was free to speak his thoughts. Some exclaimed, "The Tower! the Tower!"

A warm debate ensued: Sir William being ordered to withdraw, was accompanied by one hundred and twenty-nine members; and those who remained in the House resolved, that he should be reprimanded by the speaker. He was accordingly reprimanded, and was desired to reflect on his majesty’s proclamation, and having made an unwarrantable use of the freedom of speech granted by his majesty. Sir William said, he was not conscious of having offered any indignity to his majesty, or of having been guilty of a breach of privilege; that he acquiesced in the determination of the House; but had no thanks to give to those gentlemen who, under pretence of tenor, had subjected him to this censure.

§ XII. On the ninth day of April, General Stanhope delivered to the House of Commons fourteen volumes, consisting of all the papers relating to the late negociations of peace and commerce, as well as to the cessation of arms; nor could any thing be added that was not truly material, and of great concern to the nation. The House resolved, on the motion of the committee of twenty persons, who should digest the substance of their several papers; and report them, with their observations, to the House. One more was added to the number of this secret committee, which was chosen by ballot, and met that same evening. Mr. Robert Walpole, original chairman, being taken ill, was succeeded in that place by Mr. Stanhope. The whole number was subdivided into three committees: to each a certain number of books was assigned, and they were charged, with great eagerness and expedition. Before this measure was taken, Dr. Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Sarum, died of a pleuritic fever, in the seventy-second year of his age. Immediately after the committee had begun to act, the white party lost one of their warmest champions, by the death of the Marquis of Wharton, a nobleman possessed of happy talents for the cabinet, the senate, and the common scenes of life; talents which a life of pleasure and health had preserved in young vigour and application. The committee of the lower House taking the civil list into consideration, examined several papers relating to that revenue. The tones observed, that from the seven hundred thousand pounds, granted annually to King William, fifty thousand pounds were allotted to the late queen, when Princess of Denmark; twenty thousand pounds to the Duke of Gloucester; and twice that sum, as a dowry, to James’s queen; that near two hundred thousand pounds had been yearly derived from the revenues of the late queen’s civil list, and applied to other uses; notwithstanding which deduction, she had honoursly maintained her family, and supported the dignity of the crown of England. Further alteration passed between Lord Guernsey and one of the members, who affirmed that the late ministry had used the whigs, and, indeed, the whole nation, in such a manner, that nothing they should suffer could be deemed hard-shap. At length the House agreed that the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds clear should be granted for the civil list during his majesty’s life. A motion being made for an address against pensions, it was opposed by Mr. Walpole, and overruled by the majority. The present minister, Lord Stanhope, put in the place of the act, for regulating the land forces, with some amendments.

§ XIII. On the eighteenth day of May, Sir John Norris sailed with a strong squadron to the Baltic, in order to protect the commerce of the nation. In June, an order was that a corner of Sweden, which caused all ships trading to those parts to be seized and confiscated. That prince had rejected the treaty of neutrality concluded by the allies for the security of the empire; and considered the English and Dutch as his enemies. The ministers of England and the States-general had presented memorials to the regency of Sweden; but finding no redress, they resolved to protect their trade by force of arms. After the Swedish general, Sir Stenbock, had taken, in May, a few places, and Wellem concluded a treaty with the administration of Holstein-Gottorp, by which the towns of Stettin and Wis- mar were sequestered into the hands of the King of Prus- sia; the ambassador engaged to send them, and the towns of the Poles and Muscovites; but, as the governor of Pommerania refused to comply with this treaty, those allies marched into the province, subdued the island of Rugen, and obliged Stettin to surrenders. Then the government consented to the sequestration, and paid to the Poles and Muscovites four hundred thousand rix-dollars, to indemnify them for the expense of the siege. The King of Sweden returning from Turkey, rejected the treaty of sequestration, and insulted upon Steen’s war, which was restored, without his repaying the money. As this monarch likewise threatened to invade the electorate of Saxony, and chose his false friend; King George, for the security of his German dominions, concluded a treaty with the King of Prussia, by which the duchies of Brem- men and Verden, which had been taken from the Swedes in his absence, were made over to his British majesty, on condition that he should immediately declare war against Sweden. Accordingly, he took possession of the duchies in October; published a declaration of war against Charles in his German dominions; and detached six thou- sand Hanoverians to join the Danes and Prussians in Po- merania. The King of Sweden released the blockade of Cleon, and attacked the towns of Wismar and Stralsund, from which last place Charles was obliged to retire in a vessel to Schonen. He assembled a body of troops, with which he proposed to pass the Sound upon the ice, and attack Copenhagen: but was disappointed by a sudden thee. Nevertheless, he refused to return to Stockholm, which he had not seen for sixteen years; but remained at Carlescroon, in order to hasten his fleet for the relief of § XIV. The spirit of discontent and disaffection seemed to gain ground every day in England. Notwithstanding proclamations against riots, and orders of the justices for maintaining the peace, repeated tumults were raised by the mob which has convened in the cities of London and Westminster. Those who celebrated the anniversary of the king's birthday with the usual marks of joy and festivity, were insulted by the populace; but next day, which was the anniversary of the facts of distraction, the streets were lighted with bonfires and illuminations, and echoed with the sound of martial and tumultuous rejoicing. The people even obliged the life-guards, who patrolled through the streets, to join in the cry of "High-church and Ormonde," and in Southwark they burned the picture of King William. Thirty persons were imprisoned for being concerned in these riots. One Bourgeois a schoolmaster, who affirmed that King George had no right to the crown, was tried, and scourged through the city, with such severity, that in a few days he expired in the utmost torture. A frivolous incident served to increase the popular ferment. The shirts allowed to the first regiment of guards, commanded by the Duke of Marlborough, were of course, that the soldiers could have been persuaded to wear them. Some were thrown into the garden of the king's palace, and into that which belonged to the Duke of Marlborough. A detachment, in marching through the city, produced them to the view of the shopkeepers, who exclaimed, "These are the Hanover over shirts." The court being informed of this clamour, ordered those shirts to be burned immediately; but even this sacrifice, and an advertisement published by the Duke of Marlborough in his own vindication, did not acquit that general of suspicion that he was concerned in this mean species of peculation. A reward of fifty pounds was offered to the government to any person that would discover the agents of the Duke of Marlborough, or any interested persons who appeared to be disaffected to King George; and Mr. George Jeffreys was seized at Dublin, with a packet, directed to Dr. Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick. Several treasonable papers being found in this packet, were transmitted to England; Jeffreys was obliged to give bail for his appearance; and Swift thought proper to abscond.

§ XV. The House of Lords, to demonstrate their abhorrence of all who should engage in conspiracies against the sovereign, rejected with indignation a petition addressed to them in behalf of Blackburn, Cassilis, Bernarde, Meldrum, and Chambers, who had hitherto continued prisoners for having conspired against the life of King William. On the third day of June, Mr. Walpole, as chairman of the secret committee, declared to the House of Commons, that the report was ready; and in the meantime, that a warrant might be issued by Mr. Speaker, for apprehending several persons, particularly Mr. Matthew Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley, who, being in the House, were immediately taken into custody. Then he recited the report, ranged under these different heads: the clandestine negociation with Monsieur Menager; the extraordinary measures pursued to form the congress at Utrecht; the trifling of the French plenipotentiaries, by the contrivance of the British ministers; the negociation about the remuneration of the Spanish monarchy; the fatal suspension of arms in the possession of Ghent and Bruges, in order to distress the allies and favour the French; the Duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the French generally; the Lord Bolingbroke's journey to France, to negotiate a separate peace; Mr. Prior's and the Duke of Strafford's negociations in France, the precipitate conclusion of the peace at Utrecht. The report being read, Sir Thomas Hanmer moved, That the consideration of it should be adjourned to a certain day; and that in the meantime the expenses should be paid out of the public funds to the members: he was seconded by the tones; a debate ensued; and the motion was rejected by a great majority.

§ XVI. This point being gained, Mr. Walpole impeached Lord Brouning for the high treason. The Duke of Ormond accused of other high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Hargrave declared his opinion, that nothing mentioned in the report, in relation to Lord Bolingbroke, amounted to high treason; and General Ross expressed the same sentiment. Then Lord Orrinckley standing up, "The worthy chairman (said Lord Orrinckley) has impeached the hand, he has impeached the head: he has impeached the clerk, and I the justice; be impeached the scholar, and I the master. I impeach Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer of high treason, and other crimes and misdemeanors." Mr. Auditor Harley, the Earl's brother-in-law, made a speech to the same purpose. Sir Joseph Jekyll, a stanch whig, and member of the secret committee, expressed his doubt, whether they had sufficient matter or evidence to impeach the earl of high treason. Nevertheless, the House resolved to impeach him, without a division. When he appeared in the House of Lords next day, he found himself deserted by his brother peers, as infectious; and retired with signs of contempt, not having any expectation of the support of the committee as were justices of the peace for Middlesex. Mr. Walpole informed the House that matters of such importance appeared in Prior's examination, that he was directed to move for that member's being closely confined, from all communication. On the twenty-first day of June, Mr. Secretary Stanhope impeached James, Duke of Ormond, of high treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Whelband, the Auditor-General, commissioners of trade, spoke in favour of the duke. He expatiated on his noble birth and qualifications; he enumerated the great services performed to the crown and nation by his Grace, his brother, the Duke of Wiltshire, and in the whole course of his late conduct, he had only obeyed the queen's commands; and he affirmed that all allegations against him could not, to the rigour of the law, be construed into high treason. Mr. Hutchinson was seconded by General Lumley, who urged that the Duke of Ormond had on all occasions given signal proofs of his affection for his country, as well as of personal courage; and that he had generously expended the best part of his estate, by sacrificing a most noble man of years of useful and honourable services for the good and benefit of his country; that the death of Edward III. on which the charge of high treason against him was to be grounded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the House ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the duke, but only impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors. General Ross, Sir William Wyndham, and the speakers of that party, did not abandon the duke in this emergency; but all their arguments and eloquence were lost upon the other faction, by which they were greatly outnumbered. The question being put, was carried for the impeachment of the Duke of Ormond, who receiving every thing conducted by a furious spirit of revenge, and that he could not expect the benefit of an impartial trial, consulted his own safety. He withdrew from the kingdom. On the twenty-second day of June, the Earl of Strafford was likewise impeached by Mr. Anlaby, for having advised the fatal suspension of arms, and the seating of the Jacobite troops, as well as for having treated the most serene house of Hanover with insolence and contempt. He was also defended by his friends, but overpowered by his enemies. The House of Commons was supported not only by Sir William Wyndham and the Tories, but also by Sir Joseph Jekyll. This honest patriot said it was even his principle to do justice to every body from the highest to the lowest; and that it was the duty of every House of Commons to point out that he hoped he might pretend to have some knowledge of the laws of the kingdom; and would not scruple to declare, that, in his judgment, the charge in question did not amount to high commission, which, however, warmly, that there were several persons both in and out of the committee, who did not in the least yield to that member in point of honesty, and who were superior to him in other respects: the charge specified in the eleventh article amounted to high treason. This point being decided against the earl, and the other articles approved by the House, Lord Comyns, attended by the whig members, impeached the Earl of Oxford at the bar of the House of Lords, demanding at the same time, that he might be sequestered from parliament, and committed to safe custody. A motion was made, that the consideration of the articles might be adjourned. After a short debate the articles were read; then the toby lords moved that the judges might be consulted. The motion being rejected, another was made, that the earl should be committed to safe custody; this occasioned a considerable division of opinion as to the following purpose: That the whole charge might be reduced to the negotiations and conclusions of the peace; that the nation wanted a peace, he said, nobody would deny; that the conditions of the peace were as good as could be expected with a much more righteous and equitable disposition which some of the allies showed to come into the queen's measures; that the peace was approved by two successive parliaments; that he had no share in the affair of Tournay, which was wholly transacted by that unfortunate nobleman who has thought fit to step aside; that, for his own part, he always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late queen, without offering any ministerial advice that might be prejudicial to his own conscience, was unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man; that, if ministers of state, acting by the immediate commands of their sovereign, are afterwards to be accountable for their proceedings, it might one day or other be the case with all the members of that august assembly: that he did not doubt their lordships' out of regard to themselves, would give him an equitable hearing; and that in the prosecution of the inquiry it would be immeasurably to his inestimable honour, the even the favour of his government. "My lords, (said he,) I am now to take my leave of your lordships, and of this honourable House, perhaps for ever. I shall lay down my life in the service of my country, or continue to disserve the royal mistress. When I consider that I am to be judged by the justice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I shall acquiesce, and repute with great content; and, my lords, God will still have done. The Duke of Shrewsbury having acquainted the House that the earl was very much indisposed with the gravel, he was suffered to remain at his own house, in custody of the black rod; in his way thither he was attended by a great multitude of people, crying, "High-church, Ormond, and Oxford, for ever!" Next day he was brought to the bar; where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his answer. Though Dr. Mead declared, that if the earl should be sent to the bar, in danger of shedding his blood, he feared such violent measures would make the seer shew in the king's hands. This expression kindled the whole House into a flame. Some members cried "To the Tower!" some, "To order! The Earl of Sunderland declared, that if these words had been spoken to another place, he would have called the person that spoke them to an account; in the mean time, he moved that the noble Lord should explain himself. Anglesey, dreading the resentment of an ill-natured body of people, left the seat to apoloty; which was accepted. The Earl of Oxford was attended to the Tower by a prodigious concourse of people, who did not scruple to exclaim against his persecutors. Tumults were raised in Staffordshire, and other parts of the kingdom, against the whig party, which had depressed the friends of the church, and embroiled the nation. The king to find an answer to all the apprehensions of the reformers, desiring that the laws might be vigorously executed against the rioters. They prepared the proclamation act, decreeing, that if any persons, to the number of twelve, unlawfully assembled, and endeavored to meet together in any place to prevent the execution of the laws and their authority, they should be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy. § XVIII. When the king went to the House of Peers, on the twentieth day of July, to give the royal assent to this, and some other bills, he told both Houses that a rebellion was actually begun at home, and that the nation was threatened with an invasion from abroad. He, therefore, expected that the Commons would not leave the kingdom in a defenceless condition, but enable him to take such measures as should be necessary for the public safety. Addresses in the usual style were immediately presented by the parliament, the convocation, the common-council and lieutenancy of London, and the two universities: but that of Oxford was received in the most gay and public manner. The House of Lords met forthwith passed a bill, empowering the king to secure suspected persons, and to suspend the habeas corpus act in that time of danger. A clause was added to a money bill, offering a reward of one hundred thousand pounds to such as should seize the pretended dead or alive. Sir George Bung was sent to take the command of the fleet: General Earl repaired to his government of Portsmouth: the guards were placed on the highest alert: the House of Lords was appointed governor of Hull, in the room of Brigadier Sutton, who, together with Lord Windsor, the Generals Ross, Welb, and Stuart, were dismissed from the service. Orders were given for raising three regiments of dragoons, and eight of infantry; and the trained bands were kept in readiness to suppress tumults. In the midst of these transactions the Commons added six articles to those exhibited against the Earl of Oxford. Lord Holings bore was appointed governor of Carlisle, and Sir Thomas Walpole. Bills being brought in to summon him and the Duke of Ormond to surrender themselves by the tenth of November, or, in default thereof, to attain them of high treason, they passed the late House of Lords, and the Commons. On the last day of August, the Commons agreed to the articles against the Earl of Stratford, which being presented to the House of Lords, the earl made a speech in his own vindication. He complained that his papers had been seized in an unpremeditated manner. He said, if he had in his letters or discourse dropped any unguarded expressions against some foreign ministers while he had the honour to represent the crown of Great Britain, he hoped they would not be accounted criminal by a British House of Peers: he desired he might be allowed a competent time to answer the articles brought against him, and have duplicates of all the papers which had either been laid before the committee, or in danger of being by the government, to be used occasionally in his justification. This request was vehemently opposed by the leaders of the other parties, until the Earl of Hyde represented that, in all cases of judgments, except the acquisition, allowed the persons assigned all that was necessary for their justification; and that the House of Peers of Great Britain ought not, in this case, to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity for which they were so justly renowned throughout all Europe. This observation made an impression on the House, which resolved that the Earl should be indulged with copies of such papers as he might have occasion to use in his defence. § XIX. On the twenty-fourth of August Oxford's answer was delivered to the House of Lords, who transmitted it to the Commons. Mr. Walpole, having heard it read, said it contained little more than a repetition of what had been suggested in some pamphlets and papers which had been published in vindication of the late ministry: that it was a false and malicious libel, laying upon his head the treachery and perfidy which he had practised against all the persons necessary to the public service; that he had led her into, against her own honour, and the good of her country: that it was likewise a libel on the proceedings of the Commons, since he endeavoured to clear those persons whom he had confessed to be his tools. After a long debate, the House resolved, That the answer of Hobart Earl of Oxford should be referred to the committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment, and prepare evidence of the impeached Earl, and that the committee should prepare a replication to the answer. This was accordingly prepared, and sent up to the Lords. Then the committee reported, that Mr. Prior had greatly prevaricated on his examination, and behaved with great contempt of their authority. The Duke of Ormond and Lord Viscount Bolingbroke having omitted to surrender themselves within the time limited, the House of Lords ordered the earl-marshals to raise out of the list of peers their names and armorial bearings. Inventories were taken of their personal estates; and the duke's achievement, as knight of the Garter, was taken down from St. George's chapel at Windsor. A man of candour cannot, without an emotion of grief and indignation, reflect upon the misfortunes of the noble family of Ormond, in the person of a brave, generous, and humane nobleman, to whom no crime was imputed, but that of having obeyed the commands of his sovereign. About this period, the royal assent was given to an act for enrolling the names of such as were implicated in the Jacobite risings in Scotland. But this continued peaceable while his lord took arms in favour of the pretender, was invested with the property of the lands he rented: on the other hand, it was decreed that the lands possessed by any person guilty of high treason should revert to the superior of whom they were held, and be consolidated with the superiority; and that all entails and settlements of estates, since the first day of August, in favour of children, with a fraudulent intent to avoid the punishment of the law by the defection of high treason, should be null and void. It likewise contained a clause for summoning suspected persons to find bail for their good behaviour, on pain of being denounced rebels. By virtue of this clause all the heads of the Jacobite clans, and other suspected persons, were summoned to Edinburgh: and those who did not appear were declared rebels.

§ XX. By this time the rebellion was actually begun in Scotland. The dissensions occasioned in that country by the union had never been wholly appeased. Even since the queen's death, addresses were prepared in different parts of the kingdom against the union, which was deemed a national grievance; and the Lords of the Treasury encouraged this averse feeling. Though their hopes of dissolving that treaty were baffled by the industry and other arts of the revolutioners, who secured a majority of whigs in parliament, they did not lay aside their designs of attempting something of consequence in favour of the pretender: but maintained a correspondence with the malcontents of England, a great number of whom were driven by apprehension, hard usage, and resentment, into a system of politics which otherwise they would not have espoused. The Tories finding themselves totally excluded from any share in the government and legislature, and exposed to the insolence and fury of a faction which they despised, began to wish in earnest for a revolution. Some of them held private consultations, and communicated with the Jacobites, who conveyed their sentiments to the Chevalier de St. George, with such exaggerations as were dictated by their own eagerness and extravagance. They assured the pretender that the nation was wholly disaffected to the new government; and, indeed, the clamours, tumults, and conversation of the people in general countenanced the apprehension. They promised to come over without further delay in his favour; and engaged that the pretender should join him at his first landing in Great Britain. They, therefore, besought him to come over with all possible expedition, declaring that his appearance would produce an immediate revolution. The Jacobites availed themselves of this advantageous proposition. He had recourse to the French king, who had always been the refuge of his family. Louis favoured him in secret; and, notwithstanding his late engagements with England, cherished the ambition of making him the great leader of the nation. He supplied him privately with sums of money, to procure a small armament in the port of Havre, which was equipped in the name of Depine d'Amicaut; and without all doubt, his design was to assist him more effectually, in proportion as the Earl of Oxford might manage his attachment to the House of Stuart. The Duke of Ormond and Lord Bolingbroke, who had retired to France, finding themselves condemned unheard, and attainted, engaged in the service of the chevalier, and corresponded with the torments of England.

§ XXI. All these intrigues and machinations were discovered and communicated to the court of London by the Earl of Stair, who then resided as English ambassador at Paris. He was a nobleman of unquestioned honour and integrity, generous, humane, discerning, and resolute. He had signalized himself by his valour, intrepidity, and other military talents, during the war in the Netherlands; and he now acted in another sphere with uncommon vigour, prudence, and address. He detected the chevalier's scheme while it was yet in embryo, and gave such early notice of it as enabled the King of Great Britain to take effectual measures against the dangerous consequences of his design. The interest in France expired with Louis XIV, that ostentatious tyrant, who had for above half a century sacrificed the repose of Christendom to its insatiate vanity and ambition. At his death, which happened on the first day of September, the king of Spain lost his king, and the Duke of Orleans, who adopted a new system of politics, and had already entered into engagements with the King of Great Britain. Instead of assisting the pretender, he urged his agents with mysterious and equivocal representations, calculated to frustrate the design of the expedition. Nevertheless, the more violent part of the Jacobites in Great Britain believed he was at bottom a friend to their cause, and that he would aid them. They even extorted from him a sum of money by dint of importunities, and some arms; but the vessel was shipwrecked, and the cargo lost upon the coast of Scotland.

§ XXII. The partisans of the pretender had proceeded too far to retreat with safety; and, therefore, resolved to try their fortune in the field. The Earl of Mar repaired to the highlands, where he held consultations with the Marquises of Huntley and Tullibardine; the Earls Marischal and Southesk, and General Hawke, and the chiefs of the Jacobite clans. They then assembled three hundred of his own vessels; proclaimed the pretender at Caithness, and set up his standard at Braemar, on the sixth day of September. By this time the Earls of Home, Wigtown, and the General Hamilton, with the lords and gentlemen of Carnwath, with other persons suspected of disaffection to the present government, were committed prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh; and Major-General Whetham marched with the regular troops which were in that kingdom to secure the bridge at Stirling. Before these proceedings were taken, two vessels had arrived at Arbroath from Havre, with arms, ammunition, and a great number of officers, who assured the Earl of Mar, that the pretender would soon be with them in person. The death of Louis XIV, struck a general damp upon their spirits; but they laid their account with being joined by a powerful body in England. The Earl of Mar, by letters and messages, pressed the chevalier to come over without further delay. He, in the meantime, assumed the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, and published a declaration, exhorting the people to take arms for their lawful sovereign. This was followed by a shrewd manifesto, enumerating the Jacobite grievances, and assuring the people of redress. Some of his partisans attempted to surprise the castle of Edinburgh; but were prevented by the vigour and activity of Colonel Stuart, lieutenant-governor of that fortress. The Duke of Argyll set sail for Scotland, with a considerable number of Jacobite forces in North Britain: the Earl of Sunderland set sail in the Queensborough ship of war for the north, where he proposed to raise his vessels for the service of government; and many other Scottish peers returned to their own country, in order to signalize their loyalty to King George.
§ XXIII. In England the practices of the Jacobites did not escape the notice of the ministry. Lieutenant-Colonel Paul was imprisoned in the Gate-house for entertaining men in the service of the pretender. The titular Duke of Powis was arrested; John Paul, Lord Combe, who had been taken into custody; and a warrant was issued for apprehending the Earl of Jersey. The king desired the censure of the lower House to cease and let Sir William Wyndham, John, the Duke of Buckingham, and Mr. Harvey, forthwith, and suspected of favouring the invasion. The Commons unanimously agreed to the proposals. They told the king that the tide was rising. Harvey and Astis were immediately secured. Forster, with the assistance of some papish lords, assembled a body of men in Northumberland: Sir John Packington being examined before the council, was dismissed with want of evidence: Mr. Kynaston absconded: Sir William Wyndham was sent to his own house in Somersetshire by Colonel Iluske and a messenger, who secured his papers: he found means, however, to escape from them; but afterwards surrendered himself, and, having been examined at the council-board, was committed to the Tower. His father-in-law, the Duke of Somerset, offered to become bound for his appearance; and being rejected as a bail, examined as an accessory, and then warned, that the king thought proper to remove him from the office of master of the horse. On the twenty-first day of September, the king went to the House of Lords, and passed the bills that were ready for the royal assent. Then the council delivered to him the copy of the majesty's speech expressing his acknowledgment and satisfaction, in consequence of the uncommon marks of their affection he had received: and the parliament adjourned to the sixth day of October.

§ XXIV. The friends of the house of Stuart were very numerous in the western counties, and began to make preparations for an insurrection. They had concealed some arms and artillery at Bath, and formed a design to surprise Bristol: but they betrayed their design by the emissaries of the government; which baffled all their schemes, and apprehended every person of consequence suspected of attachment to that cause. The university of Oxford felt the rod of power on this occasion. Major-General Pepper, with a strong detachment of dragoons, took possession of the city at day-break, declaring he would use military execution on all students who should presume to appear without the limits of their respective colleges. He apprehended two persons, among whom was a mailer, a coffee-man; and made prize of some horses and furniture belonging to Colonel Owen, and other gentlemen. With this booty he retreated to Abingdon; and Handseal's regiment of foot was afterwards ordered to take the town, and appeared to the university. The ministry found it more difficult to suppress the insurgents in the northern counties. In the month of October the Earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster took the field with a body of horse, and being joined by some gentlemens from the borders of Scotland, proclaimed the pretender in Warkworth, Morpeth, and Alnwick. Their first design was to seize the town of Newcastle, in which they had many friends: but they found the gates shut upon them, and retired to Hexham; while General Carpenter, having assembled a body of dragoons, resolved to march from Newcastle, and attack them before they should be reinforced. The rebels returning northward to Woolsor, were joined by two hundred Scottish horse under Sir John Vincent Kermain, and the Earls of Carnwath and Wintoun, who had set up the pretender's standard at Moffat, and proclaimed him in different parts of Scotland. The rebels thus reinforced advanced to Kelson, having received advice that they would be joined by Mackintosh, who had crossed the Forth with a body of highlanders.

§ XXV. By this time the Earl of Mar was at the head of five thousand Highlanders, and had a pass of the Tay at Perth, where his head-quarters were established, and made himself master of the whole fruitful province of Fife, and all the sea-coast on that side of the Firth of Forth. He raised one hundred men, commanded by Brigadier Mackintosh, to make a descent upon the Lothian side, and join the Jacobites in that county, or such as should take arms on the borders of England. Boats were assembled for this purpose: and notwithstanding all the precautions that could be taken by the king's ships in the Firth, to prevent the design, above fifteen thousand men, with some considerable baggage, and their passage in the night, and landed on the coast of Lothian, having crossed an arm of the sea about sixteen miles broad, in open boats that passed through the midst of the king's cruisers, would be better conceived or executed with more conduct and courage, than was this hazardous enterprise. They amused the king's ships with marches and counter-marches along the coast, in such a manner that they could not put the boats to land where the tide was blames. The Earl of Mar, in the mean time, marched from Perth to Dumbarton, as if he had intended to cross the Firth at Stirling bridge; but his real design was to divert the Duke of Argyle from attacking his detachment which had landed in Lothian. So far the scheme succeeded. The Duke, who had assembled some troops in Lothian, returned to Stirling with the utmost expedition, after having secured Edinburgh, and obliged Mackintosh to abandon his design on that city. This partian had actually taken possession of Leith, from whence he retired to Seaton-house, near Preston-Pans, which he fortified in such a manner that he could not be forced without artillery. Here he remained, until he received intelligence from the Earl of Mar, to join Lord Kenmure and the English at Kelso, for which place he immediately began his march, and reached it on the twenty-second day of October, though a good number of his men had deserted on the marcher's approach. § XXVI. The Lord Kenmure, with the Earls of Wintoun, Nithsdale, and Carnwath, the Earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster, with the English insurgents, arriving at the same time, a council of war was immediately called. Wintoun proposed that they should march immediately into the western parts of Scotland and join General Gordon, who commanded a strong body of highlanders in Ar- range, and attacking General Carpenter, whose troops did not exceed nine hundred dragoons. Neither scheme was executed. They took the route to Jedburgh, where they resolved to leave Carpenter on one side, and penetrate into England by the western border. The highlanders declared they would not quit their own country; but were ready to execute the scheme proposed by the Earl of Wintoun. Means, however, were found to prevail upon one half of them to advance, while the rest returned to the highlands. At Brampton, Forster opened his commission of general, which had been sent to him from the Earl of Mar, and proclaimed the pretender. They continued their march to Newcastle, where they were assisted by a detachment of the Bishop of Carlisle, who had assembled the whole posse comitatus of Cumberland, amounting to twelve thousand men, who dispersed with the utmost precipitation at the approach of the rebels. From Penrith, Forster proceeded by the way of Kendal and Lancaster to Preston, from whence Stanhope's regiment of dragoons, and another of militia, immediately retired; so that he took possession of the place without resistance. General Willis marched against the enemy with five regiments of horse and dragoons, and one battalion of foot commanded by Colonel Preston. They had advanced to the bridge of Ribble before Forster received intelligence of their approach. He forthwith began to pursue the insurgents, and put the place in a posture of defense. On the twelfth day of November, the town was briskly attacked in two different places; but the king's troops met with a very warm reception, and were repulsed with considerable loss. Next day General Carpenter arrived with a reinforcement of three regiments of dragoons; and the rebels were invested on all sides. The highlanders declared they would make a sally sword in hand, and either cut their way through the king's troops, or be comprehended; but they were overpowered. Forster sent Colonel Oxburgh with a trumpet to General Willis, to propose a capitulation. He was given to understand, that the general would not treat with rebels; but in consideration of his services and valour, he presented his soldiers from putting them to the sword, until he should receive further orders. He granted them time to consider till next morning, upon their delivering the Earl of Derwentwater and Mackintosh as hostages. When Forster submitted, this highlander declared he could not promise he would surrender in that manner. The general desired him to return to his people, and he would forthwith attack the town, in which case every man of them should be cut to pieces. The Scottish noblemen did not choose to accept this; and persuaded the highlander to accept the terms that were offered. They accordingly laid down their arms, and were put under a strong guard.

All the noblemen and leaders were secured. Major Nairn, Captain Lockhart, Captain Shaffoe, and Ensign Erskine, with twenty-five horsemen, were taken, and executed. Lord Charles Murray, son of the Duke of Athol, was likewise condemned for the same crime, but reprieved. The common men were imprisoned at Chester and Liverpool, the noblemen and considerable officers were sent to London, conveyed through the streets pinioned like malefactors, and committed to the Tower and to Newgate.

§ XXVII. The day on which the rebels surrendered at Preston was remarkable for the battle of Dumbarton. fought between the Duke of Argyle and the Earl of Mar, who commanded the pretender's forces. This nobleman had retreated to his camp at Perth, where he understood the Duke was encamped from Lothian to Stirling. But being now joined by the forces of Kilmarnock, and Fladensburg, and those of the west commanded by General Gordon, who had signalized himself in the service of the Czar of Muscovy, he resolved to pass the Forth, in order to complete this army with that of the French, and then to carry it further into England. With this view he advanced to Auchterarder, where he reviewed his army, and rested on the eleventh day of November. The Duke of Argyle, apprized of his intention, and being joined by some regiments of dragoons from Ireland, determined to give him battle in the neighbourhood of Dumbarton. On the twelfth day of the month, Argyle passed the Forth at Stirling, and encamped with his army near the village of Dumbarton, and his right towards Stirling. There the Duke of Mar advanced within two miles of his camp, and remained till day-break in order of battle; his army consisting of nine thousand effective men, cavalry as well as infantry. In the morning, the duke, understanding they were in motion, drew up his forces, which did not exceed three thousand five hundred men, on the heights to the north-east of Dumbarton: but he was outflanked both on the right and left. The clans that formed part of the centre and right wing of the enemy, with Glengary and Clannmall at their head, charged the left of the king's army sword in hand, with such impetuosity, that in seven minutes and forty-five seconds they were completely slaughtered; and General Wetheram, who commanded them, fled at full gallop to Stirling, where he declared that the royal army was totally defeated. In the mean time, the Duke of Argyle, who commanded in person on the right, attacked the left of the enemy, at the head of Stan's and Evan's dragoons, and drove them two miles before him, as far as the water of Allan: yet in that space they wheeled about, and attempted to rally ten times; so that he was obliged to press them hard, that they might not recover from their confusion. Brigadier Wightman followed, in order to sustain him with three battalions of infantry; while the victorious right wing of the rebels, having pursued Wetheram a considerable distance, returned to the field, and formed in the rear of Wightman, to the amount of five thousand men. The Duke of Argyle, returning from the pursuit, joined Wightman, who had formed two lines of battle. They took possession of some enclosures and mud-walls, in expectation of being attacked. In this position both armies faced each other till the evening, when the duke drew off towards Dumbarton, and the rebels retired to Ardoch, without mutual molestation. Next day the duke marched back to Dumbarton, and the battle, curtailed by the wounded, with four pieces of cannon left by the enemy, and retreated to Stirling. Few prisoners were taken on either side: the number of the slain might be above three hundred. After the taking possession of each army, the battle was renewed. This battle was not so fatal to the highlanders as the loss of Inverness, from which Sir John Mackenzie was driven by Simon Fraser Lord Lovat, who, contrary to the principles he had hitherto professed, secured this important post for the government; by which means a free communication was opened with the north of Scotland, where the pretender's forces were crowded in a body of vassals. The Marquis of Huntly and the Earl of Seaford were obliged to quit the rebel army in order to defend their own territories: and in a little time submitted to their fate. Lord Dundas, a great nobleman of the Freeholders, declared with their chief against the pretender: the Marquis of Tullibardine withdrew from the army, to cover his own country: and the clans, seeing no likelihood of another action, began to disperse, according to custom. stretched over to Norway, and coasting along the German and Dutch shores, arrived in five days at Grevena. General Gordon, whom the pretender had left commander in chief of the forces, assisted by the Earl Marschal, procured the necessary relations to secure the provision of vessels to sail northward, and take on board the persons who intended to make their escape to the continent. Then they continued their march through Strathspey and Strathdon, till they arrived at Badenoch, where the common people were greatly dispersed. This retreat was made with such expedition, that the Duke of Argyle, with all his activity, could never overtake their rear-guard, which consisted of a thousand horse, commanded by the Earl Marschal. Such were the circumstances of the exportation to enable the noble families: a rebellion which, in all probability, would never have happened, had not the violent measures of a whig ministry kindled such a flame of discontent in the nation, as encouraged the partisans of the pretender to hazard a revolt.

§ XXX. The parliament of Ireland, which met at Dublin on the twelfth day of November, seemed even more zealous, if possible, than that of England, for the present administration. They passed bills for recognising the king's title; for the security of his person and government; for setting a price on the pretender's head; and for attainting the Duke of Ormond. They granted the supplies about six thousand pounds, for six months. All the eyes were fixed on the late queen in favour of Sir Constantine Fitzhugh, then lord chancellor of Ireland, were now brought upon their knees, and ensured as guilty of a breach of privilege. The lords, on the other hand, proclaimed a mortal war against the popish inhabitants of Limerick and Galway, who, presuming upon the capitation signed by King William, claimed an exemption from the penalties imposed upon other states. They engaged, in an association against the pretender, all his adherents. They voted the Earl of Anglesy an enemy to the king and kingdom, because he advised the queen to break the army, and prostrate the late parliament; and they addressed the king to drive him from his council and service. The lords and justices granted orders for apprehending the Earls of Antrim and Westmoreland, the Lords Netville, Caher, and Dillon, as persons suspected of disaffection to the government. Then they adjourned the two Houses.

§ XXXI. The king, in his speech to the English parliament, which met on the ninth of January, told them he had reason to believe the pretender was landed to Scotland: he congratulated them on the success of his arms in the west, and the concluding of the last and barter treaty between the emperor and the States-general, under his guarantee: on a convention with Spain that would deliver the trade of England to that kingdom from the power of France and the Dutch; and on the advantage he had secured in consequence of the late treaties. He likewise gave them to understand, that a treaty for renewing all former alliances between the crown of Great Britain and the States-general was almost concluded; and he assured the Commons he would freely give up all the estates that should become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, to be applied towards defraying the extraordinary expense incurred on this occasion. The Commons, in their address of thanks, declared that they would prosecute, in the most vigorous and impartial manner, the authors of those destructive councils which had drawn down such miseries upon the nation. Their resolutions were speedy, and exactly conformable to this declaration. They expelled Mr. Forster from the House. They forthwith impeached the Earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Carnwath, and Wintoun; Lords Widdrington, Kemmuir, and Nairn. These with him were brought before the commission of lords, heard the articles of impeachment read on the tenth day of January, and were ordered to put in their answers on the sixteenth. The impeachments being lodged, the lower House ordered a bill to be brought in for continuing the suspension of the habeas corpus act: then they prepared another to attain the Marquis of Tallbar- dine, the Earls of Mar and Linlithgow, and Lord John Drummond. On the twenty-first day of January, the king gave them a bill for suspending the commission of the giver's soldiers: the chamber of the House, being unable to grant it, the pretender's flight from Scotland. In the beginning of April, a commission for trying the rebels met in the court of common pleas, when bills of high treason were found against Mr. Forster, Mackintosh, and twenty of their commons associates. Forcibly resisting the commission, and the continent in safety: the rest pleaded not guilty, and were indulged with time to prepare for their trials. The judges, appointed to try the rebels at Liverpool, found a considerable number guilty of high treason. Two-and-twenty were convicted, and MacKenzie and MacLeod, two thousand prisoners submitted to the king's mercy, and petitioned for transportation. Pitts, the keeper of Newcastle, being suspected of having connived at Forster's escape, was tried for his life at the Old Bailey, and acquitted. Notwithstanding this prosecution, which ought to have redoubled the vigilance of the jailers, Brigadier Mackintosh, and several other prisoners, broke from Newcastle, after having mastered the keeper and turnkey, and escaped the sentence. The court pronounced that those remained; and a great number were found guilty: four or five were hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn: and among these was one William Paul, a clergymen, who, in his last speech, professed himself a true and sincere member of the church of England, but not of the revolution schismatic church, whose bishops had abandoned the king, and shamefully given up their ecclesiastical rights, by submitting to the unlawful, invalid, lay deprivations authorized by the Prince of Orange.

§ XXXIV. Though the rebellion was extinguished, the flame of national dissatisfaction still continued to rage; and the severity exercised against the rebels increased the general discontent: for now the violence of their humane passions began to prevail. The courage and fortitude with which the condemned persons encountered the pains of death in their most dreadful form, prepossessed mankind against the favor of the unhappy victims were animated. In a word, perseverance, as usual, extended the heresy. The ministry, perceiving this universal disaffection, and dreading the revolution of a new parliament, which might wrest the power from their faction, and retort upon them the violence of their own measures, formed a revolution equally odious and effectual to establish their administration. This was no other than a scheme to repeal the triennial act, and by a new law to enable every member of parliament to remain in office twenty years. On the tenth day of April, the Duke of Devonshire represented, in the House of Lords, that triennial elections served to keep up party divisions; to raise and foment feuds in private families; to produce ruinous expenses, and give occasion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign princes: that it became the wisdom of such an august assembly, to apply proper remedies to an evil that might be attended with the most dangerous consequences, especially in the present temper of the nation, as the spirit of rebellion still remained unconquered. He, therefore, proposed a bill for limiting the continuance of parliament. He was seconded by the Earls of Dorset and Rockingham, the Lord Townshend, and Lord Bute, members of that party. The motion was opposed by the Earls of Nottingham, Abingdon, and Paulet. They observed, that frequent parliaments were required by the fundamental constitution of the kingdom, ascertained in the practice of many ages; that the members of the lower House were chosen by the body of the nation, for a certain term of years, at the expiration of which they could be no longer representatives of the people, who, by the parliament's proclamation of its own authority, would be deprived of the only remedy which they have against those who, through ignorance or corruption, betrayed the trust reposed in them; that the reasons in favour of such a bill were weak and unsatisfactory; that it would tend to encourage the prince or state could reasonably depend upon a people to defend their liberties and interests, who should be thought to have given up so great a part of their own; nor would it be prudent in them to wish for a change in that constitution under which Europe had of late been so powerfully supported: on the contrary, they might be deterred from entering into any engagements with Great Britain, when informed by the preamble of the bill, that the papish faction has the power to form a new or mischiefous system to the government: they would apprehend that the administration was so weak as to want so extraordinary a provision for its safety: that the gentlemen of Britain were not to be trusted; and that the government was restrained within the limits of the House of Commons. They affirmed that this bill, far from preventing the expense of elections, would rather increase it, and encourage every species of corruption; for the value of a seat would always be in proportion to the duration of a parliament. Lord Townshend about a thousand pounds. He contended that a long parliament would yield a greater temptation, as well as a better opportunity to a vicious ministry, to corrupt the members, than they could possibly have when the parliament shall be frequent; that the same reasons urged for passing the bill would authorize a parliament for seven years would be at least as strong, and, by the conduct of the ministry, might be made much stronger before the end of that term, for continuing, and even perpetuating the system with which they were charged for the preservation of the third estate of the realm. This arguments served only to form a decent debate, after which the bill for septennial parliaments passed by a great majority; though twenty peers entered a protest. It met with the same fate in the House, where many strong objections were stated to no purpose. They were represented as the effects of party spleen; and, indeed, this was the great spirit of action on both sides. The question for the bill was carried in the affirmative; and in a little time it received the royal sanction.

§ XXXV. The rebellion being utterly quelled, and all the suspected persons of consequence detained in safe custody, the king resolved to visit his German dominions, where he foresaw a storm gathering from the quarter of Sweden. Charles XII. was extremely exasperated against the Elector of Hanover, for having entered into the confederacy against his father. The latter having purchased the dukedom of Bremen and Verden, which constituted part of his dominions; and he breathed nothing but revenge against the King of Great Britain. It was with a view to avert this danger, or prepare against it, that the king now determined upon a voyage to the continent. But as he was restricted from leaving his British dominions, by the act for the further limitation of the crown, this clause was repealed in a new bill that passed through both houses, and became an act. On the twenty-sixth day of June, the king closed the session with a speech upon the usual topics, in which, however, he observed, that the numerous instances of mercy he had shown, served only to encourage the faction of the pretender, whose partisans acted with such insolence and folly, as if they intended to convince the world that they were not to be restrained by gentle methods. He intimated his purpose of visiting his dominions in Germany; and gave notice, that he should leave his beloved son, the Prince of Wales, guardian of the kingdom in his absence. About this period, General Macarthur, who had returned to England at the accession of King William, was restored to his rank in the army, and gratified with the command of a regiment. The king's brother, Prince Ernest, Bishop of Osnabrick, was created Duke of York and Albany, and Earl of Ulster. The Duke of Argyile, his brother the Earl of Ilay, to whom his majesty owed, in a great measure, his peaceable accession to the throne, as well as the extinction of the rebellion in Scotland, were now dismissed from all their employments. General Carpenter succeeded the Duke in the chief command of the forces in North Britain; and in the government of the foreign alliances. The Duke of Hamilton was appointed lord register of Scotland in the room of the Earl of Ilay.

§ XXXVI. On the seventh day of July, the king embarked at Gravesend, landed on the ninth in Holland, by which passage he passed incognito to Hanover, and thence set out for Pymouth. His aim was to secure his German dominions from the Swedes, and Great Britain from the pretender. These two princes had already begun to form a new and most dangerous system to the government: they would apprehend that the administration was so weak as to want so extraordinary a provision for its safety: that the gentlemen of Britain were not to be trusted; and that the government was restrained within the limits of the House of Commons. They affirmed that this bill, far from preventing the by an alliance with the maritime powers of England and Holland. The King of England sounded him on this subject, and found him eager to engage in such an association. The negotiation was carried on by General Can- dogan for England, the Albr. du Bos for France, and the Prince of Orange for the United States; and the treaty was readily completed with all their demands. He engaged that the pretender should immediately depart from Avignon to the other side of the Alps, and never return to Louis XIV.; France on this point was explicit; but the refusal of the rebellious subjects of Great Britain should be allowed to reside in that kingdom; and that the treaty of Utrecht, with respect to the demarcation of Dunkirk, should be fully and faithfully executed. In this transaction of his Britannic majesty. The treaty contained a mutual guarantee of all the places possessed by the contracting powers; of the protestant succession on the throne of England, as well as of that of the Duke of Orleans to the crown of France; and a defensive alliance, stipulating the proportion of ships and forces to be furnished to that power which should be distur- bed at home or invaded from abroad. The English people murmured at this treaty. They said an unnecessary union was made, with which all nations were great commercial connections; and that on pretence of an invasion, a body of foreign troops might be introduced to enslave the kingdom.

XXXVIII. When the parliament of Great Britain met on the twentieth day of February, the King informed them of the triple alliance he had concluded with France and Holland. He mentioned the projected invasion; told them he had given orders for laying before them copies of the letters which he had received from the ministers on that subject; and he demanded of the Commons such supplies as should be found necessary for the defence of the kingdom. By those papers it appeared that the scheme projected by the German party to the duchies of Verden, Duynna, and even ripe for execution; which, however, was postponed until the army should be reduced, and the Dutch auxil- iaries sent back to their own country. The letters being laid before an parliament, present to the disavowal of his Britannic majesty. The King'ssend the plans for designing a new armament, which they ostent the king's prudence in establishing such conventions with foreign potentates as might repair the gross defects, and prevent the pernicious consequences, of the treaty of Utrecht, which they termed a treacherous and dishonourable peace; and they expressed their horror and indignation at the malice and ingratitude of those who had encouraged an invasion of their country. He like- wise received an address of the same kind from the con- feredacy. These were resolutions on the side of the university; but Oxford was not so lavish of her compliments. At a meeting of the vice- chancellor and heads of that university, a motion was made for an address to the King, on the subject of the late unnatural rebellion, his majesty's safe return, and the favour lately shown to the university, in addressing, at their request, the ceremony of burning in effigy the devil, the Pope, the pretender, the Duke of Ormond, and the Earl of Oxford, on the anniversary of his majesty's accession. Dr. Smallridge, Bishop of Bristol, observed, that the rebelli- on had been long suppressed; that there would be no end of addresses, should one be presented every time his majesty returned from his German dominions. The university thought they had reason to complain of the little regard paid to their remon- strance, touching a riot raised in that city by the soldiers there quartered, on pretence that the anniversary of the prince's birth-day had not been celebrated with the usual rejoicings. Affidavits had been sent up to the court, which seemed to favour the officers of the regiment. When the House of Lords deliberated upon the mutiny- bill, by which the soldiers were exempted from arrests for debts, of their own finding, the petition was presented at Oxford; and a good deal was made, that they should in- quire into the riot. The Lords presented an address to the queen, desiring that the papers relating to that affair might be laid before the House. These being passed, a motion was made for obtaining a return of the names of the soldiers, and of the officers of the regiment. A warm debate ensued, during which the Earl of Abingdon offered a petition from the vice-chancellor of the university, the mayor and magis- trates of Oxford, praying to be heard. One of the court members observing that it would be irregular to re- ceive a petition while the House was in a grand commit- tee, a motion was made, that the chairman should leave the chair; but this being carried in the negative, the de- bate was resumed, and the majority agreed to the follow- ing resolutions: That the heads of the university, and mayor of the city, neglected to make public rejoicings on the prince's birth-day; that the officers having met to cele-brate that day, the house in which they had assembled was assaulted, and the windows were broken by the rab- ble; that this assault was the beginning and occasion of the riots that ensued; that the conduct of the major seemed well justified by the affidavits produced on his part; that the printing and publishing the deposi-tions, upon which the complaints re- lating to the riots at Oxford were founded, by a person not directly concerned in the affair, while that matter was under the examination of the court of admiralty, before they had time to come to any resolution touching the same, was irregular, disrespectful to his royal highness, and tending to sedition. An inquiry of this nature, so managed, did not much reduce to the honour of such an august assembly.
§ XXXIX. The Commons passed a bill, prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, a branch of trade which was of the utmost consequence to the English merchants. They voted ten thousand subjects. They voted the money for the maintenance of guards, garrisons, and land- forces; and passed the bill relating to mutiny and desertion. The House likewise voted four-and-twenty thousand pounds for the payment of four battalions of Munsters part of Spain. The king took the bill into his service, to supply the place of such as might be, during the rebellion, drawn from the garrisons of the States-general to the assistance of England. This vote, however, was not carried without a violent debate. It was weighed against as an imposition, seeing no troops had ever served. A motion was made for an address, desiring that the instructions of those who concluded the treaties might be laid before the House; but this was overruled by the majority. The supplies were raised by a land tax of three shillings in the pound, and a malt tax. What the Commons had given was not thought sufficient for the expense of the year; therefore, Mr. Secretary Stanhope brought a message from his majesty, demanding an extraordinary supply, that he might be the better enabled to secure his kingdom against the danger with which they were threatened from Sweden; and he moved that a supply should be voted to his majesty as a necessity. Mr. Shippen observed it was a great misfortune that the king was as little acquainted with the parliamentary proceedings as with the language of the country: that the message was absolute and unqualified; and, in his opinion, penned by some foreign minister: he said he had been often told that his majesty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the nation; a truth which appeared in the flourishing condition of trade; but that the solicitude demanded time to be inconsistent with the glorious advantages which his majesty had obtained for the people. He was seconded by Mr. Hungerford, who declared that for his part he could not understand what occasion there was for so great an imposition; much less that it should be purchased with money. He expressed his surprise that a nation so lately the terror of France and Spain, should now seem to fear so inconsiderate an enemy as the King of Sweden. The motion was supported by Mr. Boscowen, Sir Gilbert Heathcock, and others; but some of the whigs spoke against it; and Mr. Robert Walpole was silent. The speaker, and Mr. Smith, one of the tellers of the exchequer, opposed this unconstitutional way of demanding the supply: the former insisted, that a part of the army should be disbanded, and the money applied towards the making good such new engagements as were deemed necessary. After several successive debates, the resolution for the supply was carried by a majority of two. § XL. The ministry was now divided within itself. Lord Townshend had been removed from the office of secretary of state, by the intrigues of the Earl of Sunderland; and he was now likewise dismissed from the place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Mr. Robert Walpole resigned his post of first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer: his example was followed by Mr. Pulteney, secretary at war, and Mr. Methuen, secretary of state. When the affairs of the supply were resumed in the House of Commons, Mr. Stanhope made a motion for granting two hundred and fifty thousand pounds for that purpose. Mr. Pulteney observed, that having resigned his place, he could not now act with the freedom of an Englishman: he declared against the manner of granting the supply, as unconstitutional and unprecedented. He said he could not persuade himself that any Englishman advised his majesty to send such a message; but he doubted not the resolution of a British parliament would make a German ministry tremble. Mr. Stanhope having harangued the House in vindication of the ministry, Mr. Smith, in a very angry speech; he affirmed that if an estimate of the conduct of the ministry in relating to affairs abroad was to be made from a comparison of their conduct at home, they would not appear altogether so faultless as they were represented. "Was it not a mistake (said he) not to preserve the peace at home, after the king had ascended the throne with the universal applause and professions of loyalty?" 2 All this was, said he, upon a mistake, upon the breaking out of the rebellion, not to issue a proclamation, to offer pardon to such as should return home peaceably, according to the custom on former occasions? He asked if it was not a mistake, after the suppression of the rebellion and the trial and execution of the principal authors of it, to keep up animosities, and drive people to despair, by not passing an act of indemnity, by keeping so many persons under hard and tedious captivity? The demand would not be made without leaving them any means to subsist? Is it not a mistake, not to trust a vote of parliament for making good such engagements as his majesty should think proper to enter into; and instead of that, to insist on the granting this supply in such an extraordinary manner? Is it not a mistake, to take this opportunity to create divisions, and render some of the king's best friends suspected and obnoxious? Is it not a mistake, in order to fortify and calais, in order to bring in a bill to repeal the act of occasional conformity? A great number of members had agreed to this measure in private, though at this period it was not brought into the House of Commons. After a long debate, it was carried by a majority. These were the first fruits of Britain's being wedded to the interests of the continent. The Elector of Hanover quarrelled with the King of Sweden; and England was not only deprived of a necessary harbinger of alliances; and, in his opinion, penned by some foreign minister: he said he had been often told that his majesty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the nation; a truth which appeared in the flourishing condition of trade; but that the solicitude demanded time to be inconsistent with the glorious advantages which his majesty had obtained for the people. He was seconded by Mr. Hungerford, who declared that for his part he could not understand what occasion there was for so great an imposition; much less that it should be purchased with money. Mr. Stanhope having harangued the House in vindication of the ministry, Mr. Smith, in a very angry speech; he affirmed that if an estimate of the conduct of the ministry in relating to affairs abroad was to be made from a comparison and fifty thousand, commanded by the grand vizzir, who was mortally wounded, and the Turkish imperial army which interrupted the battle he fought on the fifth day of August. The Turkish army did not exceed thirty thousand men, of those all affidavit attributed to one hundred and speaker took their word and honour that they should not prosecute their resentment. The money-corporations having agreed to provide cash for such creditors as should be willing to receive their principal, the House came to certain resolutions for the whole proceedings for the first time, passed into laws, under the names of "The South Sea Act, the Bank Act, and the General Fund Act." The original stock of the South Sea company did not exceed one million five hundred thousand pounds; but the funds granted being sufficient to answer the interest of ten millions at six per cent. the company made up that sum to the government, for which they received six hundred thousand pounds, and a commission, and the management of the funds for the first year, for management. By this act they declared themselves willing to receive five hundred thousand pounds, and the eight thousand for management. It was enacted, that the company should continue a corporation until the redemption of their annuity, towards which not less than a million should be paid at a time. They were likewise required to advance a sum not exceeding two millions, towards discharging the principal and interest due on the four loans of the sixth and tenth years of Queen Anne. By the bank act the governors and company declared themselves willing to accept an annuity of eighty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-one pounds, seven shillings, and ten pence, to which was added an interest of one million seven hundred and seventy-five thousand twentyseven pounds, seventeen shillings, and ten pence halfpenny, in lieu of the present annuity, amounting to one hundred and one shillings and five pence halfpenny, to be paid by the company, and five shillings, and five pence. They likewise declared themselves willing to discharge, and deliver up to be cancelled, as many exchequer bills as amounted to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of one hundred thousand pounds, being after the rate of five per cent, redeemable after one year's notice; to erect the remaining exchequer bills at three per cent. and one penny per day. It was enacted, that the former allowances should be continued to Christmas next, and the bank should have the use of the two millions five hundred and sixty-one thousand and twenty-five pounds remaining exchequer bills, an annuity of seventy-six thousand eight hundred and thirty pounds fifteen shillings at the rate of three pounds per cent. till redeemed, over and above the one penny a day for interest. By the same act the bank was required to advance a sum not exceeding two millions five hundred thousand pounds, towards discharging the national debt, if wanted, on condition that the bank should have the use of it for as long a time as they might advance, redeemable by parliament. The general fund act recited the several acts of parliament, for establishing the four lotteries in the ninth and tenth years of Queen Anne, and for the management of the several funds, amounting in all to seven hundred twenty-four thousand eight hundred forty-nine pounds, six shillings, and ten pence one-fifth. This was the general fund; the deficiency of which was to be made good annually, out of the firsts aids granted by parliament. For the regular payment of all such annuities as should be made payable by this act, it was enacted, that all the duties and revenues mentioned therein should continue for ever, with the proviso, however, that the revenues rendered by this act perpetual should be subject to redemption. This act contained a clause by which the sinking fund was established. The reduction of interest to five per cent. producing a surplus or excess upon the appropriated funds, it was enacted, that all the moneys from time to time, as well for the surplus, by virtue of the acts for redeeming the funds of the bank and of the South Sea company, as also for the surplus of the duties and revenues by this act appropriated to make good the general fund, should be appropriated and employed for the discharging the principal and interest of such national debt as was incurred before the twenty-fifth of December of the years, and to the interest due at the end of said year, and appointed by any future act of parliament, to be discharged out of the same, and for none other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever.

§ Next. The Earl of Oxford, who had now remained almost two years in the Tower, presented a petition to the House of Lords, praying that his imprisonment might not be indefinite. Some of the Tory lords affirmed that the impeachment was destroyed and determined by the prorogation of parliament, which superseded it, and that the committee appointed to consider it was of considerable majesty. The thirteenth day of June was fixed for the trial; and the House of Commons made acquaintance with this determination. The Commons appointed a committee to the state of the earl's impeachment; and, in consequence of their report, sent a message to the Lords, demanding longer time to prepare for trial. Accordingly, the day was prolonged to the twenty-fourth of June, and the Commons appointed the chairman, with five members, to go into a committee, making the good the articles of impeachment. At the appointed time, the Peers repaired to the court in Westminster-hall, where Lord Cowper presided as lord steward. The Commons were assembled as a committee of the whole house: the king, the rest of the royal family, and the foreign ministers, assisted at the solemnity: the Earl of Oxford was brought from the Tower: the articles of impeachment were read, with his answers, and the repudiation of the Commons. Sir Joseph Jekyll standing up to make good the first article, Lord Harcourt signified to their lordships that he had a motion to make, and they adjourned to their own house. There he represented, that a great deal of business had been got through the Commons, in going through all the articles of the impeachment: that if the Commons would make good the two articles for high treason, the Earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and estate, and there was not the most light to imagine that the Commons, to proceed on the method proposed by the Commons, would draw the trial on to a prodigious length. He therefore moved that the Commons might not be permitted to proceed, until judgment should be first given upon the articles of high treason. It was supported the same day by Mr. Fox of Anglesey and Nottingham, the Lord Trevor, and a considerable number of both parties; and though opposed by the Earl of Sunderland, the Lords Coningsby and Parker, the motion was carried without disserting the dispute between the two houses. The Commons, at a conference, delivered a paper, containing their reasons for asserting it as their undoubted right to impeach a peer either for treason or for high crimes and misdemeanors; or, should they see occasion, to mix both in a single accusation. The House of Lords insisted on their former resolution; and in another conference delivered a paper, wherein they asserted it to be a right inherent in every court of justice to impeach a peer. The Commons insisted that such proceedings as they thought fit to be observed in all causes that fall under its cognizance. The Commons demanded a free conference, which was refused. The dispute grew more and more wide, so that both houses sent their committees to the lower House, importing, that they intended presently to proceed on the trial of the Earl of Oxford. The Commons paid no regard to this intimation, but adjourned to the third day of July. The Lords, repairing to Westminster-hall, took their places, entered the earl to be brought to the bar, and made proclamation for his accusers to appear. Having waited a quarter of an hour, they adjourned to their own house, where, after some debate, the earl was acquitted upon a division; then returning to the hall they voted, that he should be set at liberty. Oxford owed his safety to the dissensions among the ministers, and to the late change in the administration. In consequence of this he was delivered from the persecution of Walpole; and numbered among his friends the Dukes of Devonshire and Argyle, the Earls of Nottingham and Hail, and Lord Townshend. The Commons, in order to express their sense of his demerit, presented an address to the king, desiring he might be excluded out of the intended general grace. The king promised to comply with their request; and in the mean time forbade the earl to appear at court. On the fifteenth day of July the Earl of Sunderland delivered the Earl of Oxford to the House of Peers, and the commons, who proceeded through both Houses with great expedition. From this indulgence were excepted the Earl of Oxford, Mr. Prior, Mr. Thomas Harley, Mr. Arthur Moore, Crisp, Nodis, Ollivran, Redmarne the printer, and Thompson; as also the assassins in Newcastle, and the clauk of Macgregor. in Scotland. B. virtue of this act, the Earl of Cam'wath, the Lords Waddington and Nairn, were immediately discharged, together with all the gentlemen under sentence of death in Newgate, and those who were confined on account of the rebellion, in the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and other prisons. The act, however, was not put in force, and for the royal assent, the king went to the House of Peers on the fifteenth day of July, and having given his sanction to all the bills that were ready, closed the session with a speech on the usual topics.

§ XLIII. The proceedings in the convocation turned chiefly upon two performances of Dr. Hoodley, Bishop of Bangor. One was entitled, "A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Presbyterians." In the other was a sermon preached before the king, under the title of, "The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ." An answer to this discourse was published by Dr. Snape, master of Eton college, and the convocation appointed a committee to examine the bishop's two performances. They drew up a representation, in which the preservative and the sermon were censured, as tending to subvert all government and discipline in the church of Christ; to reduce his kingdom to a state of disorder and confusion: to impugn and impugn the royal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, and the authority of the legislature to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions. The government thought proper to put a stop to these productions by proclamation; but, however, inflamed the controversy. A great number of pens were drawn against the bishop; but his chief antagonists were Dr. Snape and Dr. Sherlock, whom the king removed from the office of his chaplains: and the convocation has not been permitted to sit and do business since that period.

A. D. 1717. § I. During these transactions, the negociations of the north were continued against the King of Sweden, who had penetrated into Norway, and advanced towards Christianstadt, the capital of that kingdom. The car had sent five-and-twenty thousand Russian to assist the allies in the reduction of Wismar, which he intended to bestow upon his niece, lately married to the Prince of Mecklenburgh-Schwerin. The Russian troops arrived, the place had surrendered, and the Russians were not admitted into the garrison, a circumstance which increased the misunderstanding between him and the King of Denmark. Nevertheless, he was so anxious for making a descent upon Schonen, and actually took upon him the command of the allied fleet; though he was not at all pleased to see Sir John Norris in the Baltic, because he had formed designs against Denmark, which he knew the English squadron would protect. He suddenly desisted from the expedition against Schonen, on pretence that the season was too far advanced; and the King of Denmark published a manifesto, renouncing his conduct on this occasion. In this time Baron Gosta had planned a pacification between his master and the car, who was discontented with all his German allies, because they opposed his having any footing in the empire. This monarch arrived at Amsterdam in December, whether he was followed by the envoys; and he actually resided at Fredricksstadt, where a great number of his dominions had been procured, before he was sent to the court of the English. When Charles of Hanover's letters were published to London, some passages seemed to authorize the opposition of the emperor to the conspiracy. His minister at the English court presented a long memorial, complaining that the king had caused to be printed the malicious insinuations of his enemies. He denied having the least connexion with the designs of Sweden. He charged the court of England with having privately treated of a separate peace with Charles, and even with having promised to assist him against the car, on condition that he would relinquish his pretensions to Bremen and Verden. Nevertheless he expressed an inclination to re-establish the ancient good understanding, and to engage to vigorous measures for prosecuting the war against the common enemy. The memorial was answered by the King of Great Britain, who assured the carar that he should have reason to be fully satisfied, if he would remove the only obstacle to their mutual good understanding; in other words, withdraw the Russian troops from the empire. Notwithstanding these professions, the two monarchs were never effectually reconciled.

§ II. The carar made an excursion to the court of France, where he concluded a treaty of friendship with the regent, at whose earnest desire he promised to recall his troops from Schonen. When he arrived at Bremen, he had a private interview with Gotta, who, as well as Gyllebin, had been set at liberty. Gotta undertook to adjust all difference between the carar and the King of Sweden within three months; and he engaged to bend all operations against Sweden, until that term should be expired. A congress was opened at Abo, between the Swedish and Russian ministers; but the conferences were afterwards removed to Aland. By this convention, the carar obliged himself to assist Charms in the conquest of Norway; and they promised to unite all their forces against the King of Great Britain, should he presume to interpose. Both were deceived against that prince; and one part of their design was to raise the pretender to the throne of England. Baron Gosta set out from Aland for Frederickstadt in Norway, with the plan of peace, but, before he arrived, Charles was killed by a cannon-ball from the town, and he visited the treaty in November. Baron Gosta was immediately arrested, and brought to the scaffold by the nobles of Sweden, whose hatred he had incurred by his insolence of behaviour. The death of Charles was fortunate for King George. Sweden was now able to attack the King of Denmark, and the Elector of Hanover, kept possession of what they had acquired in the course of the war.

§ III. Thus Bremen and Verden were secured to the house of Hanover: an acquisition towards which the English nation contributed by her money, as well as by her arms: an acquisition made in contradiction to the engagements into which England entered when King William became guaranteed for the treaty of Travebdal: an acquisition that may be considered as the first link of a political chain by which the English nation was dragged back into expensive connexions with the continent. The king had not yet received the investment of the duchies; and until that should be procured, it was necessary to espouse with warmth the interest of the emperor. This was another source of misunderstanding between Great Britain and Spain. Prince Eugene gained another victory over a prodigious army of the Turks at Belgrade, which was surrendered to him after the battle. The emperor had engaged in this war as an ally of the Venetians, whom the Turks had already despised designs against Denmark, which he knew the English squadron would protect. He suddenly desisted from the expedition against Schonen, on pretence that the season was too far advanced; and the King of Denmark published a manifesto, renouncing his conduct on this occasion. In this time Baron Gosta had planned a pacification between his master and the car,

5. On account of the great scarcity of silver coin, occasioned by the exportation of silver, and the importation of gold, a motion was made to put a stop to this growing evil by lowering the value of gold specie. The Commons examined a representation which a bill was made to the treasury by Sir Isaac Newton, master of the mint, on this subject. Mr. Caswell explained the nature of a clandestine trade carried on by the Dutch and Hamburgers in and about the man of war. At this period, one James Shepherd, a youth of eighteen, apprentice to a coach-maker, and an enthusiast in Jacobitism, sent a letter to a nonjuring clergymen, proposing a scheme for assassinating King George. He was immediately apprehended, owned the design, was tried, condemned, and executed at Tyburn. This was likewise the fate of the Marquis de Pellecote, an Italian nobleman, brother to the Duchess of Shrewsbury. He had, in a transport of passion, killed his own servant; and seemed indeed to be disordered in his brain. After he had received sentence of death, the king's pardon was earnestly solicited by his sister, the duchess, and many other persons of the first distinction: but the common people became enraged at the thought of this act, which was punished under the penalties of the law, which he accordingly underwent in the most ignominious manner. No subject produced so much heat and altercation in parliament during the last session, as did the subject of the law for regulating the land forces and punishing mutiny and desertion: a bill which was looked upon as an encroachment upon the liberties and constitution of England, inasmuch as it established martial law, which wrested from the civil magistrate the cognizance of crimes and misdemeanors committed by the soldiers and officers of the army: a jurisdiction inconsistent with the genius and disposition of the people. The dangers that might accrue from such a power were explained in the lowest terms by Mr. Hutchinson, Mr. Harley, and Mr. Robert Walpole, which last, however, voted afterwards for the bill. In the House of Lords, it was strenuously opposed by the Earls of Oxford, Stafford, and Lord Harcourt. Their objections were answered by Lord Carteret. The bill passed by a great majority; but divers Lords entered a protest. This affair being discussed, a bill was brought in for vesting in trustees the forfeited estates in Britain and Ireland, to be sold for the use of the public; for giving relief to lawful creditors, by determining elaborate harangue, insisted upon its being reduced to a thousand thousand pounds from three hundred thousand, by Sir Henry Craggs, secretary at war, and Sir David Dalrymple. Mr. Shippen, in the course of the debate, said the second paragraph of the king's speech seemed rather to be calculated for the meridian of Germany than for Great Britain; and it was a great misfortune that the king was a stranger to our language and constitution. Mr. Lechmere affirmed this was a scandalous invidious against the king's person and government; and moved that he who uttered it should be recalled to the Tower. King George, upon excuse what he had said, was voted to the Tower by a great majority; and the number of standing forces was fixed at sixteen thousand three hundred and forty-seven effective men.

§ IV. On the third day of November, the Princess of Wales was delivered of a prince, the ceremony of whose baptism was performed by the bishop of London, in the presence of the Duke of Cumberland, in the chapel of the palace of Holyroodhouse, and that of the Duke of Cornwall, the Duke of York, and the Duke of Gloucester, the Prince of Wales, with other noblemen and gentlemen. The Prince of Wales intended that his uncle, the Duke of York, should stand godfather. The king ordered the Duke of Newcastle to stand for himself. After the ceremony, the prince expressed his resentment against this nobleman in very warm terms. The king ordered the prince to confine himself within his own apartments; and afterwards signified his pleasure that he should quit the palace of St. James. He retired with the prince to a house belonging to the Earl of Glamorgan; but the children were detained at the palace. All peers and peersesses, and all privy-councillors and their wives, were given to understand, that in case they visited the prince, they should avoid his presence; and that all who enjoyed places and posts under both king and prince were obliged to quit the service of one or other, at their option. When the parliament met this session, as did those of the last, in the king's speech, told both Houses that he had reduced the army to very near one half, since the beginning of the last session: he expressed his desire that all those who were friends to the present happy establishment might unanimously concur in some proper method for the greater strengthening the protestant interest, of which, as the church of England was unquestionably the main support and bulwark, so would she reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union of Spain and Savoy; that the succession to the duchy of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, which theQueen of Spain claimed by inheritance, as princess of the house of Farnese, should be settled on her eldest son, in case the present possessions were, by the treaty of paix, dismembered by the partition, continued to make formidable preparations by sea and land. The King of England and the Regent of France interposed their admonitions to no purpose. At length his Britannic majesty had recourse to more substantial arguments, and ordered a strong squadron to be equipped with all possible expedition.

4. The prince was accompanied by the Earl of Cumberland, Lord Onslow, the Duke of York, and the Duke of Cumberland, the Prince of Wales, with other noblemen and gentlemen. The Prince of Wales intended that his uncle, the Duke of York, should stand godfather. The king ordered the Duke of Newcastle to stand for himself. After the ceremony, the prince expressed his resentment against this nobleman in very warm terms. The king ordered the prince to confine himself within his own apartments; and afterwards signified his pleasure that he should quit the palace of St. James. He retired with the prince to a house belonging to the Earl of Glamorgan; but the children were detained at the palace. All peers and peersesses, and all privy-councillors and their wives, were given to understand, that in case they visited the prince, they should avoid his presence; and that all who enjoyed places and posts under both king and prince were obliged to quit the service of one or other, at their option. When the parliament met this session, as did those of the last, in the king's speech, told both Houses that he had reduced the army to very near one half, since the beginning of the last session: he expressed his desire that all those who were friends to the present happy establishment might unanimously concur in some proper method for the greater strengthening the protestant interest, of which, as the church of England was unquestionably the main support and bulwark, so would she reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union of Spain and Savoy; that the succession to the duchy of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, which the Queen of Spain claimed by inheritance, as princess of the house of Farnese, should be settled on her eldest son, in case the present possessions were, by the treaty of paix, dismembered by the partition, continued to make formidable preparations by sea and land. The King of England and the Regent of France interposed their admonitions to no purpose. At length his Britannic majesty had recourse to more substantial arguments, and ordered a strong squadron to be equipped with all possible expedition.
the claims, and for the more effectual bringing into the respective exchequers the rents and profits of the estates till sold. The time of claiming was prolonged: the sum of twenty thousand pounds was reserved out of the sale of the estates in Scotland, for erecting schools; and eight thousand pounds for building barracks in that kingdom.

The king having signified, by a message to the vice-admiral, a wish of knowing whether he had lately received such information from abroad, as gave reason to believe that a naval force, employed where it should be necessary, might have given him a prospect of retrieving his deprivations; he therefore thought fit to acquaint the House with this circumstance, not doubting but that in case he should be obliged, at this critical juncture, to exceed the number of men granted this year for the service, the House would provide for such exceeding. The Commons immediately drew up and presented an address, assuring his majesty that they would make good such exceedings of seamen as he should find necessary to preserve the tranquility of Europe. On the twenty-first day of March, the king went to the House of Peers, and having passed the hills that were ready for the royal assent, ordered the parliament to be prorogued.

Chapter III.

The king of Spain, by the care and indefatigable diligence of his prime minister, Cardinal Albemont, equipped a very formidable armament, which, in the beginning of June, set sail from Barcelona towards the destination of which he was not known. A strong squadron having been fitted out in England, the Marquis de Monteleone, ambassador from Spain, presented a memorial to the British ministry, importing that so powerful an armament in time of peace could not but give uneasiness to the British admiral, and disturb the good intelligence that subsisted between the two crowns. In answer to this representation, the ministers declared that the king intended to send Admiral Byng with a powerful squadron into the Mediterranean, to maintain the British interest in Italy. Meanwhile, the negotiations between the English and French ministers produced the quadruple alliance, by which King George and the regent prescribed a peace between the emperors, the king of France, and the king of Sicily, and undertook to compel Philip and the Savoyard to submit to such conditions as they had concerted with his imperial majesty. These powers were allowed only to England to consider the articles, and declare whether they would reject them, or accept in the partition. Nothing could be more contradictory to the true interest of Great Britain than this treaty, which destroyed the balance in Italy, by throwing such an accession of power into the hands of the French admiral. It upset the commerce with Spain, involved the kingdom in an immediate war with that monarchy, and gave rise to all the quarrels and disputes which have arisen between England and Spain in the sequel. The Sicilian general did not approve of such violent measures, and for some time kept aloof; but at length acceded to the quadruple alliance, which indeed was no other than a very expensive compliment to the emperor, who was desirous of adding Sicily to his other Italian dominions.

Chapter VII.

The king of England had used some endeavours to compromise the difference between his imperial majesty and the Spanish branch of the house of Bourbon. Lord Stanhope had been sent to Madrid, with a plan of pacification, which being rejected by Philip as partial and inglorious, the king determined to support his mediation by force of arms. Sir George Byng sailed from Spithead on the fourth day of June, with twenty ships of the line, two fire-ships, two bomb-vessels, and ample instructions how to act on all emergencies. He arrived off Cape St. Vincent on the thirtieth day of the month, and despatched his vessel with a letter to the British minister at Madrid, desiring him to inform his most catholic majesty of the admiral's arriving in those parts, and lay before him this article of his instructions:

"I have no further instances of his Majesty's wishes, beyond what I have been able to collect from any further articles of hostility: but in case the Spanish admiral do still insist, with their ships of war and forces, to attack the kingdom of Naples, or other territories of the emperor in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy, which can only be with a design to invade the emperor's territories, against whom only they have declared war by invading Sardinia; or if they should undertake to make themselves masters of the kingdom of Sicily, which must be the consequence, should they maintain their designs, in which case you are, with all your power, to hinder and obstruct the same. If it should so happen, that, at your arrival, with our fleet under your command, in the Mediterranean, and in the same day, the Spanish admiral shall have attacked Italy in order to invade the emperor's territories, you shall endeavour amicably to dissuade them from persevering in such an attempt, and offer them your assistance, to help them to withdraw their troops, and put an end to all further acts of hostility. But in case these your friendly endeavours should prove ineffectual, you shall, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ships or convoy; or if it be necessary, by openly opposing them, defend the emperor's territories from any further attempt." When Cardinal Albemont perused these instructions, he told Colonel Stanhope with some warmth, that his master would run all hazards, and even suffer himself to be driven out of Spain, rather than see the Spanish arm strengthened by the addition of British assistance. Mr. Stanhope presenting him with a list of the British squadron, he threw it upon the ground with great emotion. He promised, however, to lay the admiral's letter before the king, and to let the envoy know his majesty's resolution. Sir George Byng, having delivered the despatch relative to the Spanish ministry, who had laid his account with the conquest of Sicily, and for that purpose prepared an armament, which was altogether surprising, considering the great numbers he had acquired, and the small amount of his army, it seems to have put too much confidence in the strength of the Spanish fleet. In a few days he sent back the admiral's letter to Mr. Stanhope, with a note under it, importing, that the commander Byng would execute the orders he had received from the king his master.

Chapter VIII.

The admiral, in passing by Gibraltar, was joined by Vice-Admiral Cornwall, with two ships. He proceeded to Marseilles, where he received the garrison of Port-Mahon. Then he sailed for Naples, where he arrived on the first day of August, and was received as a deliverer; for the Neapolitans had been under the utmost terror of an invasion from the Spaniards. Sir George Byng received intelligence from the British minister, that the Spanish fleet, with the most distinguishing marks of respect, that the Spanish arm, amounting to thirty thousand men, commanded by the Marquis de Ledy, had landed in Sicily, reduced Palermo and Messina, and were then encamped on the siege of the citadel belonging to this last city; that the Pedemontese garrison would be obliged to surrender, if not speedily relieved; that an alliance was upon the point between the emperor and the king of Sicily, which last had desired the assistance of the imperial troops, and agreed to receive them into the citadel of Messina. The Spanish admiral immediately resolved to sail thither, and took under his own a reinforcement of two thousand Germans for the citadel, under the command of Count Saldana. He forthwith sailed from Naples, and on the ninth day of August was in sight of the Faro of Messina. He despatched his own captain with a white message to the Marquis de Ledy, proposing a cessam of arms in Sicily for two months, that the powers of Europe might have time to concert measures for restoring a lasting peace; and declaring, that should this proposal be rejected, he would, with the support of a few ships of war, give way to further attempts to disturb the dominions his master had engaged to defend. The Spanish general answered, that he had no power to treat, and consequently could not agree to any of the instances to contain by which Sir George Stanhope directed him to reduce Sicily for his master the King of Spain. The Spanish fleet had sailed from the harbour of Messina on the day before the English squadron appeared. Admiral Byng supposed they had retired to Malta, and directed his course towards Messina, order to encourage and allay the spirits of the citadel. But, in doubling the point of Faro, he descried two Spanish scouts, and learned from the people of a felucca from the Calabrian shore, that they had seen from the hills the Spanish fleet lying near the point, and had seen a warlike appearance on the seven-and-twenty sail, large and small, besides two fire-ships, four bomb-vessels, and seven galleys. They were commanded in chief by Don Antonio de Castamalta, under whom were the four rear-admirals, Chacon, Marin, Guerra, and Cammock. At sight of the English squadron, they stood away large, and Byng gave chase all the rest of the day. In the morning, which was the eleventh of August, Rear-Admiral de Mars, with six ships of war, the galleys, fire-ships, and bomb-ketches, separated from the main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore. The English admiral detached Captain Walton with five ships in pursuit of them; and they were soon engaged. He himself commanded to chase the main fleet; and about ten o'clock the rear-admirals of Spain disengaged from them, and took to the coast. In this engagement, which happened off Cape Passaro, Captain Haddock, of the Glatton, signified his courage in an extraordinary manner.

On the eighteenth the admiral received a letter from Captain Walton, dated off Syracuse, intimating that he had taken four Spanish ships of war, together with a bomb-ketch, and a vessel laden with arms; and that he had burned four ships of the line, a fire-ship, and a bomb-vessel. Had the Spaniards followed the advise of Rear-Admiral Cammock, who was a native of Ireland, Sir George Byng would not have obtained such an easy victory. That officer proposed that they should remain at anchor in the road of Paradise, with their broadsides to the sea; in which case the English admiral would have found it a very difficult task to attack them; for the coast is so bold, that the largest ships could ride with a cable ashore; whereas further out the currents are so various and rapid that the navigation could not have ensured a secure anchor, or lie near in order of battle; besides, the Spaniards might have been reinforced from the army on shore, which would have raised batteries to annoy the assailants. These were all reasons that might be urged against this engagement from the admiral, he wrote him a letter with his own hand, approving his conduct. When Sir George's eldest son arrived in England, with a circumstantial account of the action, he was graciously received, and sent back with plenipotentiary powers to his father, that he might negotiate with the several princes and states of Italy, as he should see occasion. The son likewise carried the king's royal grant to the officers and seamen, of the prizes they had taken from the Spaniards. Notwithstanding this victory, the Spanish army carried on the siege of the citadel of Messina with such vigour, that the governor surrendered the place by capitulation on the twenty-ninth day of September; A treaty was now concluded at Vienna between the emperor and the Duke of Savoy. They agreed to form an army for the conquest of Sardinia in behalf of the duke; and in the mean time this prince engaged to evacuate Sicily; but until his troops could be brought to hand, he continued that the emperor would co-operate with the Germans against the common enemy. Admiral Byng continued to assist the imperialists in Sicily during the best part of the winter, by scouring the coast and the main, particularly the treaty for a defensive alliance between the emperor and his majesty, concluded at Westminster on the twenty-fifth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixteen; and the treaty of alliance for restoring and settling the same, signed at London on the twenty-second day of July. He affirmed, that the court of Spain had violated the treaty of Utrecht, and acted against the public faith in attacking the emperor's dominions, while he was engaged in a war against the common enemy. He declared that they had rejected his majesty's friendly offices and offers for mediating an accommodation. He explained the cause of

Sir,

We have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which acted in this service with equal conduct, resolution, and activity. He conferred with the Viceroy of Naples and the other imperial generals about the operations of the enemy, and his majesty's instructions for the campaign. He returned to Vienna, to lay before the emperor the result of their deliberations; then the admiral set sail for Mahon, where the ships might be refitted, and put in a condition to take the sea in the spring.

§ IX. The destruction of the Spanish fleet was a subject that employed the deliberations and conjectures of all the politicians in Europe. Spain exclaimed against the conduct of England, as inconsistent with the rules of good faith, for the observation of which she had always been so famous. The Margravine of Montefelone wrote a letter to Mr. Secretary Craggs, in which he expostulated with him upon such an unprecedented outrage. Cardinal Alberoni, in a letter to that minister, inveighed against it as a base unworthy action. He said the neutrality of Italy was a weak pretence, since every body knew that neutrality had long been an end; and that the prince's guarantees of the treaty of Utrecht were entirely discharged from their engagements, not only by the scandalous infringements committed by the Austrians in the evacuation of Catalonia and Majorca; but also because the guarantee was no longer binding than till a peace was concluded with France. He taxed that Britain, in his majesty's name, had supported this neutrality, not by an amicable mediation, but by open violence, and artfully abusing the confidence and security of the Spaniards. This was the language of disappointed ambition. Nevertheless it must be owned, that the conduct of the French on this occasion, was irregular, partial, and precipitate.

§ X. The parliament meeting on the eleventh day of November, the king, in his speech, declared that the course of Spain had rejected his majesty's amicable proposals, and broke through their most solemn engagements, for the security of the British commerce. To vindicate, therefore, the faith of his former treaties, as well as to maintain those he had lately made, and to protect and defend the trade of his subjects, which had in every branch been violently and unjustly oppressed, it became necessary for his naval forces to check their progress; that notwithstanding the success of his arms, that court had lately given orders at all the ports of Spain and of the West Indies to fit out privateers against the English. He said he was persuaded, that a British parliament would enable him to resent such treatment; and he assured them that his good brother, the Regent of France, was ready to concur with him in the most vigorous measures. A strong opposition was made in both Houses to the motion for an address of thanks and congratulation proposed by Lord Carteret. Several peers observed, that such an address was, in effect, an insult to the French nation, which might be attended with dangerous consequences, and to give the sanction of that august assembly to measures which, upon examination, might appear either to clash with the laws of nations or former treaties, or to be prejudicial to the trade of Great Britain: that they ought to proceed with the utmost caution and mature deliberation, in an affair wherein the honour, as well as the interest, of the nation were so highly concerned. Lord Strafford moved for an address, that Sir George Byng's instructions might be laid before the House. Earl Stanhope replied, that there was no occasion for such an address, since by his majesty's command he had already laid before the House the treaties, of which the late sea-fight was a particular part. Particularly the treaty for a defensive alliance between the emperor and his majesty, concluded at Westminster on the twenty-fifth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixteen; and the treaty of alliance for restoring and settling the same, signed at London on the twenty-second day of July. He affirmed, that the court of Spain had violated the treaty of Utrecht, and acted against the public faith in attacking the emperor's dominions, while he was engaged in a war against the common enemy. He declared that they had rejected his majesty's friendly offices and offers for mediating an accommodation. He explained the cause of his journey to Spain, and his negotiations at Madrid. He added, it was high time to check the growth of the naval power of Spain, in order to protect and secure the trade of the British subjects which had been violated apples. Scarcely had he said this when a motion carried by a considerable majority. The same subject excited disputes of the same nature in the House of Commons, where Lord Ilchester broke out, that in these days, far from thanking they should declare their entire satisfaction in those measures which the king had already taken for strengthening the protestant succession, and establishing a lasting tranquility in Europe. The members in the opposition, declared, that it was on this preliminary procedure, on the first day of the session, to enter upon particulars: that the business in question was of the highest importance, and deserved the most mature deliberation: that before they approved the measures which had been taken, they ought to examine the reasons on which those measures were founded. Mr. Robert Walpole affirmed, that the giving sanction, in the manner proposed, to the late measures, could have no other view than that of screening ministers, who were conscious of having begun a war against Spain, and now wanted to make it the parliament’s war. He observed, that instead of an entire satisfaction, they ought to express their entire dissatisfaction, with such conduct as was contrary to the law of nature, and the breach of the undertaking. Mr. Secretary Cragsgcr, in a long speech, explained the nature of the quadruple alliance, and justified all the measures which had been taken. The address, as moved by Mr. Pitt, was agreed to, and presented to his majesty. Then the Commons proceeded to consider the supply. They voted thirteen thousand five hundred sailors; and twelve thousand four hundred and thirty-five men for the land service. The whole amounted to two millions two hundred and fifty-seven thousand five hundred eighty-one pounds, unshewn shillings. The money was raised by a land tax, malt tax, and lottery.

§ XI. On the thirteenth of December, Earl Stanhope declared, in the House of Lords, that, in order to unite the hearts of the well-affect ed to the present establishment, he had a bill to offer under the title of “An Act for strengthening the protestant interest in these kingdoms.” It was accordingly read, and appeared to be a bill repealing the acts against occasional conformity, the growth of schism, and some clauses in the corporation and test acts. This had been concurred by the ministry in private entries with the most eminent dissenters. The Tory doctors were astonished at this motion, for which they were altogether unprepared. Nevertheless, they were strenuous in their opposition. They alleged that the bill, instead of strengthening King and church, certainly weakened both the church and country. By blunting off her best feathers, investing her enemies with power, and sharing with churchmen the civil and military employments of which they were then wholly possessed. Earl Cowper declared himself against that part of the bill by which some clauses of the test and corporation acts were repealed: because he looked upon those acts as the main bulwark of our excellent constitution in church and state, which ought to be inviolably preserved. The Earl of Illy opposed the bill, because, in his opinion, it infringed the pacific convoca of the treaty of union, by which the bounds, both of the church of England and of the church of Scotland, were fixed and settled; and he was apprehensive, if the articles of the union were broke with respect to one church, it might afterwards be a precedent to break them with respect to the other. The Archbishop of Canterbury said the acts which by this bill would be repealed were the main bulwark and supports of the English church: he expressed all imaginable tenderness for well-meaning conscientious dissenters: but he could not forbear saying, some among that sect made a wrong use of the favour and indulgence shown to them at the present time. He observed, that though they had much reason to be happy, it was, therefore, thought necessary for the legislature to interpose, and put a stop to the scandalous practice of occasional conformity. He added, that it would be needless to repeal the act against schism, since no advantage had been taken of it to the prejudice of the dissenters. Dr. Hoadley, Bishop of Bangor, endeavoured to prove, that the occasional and schism acts were in effect persecuting laws; and that by admitting the principle of self-defence and self-preservation, in matters of religion, all the pernicious consequences of the measures against the professors of Christianity, and even the popish inquisition, might be justified. With respect to the power of which many clergymen appeared so fond and so zealous, he owned the desire of power and riches was natural to all men; but that he had learned, both from reason and from the gospel, that this desire must be kept within due bounds, and not intrude upon the rights and liberties of their fellow-creatures. In the Senate, the House agreed to leave out some clauses concerning the test and corporation acts: then the bill was committed, and afterwards passed. In the lower House it met with violent opposition, in spite of which it was carried by the majority.

§ XII. The king, on the seventeenth day of December, sent a message to the Commons, importing, that all his endeavours to procure redress for the injuries done to his subjects by the King of Spain having proved ineffectual, he had found it necessary to declare war against that monarch. When a motion was made for an address, to assure the king they would cheerfully support him in the prosecution of the war, Mr. Shippen and some other members said they could not, in the present condition of the nation in a war, on account of some grievances of which the merchants complained, as these might be amicably redressed. Mr. Stanhope assured the House, that he could not say he had not regarded the difficulties of the ministry of Spain on that subject, without success. Mr. Methwax accounted for the dilatory proceedings of the Spanish court in commercial affairs, by explaining the great variety of regulations in the several provinces and ports of that kingdom. It was suggested, that the ministry had paid very little regard to the trade and interest of the nation; inasmuch as it appeared by the answers from a secretary of state to the letter of the Marquis de Monte¬sole, that they would have overlooked the violation of the treaties of commerce, provided Spain had accepted the conditions stipulated in the quadruple alliance; for it was there expressly said, that his majesty, the King of Great Britain, did not seek to aggravate himself by any new acquisitions, but was rather inclined to sacrifice something of his own to procure the general quiet and tranquility of Europe. A member observed, that nobody could tell how far it was that such a sacrifice would be of advantage to the commerce of the country, because it was a very uncommon stretch of concession. The House was told to the cession of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon, which the Regent of France had offered to the King of Spain, provided he would accede to the quadruple alliance. It was thought that there could be no objection in the matter of the emperor was an infraction of the treaty of Utrecht; and his brother exclaimed against the injustice of attacking the Spanish fleet before a declaration of war. Notwithstanding all these arguments and objections, the majority agreed to the address; and such another was carried in the upper House without a division. The declaration of war against Spain was published with the usual solemnities; but this war was not a favourite of the people, and therefore did not produce those acclamations that were usual on such occasions.

the Marquis de Monteleone. These emissaries set out from Paris in a post-chaise, and were overtaken. The postilion overheard Portocarrero say, he would not have lost his portmanteau for a hundred thousand pistoles. The money thus saved was levied by order of the government of what he had observed. The Spaniards, before pursued, were overtaken and seized at Poitiers, with the portmanteau, in which the regent found two letters that made him acquainted with the particulars of the conspiracy. The Prince de Bayonne, who had been conducted to the frontier; the Duke of Maine, the Marquis de Pompadour, the Cardinal de Polignac, and many other persons of distinction, were committed to different prisons. The recent declared war was compensated by the Duke of Ormond, who directed an army of six-and-thirty thousand men began its march towards that kingdom in January, under the command of the Duke of Berwick.

§ XIV. Cardinal Albemarle likewise formed a scheme in favour of the pretender. The Duke of Ormond, repairing to Madrid, held conferences with his emissaries; and measures were concerted for exciting another insurrection in Great Britain. The Chevalier de St. George quitted Utrecht, and embarked at Nantes, landed at Cagliari in March. From thence he took his passage to Roses in Catalonia, and proceeded to Madrid, where he was received with great cordially, and treated as King of Great Britain. He arrived here, as in all cases of great ships of war and transports, having on board six thousand regular troops, with arms for twelve thousand men. The command of this fleet was bestowed on the Duke of Ormond, with the title of captain-general of his most catholic majesty. He was provided with declarations in the name of that king, importing, that for many good reasons he had sent part of his land and sea forces into England and Scotland, to act as auxiliaries to King James. His Britannic majesty, having received from the regent of France timely notice of this intended invasion, offered, by proclamation, rewards to those that should apprehend the Duke of Ormond, or any gentleman embarked in that expedition. Troops were ordered to assemble in the north, and in the west of England: two thousand men were demanded of the States-general: a strong squadron was equipped to oppose the Spanish armament; and the Duke of Orleans made a proffer to King George of twenty battalions for his service.

§ XV. His majesty having communicated to both Houses of parliament the repeated advices he had received touching this projected descent, they promised to support himself. It was published on both sides, that the king had committed his forces by sea and land; and assured him they would make good the extraordinary expense. Two thousand men were landed from Holland, and six battalions of imperialists from the Austrian Netherlands. The Duke of Cumberland, with thirty thousand men, was ordered to proceed to Cape Finisterre, where his fleet was dispersed and disabled by a violent storm, which entirely defeated the purposed expedition. Two frigates, however, arrived in Scotland, with the Earl Marischal and Seaforth, the Marquis of Tullibardine, some field-officers, three hundred Spaniards, and arms for two thousand men. They were joined by a small body of Highlanders, and possessed themselves of Doon castle. Against these adventurers General Wright marched with a body of regular troops from Inverness. They had taken possession of the pass at Glen shield; but, at the approach of the king's forces, retired to the pass at Strachull, which they resolved to defend. They were attacked and driven from one eminence to another till night, when the highlanders dispersed; and next day the Spaniards surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Marischal, Seaforth, and Tullibardine, with some officers, retired to one of the western isles, in order to wait an opportunity of being conveyed to the continent.

§ XVI. On the last day of February the Duke of Somerset represented in the House of Lords, that the number of peers sitting was much increased, especially since the union of the two kingdoms; and absolutely necessary to take effectual measures for preventing the inconveniences that might attend the creation of a great number of peers, to serve a present purpose: an expedient which had been actually taken in the late reign. He therefore moved that a bill should be brought in, to settle and limit the peerage, in such a manner, that the number of English peers should not be enlarged beyond six above the present number, which, upon failure of male issue, might be supplied by the next of kin of the sovereign; and that twenty-five peers from Scotland, twenty-five should be made hereditary on the part of that kingdom; and that this number, upon failure of the heirs male, should be supplied from the other members of the Scottish peerage. This bill was intended as a restraint upon the Duke of Ormond, who happened to be at variance with the present ministry. The motion was supported by the Duke of Argyle, now lord steward of the household, the Earls of Sunderland and Carlisle. It was resisted by the Duke of Oxford, who maintained, that he expected nothing from the crown, he would never give his vote for lopping off so valuable a branch of the prerogative, which enabled the king to reward merit and virtuous actions. The debate was adjourned to the second day of March, when Earl Stanhope delivered a message from the king, intimating, that as they had under consideration the state of the British peerage, he had so much at heart the settling it upon such a foundation, as might secure its security for all future ages, that he was willing his prerogative should not stand in the way of so great and necessary a work. Another violent debate ensued between the two factions. The question was, whether the measure proposed was advantageous to the nation? but, Whether the tory or the whig interest should predominate in parliament? Earl Cowper affirmed, that the part of the bill relating to the Scottish peerage was a manifest violation of the treaty of union, as well as a flagrant piece of injustice, as it would deprive persons of their right, without being heard, and without any pretence of forfeiture on their part. He observed, that the Scottish peers excluded from the number of the twenty-five, stood in a worse condition than any other subjects in the kingdom; for they would be neither electing nor elected, neither representing nor repre sented. These objections were overruled: several resolutions were taken agreeably to the motion; and the judges were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill. This measure alarmed the generality of Scottish peers, as well as many English comminators, who saw in the bill the avenues of dignity and title shut up against them: and they did not fail to explain against it, as an encroachment upon the fundamental maxims of the constitution. Treatises were written and published on both sides, full of the most desperate, and the most subversive, arguments. A national clamour began to arise, when Earl Stanhope observed, in the House, that as the bill had raised strange apprehensions, he thought it advisable to postpone the further consideration of it till a more proper opportunity. It was accordingly put off to the session following. The following was the eighteenth day of April, on which occasion his majesty told both Houses, that the Spanish king had acknowledged the pretender.

§ XVII. The king, having appointed lords justices to rule the kingdom in his absence, embarked in May for Holland, from whence he proceeded to Hanover, where he concluded a peace with Ulrice, the new Queen of Sweden. By this treaty Sweden yielded for ever to the royal and electoral house of Brunswick, the duchies of Brunswick and Verden, with all their dependences: King George obliged himself to pay a million of rix-dollars to the Queen of Sweden; and to renew, as King of Great Britain and Elector of Hanover, the alliances formerly subsisting between his predecessors and that kingdom. He likewise mediated a peace between Sweden and his former allies, the Danes and Prussians, and the Poles. The czar, however, refused to give up his schemes of conquest. He sent his fleet to the Schonen or Bateas of Sweden, where his troops landing, to the number of fifteen thousand, committed dreadful outrages: but Sir John Norris, who commanded an English squadron in those seas, having orders to support the northern Allies, the czar might be committed, the czar, dreading the fate of the Spanish navy, thought proper to recall his fleet. In the Mediterranean, Admiral Byng acted with unwavering vigour in assailing the imperialists to finish the conquest of Sicily. The court of Vienna had agreed to send a strong body of forces to finish the reduction of that island; and the command in this expedition was bestowed upon the Count de Merci, with whom Mr. Pitt, now in his life, was acquainted at Naples. This admiral supplied them with ammunition and artillery from the Spanish provs. He took the whole reinforcement under his convoy, and saw them safely landed in the bay of Patti, to the number of three thousand five hundred horse, and ten thousand infantry. Count Merci thinking himself more than a match for the Spanish forces commanded by the Marquis de Lede, attacked him in a strong camp at Franco-Villa: and was repulsed, with the loss of five thousand men, himself heavily wounded in the action. Here his army must have perished for want of provision, had not they been supplied by the English navy.

§ XVIII. Admiral Byng no sooner learned the bad success of Franco-Villa, than he embarked two battalions from the garrison of Melazzo, and about a thousand recruits, whom he sent under a convoy through the Faro to Schesoli, in order to reinforce the imperial army. He afterwards assisted at a council of war with the German generals, who, in consequence of his advice, undertook the siege of Messina. Then he repaired to Naples, where he proposed to Count Gallais, the new vicerey, that the troops which had conquered or could be stormed should be disembarked in Sicily, and co-operate towards the conquest of that island. The proposal was immediately despatched to the court of Vienna. In the mean time, the admiral returned to Sicily, and assisted at the siege of Messina. That action is considered as the beginning of the expedition; and the remains of the Spanish navy, which had escaped at Passaro, were now destroyed in the Mole. The emperor approved of the scheme proposed by the English admiral, to whom he wrote a very gracious letter, intimating that he had despatched orders to the governor of Milan, to detach the troops designed for Sardinia to Vado, in order to be transported into Italy. The admiral executed that part of the scheme; and having furnished the imperial army before Messina with another supply of cannon, powder, and shot, shot, upon his own credit, he set sail for Vado, where he surmounted numberless difficulties, started by the jealousy of Count Bonveral, who was unwilling to see his troops, destined for Sardinia, now diverted to another expedition, in which he could not enjoy the chief command. At length, Admiral Byng saw the forces embarked, and conveyed them to Messina, and detached the detail of which surrender was made. He gave them up, with all the effects of this surrender. At length, Admiral Byng saw the forces embarked, and conveyed them to Messina, and detached the detail of which surrender was made. He gave them up, with all the effects of this surrender. Had Count Merci been despatched to the court as much as to the emperor, that man of the imperial court, in the centre of the island; and cantoned his troops about Adorno, Palermo, and Messina. The imperial admiral, in the hope of attacking him in this situation, nor could they remain in the neighbourhood of Messina, on account of the scarcity of provisions. They would, therefore, have been obliged to quit the island during the winter, had not the imperial admiral undertaken to transport them by sea to Trapani, where they could extend themselves in a plentiful country. He not only executed this enterprise, but even supplied them with corn from Tunis, as the harvest of Sicily had been gathered into the Spanish magazines. It was the second day of March before the last embarkation of the imperial troops were landed at Trapani.

§ XIX. The Marquis de Lede immediately retired with his army to Alcamo; but the general in command of the marshall-de-camp to Count Merci and the English admiral, with orders for evacuating Sicily. The proposals were not agreeable to the Germans; but Sir George Byng declared that the Spaniards should not quit the island while the war continued, as he foresaw that these troops would be employed against France or England. He agreed, however, with Count Merci, in proposing that, if the Marquis would surrender Palermo, and retire into the middle part of the island, the French and Spaniards might be contained for four weeks, until the sentiments of their different courts should be known. The marquis offered to surrender Palermo, in consideration of a suspension of arms for three months; but Sir George Byng declining this proposal, he received advice from Madrid, that a general peace was concluded. Nevertheless, he broke off the treaty, in obedience to a secret order for that purpose. The King of Spain hoped to obtain the restitution of St. Sebastian's, Fontarabia, and other places taken in the course of the war, in exchange for the treaty of Addiscombe. But the Marquis de Lede, who last gave the admiral and imperial general to understand that he looked upon the peace as a thing concluded; and was ready to treat for a cessation of hostilities. They assisted upon his delivering up Palermo; and when the French and Spanish masters were in treaty, for settling the terms of evacuating Sicily and Sardinia, he did not think himself authorized to agree to a cessation, except on condition that each party should remain on the ground they had conquered, and expect further orders from their principals. After a fruitless interview between the three chiefs at the Cassine de Rossignola, the imperial general resolved to undertake the siege of Palermo: with this view he decamped from Alcamo on the eighteenth day of April, and followed the Marquis de Lede, who retreated before him, and took possession of the advantageous posts that commanded the passes into the plain of Palermo: but Count Merci, with indefatigable industry, succeeded in forcing the坚守. The English admiral coasted along shore, attending the motions of the army. The Spanish general receiving the Germans advancing into the plain, retied under the cannon of Palermo, and fortified his camp with strong entrenchments. On the second day of the siege, the admiral's redoubts by surprise, and the Marquis de Lede ordered all his forces to be drawn out to retake this fortification: both armies were on the point of engaging, when a courier arrived in a felucca, with a packet for the Marquis, containing full powers to treat and agree about the evacuation of the island, and the transportation of the army to Spain. He forthwith drew off his army; and about a thousand of his troops, of this sort. Having established the imperial army before Messina with another supply of cannon, powder, and shot, upon his own credit, he set sail for Vado, where he surmounted numberless difficulties, started by the jealousy of Count Bonveral, who was unwilling to see his troops, destined for Sardinia, now diverted to another expedition, in which he could not enjoy the chief command. At length, Admiral Byng saw the forces embarked, and conveyed them to Messina, and detached the detail of which surrender was made. He gave them up, with all the effects of this surrender. Had Count Merci been despatched to the court as much as to the emperor, that man of the imperial court, in the centre of the island; and cantoned his troops about Adorno, Palermo, and Messina. The imperial admiral, in the hope of attacking him in this situation, nor could they remain in the neighbourhood of Messina, on account of the scarcity of provisions. They would, therefore, have been obliged to quit the island during the winter, had not the imperial admiral undertaken to transport them by sea to Trapani, where they could extend themselves in a plentiful country. He not only executed this enterprise, but even supplied them with corn from Tunis, as the harvest of Sicily had been gathered into the Spanish magazines. It was the second day of March before the last embarkation of the imperial troops were landed at Trapani.

§ XX. The admiral continued in the Mediterranean until he had seen the islands of Sicily and Sardinia evacuated to the last man: and he had executed between the emperor and the Duke of Savoy; in consequence of which, four battalions of Piedmontese troops were transported from Palermo to Sardinia, and the island embark; but the English admiral had to look after the general evacuation of the island. In a word, Admiral Byng bore such a considerate share in this war of Sicily, that the fate of the island depended wholly on his courage, vigilance, and conduct. When he waited on his majesty at Hanover, he met with a very gracious reception. The king told him he had found out the secret of obliging his enemies as well as his friends; for the court of Spain had mentioned him in the most honourable terms, with respect to his candid and friendly deportment, in providing transports and other necessary means for the embarkation of their troops, and in protecting them from oppression. He was appointed treasure of the navy, and rear-admiral of Great Britain: in a little time the king ennobled him, by the title of Viscount Travers, and he was declared a French ambassador; and afterwards made Knight of the Bath, at the revival of that order. During these occurrences in the Mediterranean, the Duke of Berwick advanced with the French army to the frontiers of Spain, where he took Port-Plans and, destroyed a great number of vessels that were on the stocks: then he reduced Fontarabia and St. Sebastian's, together with Port Antonio in the bottom of the bay of Bescay. In this last exploit the Spanish admiral, the Duke of Berwick, and the Spanish general, the Duke of Trapani, who burned two large ships unfinished, and a great quantity of naval stores. The King of England, with a view to indemnify himself for the expense of the war, projected the conquest of Coromina in Bescay, and of Ferri in South America. Four thousand men and a command were collected there; and Colham, were embarked at the Isle of Wight, and sailed on the twenty-first day of September, under convoy of five ships of war, conducted by Admiral Mignes. Instead of making an attempt upon Corunna, they reduced Vigo with very little difficulty; and Point-a-Vedra submitted within a short time. This was a very important event for the navy, the seas, and military stores, with which they returned to England. In the meantime, Captain Johnson, with two English ships of war, destroyed the same number of Spanish ships in the port of Ribadeso, to the eastward of Cape Ortegal; so that the loss was both great and serious. The expedition to the West Indies was prevented by the peace. Spain being oppressed on all sides, and utterly exhausted, Philip saw the necessity of a speedy pacification, and, indeed, was unable to resist the influence of his ambitious projects. That minister was personally disagreeable to the emperor, the King of England, and the Regent of France, who had declared they would hear to no proposals while he should continue in office: the Spanish monarch, therefore, divested him of his employment, and ordered him to quit the kingdom in three weeks. The Marquis de Heretti Landi, minister from the court of Madrid at the Hague, delivered a plan of pacification to the House of Lords: but it was rejected by the allies; and Philip was obliged at last to accede to the quadruple alliance.

§ XXI. On the fourteenth day of November, King George returned to England, and on the twenty-third opened the first session of Parliament in which he was to be tell’d, that all Europe, as well as Great Britain, was on the point of being delivered from the calamities of war, by the influence of British arms and councils. He exhibited the state of the country, courting the discharging the debts of the nation; and concluded with a panegyric upon his own government. It must be owned he had acted with equal vigour and deliberation in all the troubles he had encountered since his accession to the throne. The addresses of both Houses were as warm as he could desire. They in particular extolled him for having interposed in behalf of the protestants of Hungary, Poland, and Germany, who had been oppressed by the prerogatives of the Spanish clergy, and presented to him memorials, containing a detail of their grievances. He and all the other protestant powers warmly interceded in their favour; but the grievances were not redressed. The peerage bill was now revived by the Duke of Buckingham; and in spite of all opposition, passed through the House of Lords. It had been projected by Earl Stanhope, and eagerly supported by the Earl of Sunderland; therefore, Mr. Robert Walpole attacked it in the House of Commons. But there was a debate in which he was opposed by a considerable number of whig members; and, after warm debates, rejected by a large majority. The next object that engaged the attention of the parliament was the present state of the nation, and the attempts that had been made upon the crown of Great Britain. Maurice Annesley had appealed to the House of Peers in England, from a decree of the House of Peers in Ireland, which was reversed. The British Peers ordered the haunts of the exchequer in Ireland to be ransacked in the hands he had lost by the decree in that kingdom. The barrons obeyed this order; and the Irish House of Peers passed a vote against them, as having acted in derogation to the king’s prerogative in his high court of parliament in Ireland, as also of the rights and privileges of that kingdom, and of the parliament thereof; they, likewise, ordered them to be taken into custody of the usher of the black rod; they transmitted a long representation to the king, demonstrating their right to the final judicature of causes: and the Duke of Leeds, in the upper house, urged fifteen reasons to support the claim of the Irish Peers. Notwithstanding these arguments, the House of Lords in England resolved that the haunts of the exchequer in Ireland had acted with courage, according to law, in support of his majesty’s prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great Britain. They addressed the king to confer on them the privilege of their arms, as a compensation for the ill usage they had undergone. Finally, they prepared the bill, by which the Irish House of Lords was deprived of all right to pass sentence, affirm, or reverse any judgment or decree given by the peers in the court of that kingdom. In the House of Commons it was opposed by Mr. Pitt, Mr. Humberford, Lords Molesworth and Tyrconnel; but was carried by the majority and received the royal assent.

§ XXII. The king having recommended to the Commons the consideration of the proposed scheme for reducing the national debt, was a prelude to the famous South Sea act, which became productive of so much mischief and injustice. The scheme was projected by Sir John Blunt, who had been bred a scrivener, and was possessed of all the cunning, plausible, and sly artifices which would be necessary to an undertaking. He communicated his plan to Mr. Aslamb, the chancellor of the exchequer, as well as to one of the secretaries of state. He answered all their objections; and the project was accepted. All through it, there was a private advantage in the execution of the design, which was imparted in the name of the South Sea company, of which Blunt was a director, who influenced all their proceedings. The pretence for the scheme was to discharge the national debt, by reducing all the funds into one. The bank and South Sea company outbid each other. The South Sea company altered their original plan, and offered such high terms to government, that the proposals of the bank were rejected; and a bill was ordered to be brought into the House of Commons, formed on the plan presented by the South Sea company. While this affair was in agitation, the stock of that company rose from one hundred and thirty to near four hundred, in consequence of the conduct of the Commons, who had rejected a motion for a clause in the bill, to fix what share in the capital stock of the company should be vested in the stockholders; but all the annuities who might voluntarily subscribe; or how many years’ purchase in money they should receive in subscribing, at the choice of the proprietors. In the House of Lords, the bill was opposed by Lord North and Grey, Earl Cowper, Earl Annesley, Duke of Wharton, Buckingham, and other peers. They affirmed it was calculated for enriching a few and impoverishing a great number; that it countenanced the fraudulent and pernicious practice of stock-jobbing, which diverted the genius of the people from trade and industry; that it would give foreigners the opportunity to double and treble the vast sums they had in the public funds; and they would be tempted to realize and withdraw their capital and immense gains to other countries; so that Great Britain would be drained of its gold and silver; that the artificial and prodigious rise of the South Sea stock was a dangerous blast, which might destroy many unwary people to their ruin; and, besides, by which the nation was to be deprived of the fruits of their industry, to purchase imaginary riches; that the addition of above thirty million capital would give such power to the South Sea company, as might destroy the liberties of the nation, and render all further liberty hopeless. For by their extensive interest they would be able to influence most if not all the elections of the members; and consequently overrule the resolutions of the House of Commons. Earl Cowper urged, that in all public bargains the individuals in the administration ought to take care, that they should be more advantageous to the state than to private persons; but that a contrary method had been followed in the contract made with the South Sea company; for, should the stocks be kept at the advanced price to which they had been raised by the oblique arts of stock-jobbing, either that company or its principal members would gain above thirty millions, of which no more than one fourth part would be given towards the discharge of the national debts. He apprehended that the re-purchase of annuities would meet with insuperable difficulties; and, in such case, none but a few persons who were in the secret, who had bought stocks at a high price, and afterwards sold them at a high price, would in the end gain any by the project. The Earl of Sunderland answered their objections. He declared that those who countenanced the scheme, the South Sea company, and the nation by its vote, but the advantage of the nation. He owned that the managers for that company had undoubtedly a prospect of private gain, either to themselves or to their corporation; but, he said, when the scheme was accepted, either the one or the other could foresee that the stock would have risen to such a height; that if they had con-continued as they were, the public would have had the far greater share of the advantage accruing from the scheme; and should they be kept up to the present high price, it was but reasonable that the South Sea company should engage such a sum as procured to it, as a premium and inducement to the wise managers and industry of the directors, which would enable it to make large dividends, and thereby accomplish the purpose of the scheme. The bull passed without amendment or division; and on the seventh day of April, received the royal assent. A committee was thus act the South Sea company authorized to take in, by purchase or subscription, the irredeemable debts of the nation, stated at sixteen millions five hundred forty-six thousand four hundred eighty-two pounds, one shilling, and as they should find it convenient before the first day of March of the ensuing year, and without any compulsion on any of the proprietors, at such rates and prices as should be agreed upon between the company and the respective proprietors. They were likewise authorized to take in all the redeemable debts, amounting to the same sum as that of the irredeemables, either by purchase, by taking subscriptions, or by paying off the creditors. For the liberty of taking in the national debts, and increasing their capital stock accordingly, the company consented that their present, and to be increased, annuity, should be continued at five per cent. till Midsummer, in the year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven, and reduced to four per cent. and be redeemable by parliament. In consideration of this and other advantages expressed in the act, the company declared themselves willing to make such subscriptions to the receipt of the exchequer as was specified for the use of the public, to be applied to the discharge of the public debts incurred before Christmas, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixteen. The sums they were obliged to pay for the liberty of taking in the irredeemable debts, four years and a half’s purchase for all long and short annuities that should be subscribed, and one year’s purchase for such long annuities as should not be subscribed, amounted on the execution of the act to about seven millions. For enabling the company to raise this sum, they were empowered to make calls for money from their members; to open books of subscription; to grant annuities redeemable by the company; to borrow money upon any contract or bill under their common seal, or on the credit of their capital stock: to convert the money demanded of their members into additional stock, without, however, making any addition to the company’s annuities, public or out of the public duties. It was enacted, that out of the money arising from the sums paid by the company into the exchequer, such public debts, carrying interest at five per cent. incurred before the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-one, and any debts that were then, or might be redeemed before the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-two, should be discharged to the first place; that then all the remainder should be applied towards paying off so much of the capital stock of the company as should then carry an interest of five per cent. It was likewise provided, that after Midsummer, in the year one thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven, the company should not be paid off in any sums being less than one million at a time.

§ XXIII. The heads of the Royal Assurance and London Assurance companies, understanding that the civil list was considerably in arrears, offered to the ministry six hundred thousand pounds towards the discharge of that debt, on condition of their obtaining the king’s charter, with a parliamentary sanction, for the establishment of their respective companies. The proposal was embraced; and the king communicated it in a message to the House of Commons, desiring their concurrence. A bill was immediately passed, enabling his majesty to grant letters of incorporation to two companies; one for the Royal assent: and, on the eleventh day of June, an end was put to the session. This was the age of interested projects, inspired by a venal spirit of adventure, the natural consequence of that avarice, fraud, and profusion, which the unforeseen combinations had in others the most unfavourable era for an historian. A reader of sentiment and imagination cannot be entertained or interested by a dry detail of such transactions as admit of no warmth, no colouring, no embellishment; a detail which serves only to exhibit an inanimate picture of tasteless vice and profligacy, without the vigilance of government. § XXIV. By this time an alliance offensive and defensive was concluded at Stockholm between King George and the Queen of Sweden, by which his majesty engaged to send a fleet into the Baltic, to act against the Czar of Muscovy and the states of the Northern Union; and the Queen of Sweden promised peace. Peter loudly complained of the insolent interposition of King George, alleging that he had failed in his engagements, both as Elector of Hanover and King of Great Britain. The King of Denmark, at such a time, was still anxious for the preservation of peace without a mediator. At the instances, however, of King George and the Regent of France, a treaty of peace was signed between the Queen of Sweden and the King of Prussia, to whom that princess ceded the city of Stettin, in the district between the rivers Oder and Pehnne, with the isles of Wolin and Usedom. On the other hand, he engaged to join the King of Great Britain in his endeavours to effect a peace between Sweden and Denmark, on condition of the King of Denmark having the same terms of peace at Ulrice that part of Pomerania which he had seized; he likewise promised to pay to that queen two millions of rixdolls, in consideration of the cessions she had made. The treaty was signed at Frederickstadt in the month of June, through the mediation of the King of Great Britain, who became guarantee for the Dane’s keeping possession of Sleswick. He consented, however, to restore the Upper Pomerania, the isle of Rugen, the city of Wismar, the Danish dominions, and all that part of Pomerania which he had seized from Sweden during the war, in consideration of Sweden’s renouncing the exemption from toll in the Sound, and the two belts and paying to Denmark six hundred thousand rix-dollars.

§ XXV. Sir John Norris had again sailed to the Baltic with a strong squadron, to give weight to the king’s mediation. When he arrived at Copenhagen he wrote a letter to Prince Dolgorouki, the czar’s ambassador at the court of Denmark, signifying that he and the king’s envoy at Stockholm were vested with full powers to act jointly or separately in quality of plenipotentiaries, in order to effect a peace between Sweden and Muscovy, in the way of mediation. The prince immediately opposed nothing more at heart than peace and tranquillity; and in case his Britannic majesty had any proposals to make to that prince, he hoped the admiral would excuse him from receiving them, as it was not the wish of parliament to meddle with any compeansoua way. The English fleet immediately joined that of Sweden as auxiliaries; but they had no opportunity of acting against the Russian squadron, which secured itself in Revel. Ulrice, Queen of Sweden, and sister to Charles XII., had married the Prince of Hesse, and was extremely desirous that he should be joined with her in the administration of the regal power. She wrote a separate letter to each of the states, desiring they would confer on him the regency; and after some opposition from the nobles, he was actually elected King of Sweden. He sent one of his general officers to notify his elevation to the czar, who congratulated him upon his accession to the throne; this was the beginning of the negotiation which ended in peace, and in establishing the tranquillity of the north. In the midst of these transactions, King George set out from England for his Hanoverian dominions; but, before he departed from Great Britain, he was reconciled to his marriage by the mediation of the Duke of Devonshire and Mr. Walpole, who, with Earl Cowper, Lord Townshend, Mr. Methuen, and Mr. Pelham, were received into favour, and, not long after, were taken into the king’s counsels. Dorset and Bridgewater were promoted to the title of dukes: Lord Viscount Castletown was made an earl; Hugh Boscawen was created a baron, and Viscount Falmouth; and John Wallop, baron, and Viscount of Lyne, were created earls.

§ XXVI. While the king was involved in a labyrinth of negotiations, the South Sea scheme produced a kind of national delirium in the English dominions. Blunt, the projector, had taken the hint of his plan from the famous Mississippi scheme formed by Law, which in the preceding year had raised such a ferment in France, and in the number of the subscribers of that country. In the kingdom. In this scheme of Law, there was something substantial. An exclusive trade to Louisiana promised some advantage: though the design was defeated by the principle, it was not abandoned. The idea became the dupe of the regent, who transferred the burden of fifteen hundred millions of the king's debts to the shoulders of the subject; while the projector was sacrificed as the scape-goat of political iniquity. The South Sea scheme exceeded two millions of original stock. In a few days this stock advanced to three hundred and forty pounds; and the subscriptions were sold for double the price of the first payment. Without entering into a detail of the proceedings, or explaining the ... that all was not as it seemed, or that the faith of the country was to be purchased with the stock ...ing millions of the South Sea stock, occasioned such a run upon the bank, that the money was paid away faster than it could be received from the subscribers. Then the South Sea stock was again at its height; and the directors of the bank, finding themselves in danger of being involved in that company's ruin, renounced the agreement, which, indeed, they were under no obligation to perform, for it was drawn up in such a manner, as to be no more than the rough draft of a subsequent agreement, without due form, penalty, or clause of obligation. All expedients having failed, and the clamours of the people daily increasing, expressses were despatched to Hanover, representing the state of the nation, and imploring the king to return. He accordingly shortened his intended stay in Germany, and arrived in England on the eleventh day of November. § XXVIII. The parliament being assembled on the eighth day of December, his majesty expressed his concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which had so deeply affected the public credit at home; he earnestly desired the Commons to consider of the most effectual, speedy, and lasting measures to restore public credit, and fix it upon a sure and lasting establishment. The lower House was too much interested in the calamity, to postpone the consideration of that subject. The members seemed to lay aside all party distinctions, and vie with each other in promoting an inquiry, by which justice might be done to the injured nation. They ordered the directors to produce an account of all their proceedings. Sir Joseph Jekyll moved, that a select committee might be appointed, to examine the particulars of this transaction. Mr. Walpole, now paymaster of the forces, observed, that such a method would protect the inquiry while the public credit lay in a bleeding condition. He told the House he had for some time been in the habit of communicating this plan, desired to know whether the subscriptions of public debts and encumberances, money subscriptions, and other contracts made with the South Sea company, should remain in the present state. After a warm debate, the question was carried in the affirmative, with this addition, "Unless altered for the ease and relief of the proprietors, by a general court of the South Sea company, or set aside in due course of law," the petition of the South Sea company, to engraft nine millions of South Sea stock into the bank of England, and the like sum into the East India company, on certain conditions. The House voted, that proposals should be received from the bank, and those two companies, on this subject. These being de-liered, the Commons resolved, that an engrossment of nine millions of the capital stock of the South Sea company, into the capital stock of the bank and East India company as proposed by these companies, would contribute very much to the public credit. A bill upon this resolution was brought in, passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent. Another bill was enacted into a law, for restraining the sub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treasurer, under-treasurer, cashier, secretary, and accountant of the South Sea company, from quitting the kingdom, till the end of the next session of parliament; and for discovering their estates and effects, so as to prevent them from being transported or alienated. A committee of seven was appointed by each House to examine all the books, papers, and proceedings, relating to the execution of the South Sea act.

§ XXIX. The Lords were not less eager than the Commons to prosecute this inquiry, though divers members in both Houses were deeply involved in the guilt and infamy of the transaction. Earl Stanhope said the estates of the criminals, whether directors or not directors, ought to be confiscated, to repress the public losses. He was seconded by Lord Cartarec, and even by the Earl of Sunderland. The Duke of Wharton declared he would give up the best friend he had, should he be found guilty. He observed, that the nation had been plundered in a most flagrant and notorious manner; therefore, he expected the House would punish the offenders severely, without respect to persons. The sub and deputy governors, the directors and officers of the South Sea company, were examined at the bar of the House, where a bill was brought in, disabling them to enjoy any office in that company, or in the East India company, or in the bank of England. Three brokers were likewise examined, and made great discoveries. Knight, the treasurer of the South Sea company, who had been entrusted with the secrets of the whole affair, thought proper to withdraw himself from the kingdom. A proclamation was issued to apprehend him; and another for preventing any of the directors from escaping out of the kingdom. At this period the secret committee informed the House of Commons, that they had already discovered a train of the deepest villany and fraud that hell ever conceived to ruin a nation, which in due time they would lay before the House: in the meanwhile, they thought it necessary to secure the persons of some of the directors and principal officers of the South Sea company, as well as to seize their papers. An order was made to secure the books and papers of Knight, Surman, and Turner. The persons of Sir George Caswell, Sir John Blunt, Sir John Lambert, Sir John Fellowes, and Mr. Grisby were taken into custody. Sir Theodore Jansen, Mr. Sawbridge, Sir Robert Chaplin, and Mr. Eyles were examined on similar charges, and had been dismissed by the House. The committee of the Lords, having received an account from the Earl of Sunderland, Mr. Crags, senior, the Duchess of Kendal, the Countess of Platen, and her two nieces, Mr. Secretary Crags, and Mr. Aislabie, chancellor of the exchequer, in consequence of the committee's report, the House came to several severe though just resolutions against the directors and officers of the South Sea company; and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy sufferers. Mr. Stanhope, one of the secretaries of the treasury, charged in the report with having large quantities of stock and subscriptions, desired that he might have an opportunity to clear himself. His request was granted; and the affair being discussed, he was cleared by a majority of three votes. The great part of his accusations was corroborated by Mr. Aislabie, who declared that he had been employed by Knight for the use of the Earl of Sunderland. Great part of the House entered eagerly into this inquiry; and a violent dispute ensued. The whole strength of the ministry was mustered in his defence. The majority declared it to be an immoral and improper question, as an abuse of the House, and an injury to the country. He resigned his place of first commissioner in the treasury, which was bestowed upon Mr. Robert Walpole; but he still retained the confidence of his master. With respect to Mr. Aislabie, the evidence appeared so strong against him, that the Commons resolved, he had promoted the destructive execution of the South Sea scheme, with a view to his own exorbitant profit, and combined with the directors in their pernicious practices, to the ruin of public credit. He was expelled the House, and committed to the Tower. Mr. Crags, senior, died of the leprosy, before he underwent the censure of the House. In contempt of the laws and practices, they resolved that the first document should incorporate with Robert Knight, and some of the directors in carrying on their scandalous practices; and therefore, all the estate of which he was possessed, from the first day of December in the preceding year, should be applied to the relief of the unhappy sufferers in the South Sea company. The directors, in obedience to the order of the House, delivered in inventories of their estates, which were confiscated, and taken against the public, for making good the damages sustained by the company, after a certain allowance was deducted for each, according to his conduct and circumstances.

§ XXX. The Lords, in the course of their examination, discovered that large portions of South Sea stock had been given to several persons in the administration and House of Commons, for promoting the passing of the South Sea act. The House immediately resolved, that this practice was a notorious and most dangerous species of corruption: that the directors of the South Sea company having ordered great quantities of their stock to be bought for the service of the company, when it was at a very high price, and on pretence of keeping up the price of stock, and at the same time several of the directors, and other officers belonging to the company, having, in a clandestine manner, sold their own stock to the company, such directors and officers were guilty of a notorious fraud and breach of trust, and their so doing was one great cause of the unhappy turn of affairs, that had so much affected public credit, and rendered the South Sea company an infamous confederacy, in which, however, the innocent were confounded with the guilty. Sir John Blunt, refusing to answer certain interrogations, a violent debate arose; and was still pending in which the Duke of Wharton observed, that the government of the best princes was sometimes rendered intolerable to their subjects by bad ministers: he mentioned the example of Sejanus, who had made a division in the imperial family, and rendered the reign of Claudius hateful to the Romans. Earl Stanhope considering this reflection was made at a time when himself was employed to vindicate the ministry, and spoke with such vehemence as produced a violent head-ache, which obliged him to retire. He underwent proper evacuations, and was removed to the Great House; but next day his life was in danger. He was then sent to the Tower. The Duke of Buckingham was concerned the House was survived but a few days by the other secretary, Mr. Crags, who died of the small-pox on the sixteenth day of February. Knight, the cashier of the South Sea company, being seated at Trelimont, by the vigilance of Mr. Gandot, secretary to Mr. Leathes, the British resident at Brussels, was confined in the citadel of Antwerp. Application was made to the court of Vienna, that he should be delivered to such persons as might be appointed to receive him: but he had found means to interest the states of Brabant in his behalf. They insisted upon their privilege granted by charter, that no person apprehended for any crime in Brabant should be tried in any other nation. They therefore released him, and dismissed his indignation at this frivolous pretence; instances were renewed to the emperor: and in the mean time Knight escaped from the citadel of Antwerp.
the mischief which the scheme had produced. This was a very difficult task, on account of the contending interests of those engaged in the South Sea company, which rendered it impossible to relieve some but at the expense of others. Sometimes personal passions, and sometimes interests, pressed with an address to the king, explaining the motives of their proceedings. On the twenty-ninth day of July the parliament was protracted for two days only. Then his majesty met the Lords and the House of Commons, and was now called together again so suddenly, that they might resume the consideration of the state of public credit. The Commons immediately prepared a bill upon the resolutions they had taken. The whole capital stock, at the end of the year one thousand millions, and twenty, amounted to about thirty-seven millions eight hundred thousand pounds. The stock allotted to all the proprietors did not exceed twenty-four millions five hundred thousand pounds: the remaining capital stock belonged to the company in their corporate capacity. It was the profit arising from the execution of the South Sea scheme; and out of this the bill enacted, that seven millions should be paid to the public. The present act likewise directed several additions to be made to the stock of the proprietors, out of that portion possessed by the company in their right; it made a particular distribution of stock, amounting to two millions two hundred thousand pounds; and upon remitting five millions of the seven to be paid to the public, annihilated two millions of their capital. It was enacted, that after these distributions, the remaining capital stock should be divided among all the proprietors. This dividend amounted to eight million four hundred thousand pounds; it raised the capital stock of eight millions nine hundred thousand pounds. They had lent above eleven millions on stock unredeemed; of which the parliament deducted all that part of their paying six per cent. Upon this article the company’s loss exceeded six millions nine hundred thousand pounds; for many debtors refused to make any payment. The proprietors of the stock loudly complained of their being deprived of two millions; and the parliament in the sequel revoked that sum which had been annihilated. While this affair was in agitation, petitions from counties, cities, and boroughs, in all parts of the kingdom, were presented to the House, crying for justice against the villany of the directors. Pamphlets and papers were daily published on the same subject; so that the whole nation was exasperated to the highest pitch of resentment. Nevertheless, by the wise and vigorous resolutions of the House, the South Sea company was soon in a condition to fulfil their engagements with regard to the ferment of the people subsided; and the credit of the nation was restored.

proposed it should be replaced to the civil list, and reimbursed by a deduction from the salaries and wages of all officers, as well as from the pensions and other payments from the crown. A bill was prepared for this purpose, though not without warm opposition; and, at the same time, one for a general pardon. On the twentieth day of August, the king closed the session with a speech, in which he expressed his concern for the sufferings of the innocent, and a just indignation against the guilty, with respect to the South Sea adventure. The professions of the persons judged necessary to clear his own character, which had incurred the suspicion of some people, who whispered that he was not altogether free from connexions with the project; and that the emperor had, at his desire, refused to deliver up Knight; and that he favoured the directors and their accomplices.

§ 111. Lords Townshend and Carteret were now appointed secretaries of state; and the Earl of Illy was vested with the office of lord privy seal of Scotland. In June the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain was signed at Madrid. The contracting parties engaged to restore mutually all the effects wrenched and confiscated on both sides. In particular, the King of England promised to restore all the ships of the Spanish fleet which had been taken in the Mediterranean, or the value of them, if they were sold. He likewise promised, in a secret article, that he would not interfere in the affairs of Italy punishable by the King of Spain, made an absolute cession of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon. At the same time, a defensive alliance was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Spain. All remaining difficulties were referred to a congress at Cambrai, where they hoped to consolidate a general peace, by determining all differences between the emperor and his catholic majesty. In the mean time, the powers of the King of France, Spain, and England, engaged, by virtue of the present treaty, to grant to the Duke of Parma a particular protection for the preservation of his territories and rights, and for the support of his dignity. It was also stipulated, that the States-general should be invited to accede to this advantage.

The congress at Cambrai was opened; but the demands on both sides were so high, that it proved ineffectual. In the mean time, the peace between Russia and Sweden was concluded on condition that the czar should retain Livonia, Ingeria, Estonia, part of Carelia, and of the territory of Wyborg, Riga, Revel, and Narva, in consideration of his restoring part of Finland, and paying two millions of rix-dollars to the King of Sweden. The personal animosity subsisting between King George and the Czar, and the secret, personal interest at London, having presented a memorial that contained some unguarded expressions, was ordered to quit the kingdom in a fortnight. The czar published a declaration at Petersburg, complaining of this outrage, which, he said, had endangered the crown itself; but, as he perceived it was done without any regard to the concerns of England, and only in favour of the Hanoverian interest, he was unwilling that the English nation should suffer for a piece of injustice in which they had no share. He therefore granted to them all manner of security, and free liberty to trade in all his dominions. To finish this strange tissue of negotiations, King George concluded a treaty with the Moors of Africa, against which the Spaniards loudly exclaimed.

IV. In the course of this year, Pope Clement XI. died; and the Princess of Wales was delivered of a prince, baptized by the name of William Augustus, the Duke of Cumberland. A dreadful plague raging at Marseilles, a proclamation was published, forbidding any person to come into England, from any part of France between the Bay of Hossey and Dunkirk, without certificates of health. Other precautions were taken to guard against contagion. An act of parliament had passed in the preceding session, for the prevention of infection, by building pest-houses, to which all the infected persons, and all persons of an infected state, should be carrying trenches and lines round any city, town, or place infected. The king, in his speech at opening the session of parliament, on the eleventh day of October, intimated the passage of the North, by the conclusion of the treaty between Muscovy and Sweden. He desired the House of Commons to consider of means for easing the duties upon the imported commodities used in the manufactures of the kingdom. He observed, that the nation might be supplied with naval stores from our own colonies in North America; and that their being employed in this useful species of trade, would prevent their being taken from setting up manufactures which directly interfered with those of Great Britain. He expressed a desire that, with respect to the supplies, his people might reap some immediate advantage; and that they might be permitted to carry the produce of their labours abroad: and he earnestly recommended to their consideration means for preventing the plague, particularly by providing against the practice of smuggling. nation groaned under the pressure of heavy debts, incurred by the former long, expensive war. He, therefore, moved for an address to his majesty, desiring that the instructions given to Sir George Byng, now Lord Torrington, should be laid before the House. This motion, although it was made, and the question taken, no protest was entered. They voted an address, however, to know in what manner the king had disposed of the ships taken from the Spaniards. Duties were also fixed on the bill to prevent infection. Earl Cowper represented, that the number of public houses, a tavern, or post-house, by order of the government, and the drawing lines and trenches round places infected, were powers unknown to the British constitution; inconsistent with the liberty of a subject such as could not be wisely or usefully put in practice; the more odious, because copied from the arbitrary government of France; and impracticable, except by military compulsion. These clauses or accusations were accordingly repealed, though not without great opposition. Indeed, nothing can be more absurd than a constitution that will not admit of just and necessary laws and regulations to prevent the dire consequences of the worst of all calamities. Such restrictions, instead of favouring the liberty of a free government, would be the most cruel imposition that could be laid on a free people, as it would act in diametrical opposition to the great principle of society, which is the preservation of the individual. § VII. The quakers having presented a petition to the House of Commons, praying that a bill might be brought in for omitting, in their solemn affirmation, the words, "...the king's most odious..." with their request: but the bill gave rise to a warm debate among the peers. Dr. Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, said he did not know why such a distinguishing mark of indigulgence should be allowed to a set of people who were hardly Christians. He was supported by the Archbishop of York, the Earl of Stratford, and Lord North and Grey. A petition was presented against the bill by the London clergy, who expressed a serious concern lest the minds of good men should be prejudiced against such measures as those that were immediately to be debated. They deplored the establishment of a free trade, and the chances of the French nation; and, in their opinion, the king was not justified in acting on such principles. They argued that the House should not consent to such a measure, unless it was convinced of the necessity of the thing. The House resolved that such lords as might enter protestations with reason should do it before two o'clock on the next sitting day, and sign them before the House rises. The supplies being granted, and the business of the House concluded, there was no time to be lost, and the House rose.

Annals.
H. C. Deb., in Parl., Part II, p. 179. Ind.

§ VIII. In the beginning of May, the king a D. 1721. is said to have received from the Duke of Or- leans full and certain information of a fresh conspiracy formed against his person and government. A camp was immediately formed in Hyde Park. All military officers were ordered to repair to their respective commands. Lieutenant-General Macartney was despatched to Ireland to bring over some troops from that kingdom. Some suspected persons were imprisoned in Scotland; the States of Holland were desired to have their auxiliary or guarantee troops in readiness to be embarked; and Colonel Churchill was sent to the court of France with a private commission. The ap- proach of this royal army greatly increased the credit. South Sea stock began to fall; and crowds of people who called from the bank. Lord Townsend wrote a letter to the mayor of London, by the king's command, signifying his majesty's having received unquestionable advices, that several of his subjects had entered into a wicked conspiracy, in concert with French agents abroad, for raising a rising in favour of the pretender; but that he was firmly assured the authors of it neither were nor would be supported by any foreign power. This letter was immediately answered by an affectionate address from the court of aldermen; and the example of London was followed by many other towns and boroughs. The king had determined to visit Hanover, and actually settled a regency, in which the Prince of Wales was not included: but now this intended journey was laid aside; the crown was restored to the king, and the prince retired to Richmond. The Bishop of Rochester having been seized, with his papers, was examined before a committee of the council, who committed him to the Tower for high treason. The Earl of Ortery, Lord North and Grey, Mr. Cockran, and Mr. Smith, from Scotland, and Mr. Christopher Layer, a young gentleman of the Temple, were confined in the same place. Mr. George Kelly, an Irish clergyman, Mr. Robert Collins of Hunting- donshire, Mr. Bengley, Mr. Fleetwood, Neumon, a priest, and several persons, were taken into custody; and Mr. Shippen's house was searched. After Bishop Atterbury had remained a fortnight in the Tower, Sir Constan- tine Phipps presented a petition to the court at the Old Bailey, in the name of Mrs. Athers, that plumber's daughter, praying, that, in consideration of the bishop's ill state of health, he might be either brought to a speedy trial, or else, if there were no cause of the change in the king's opinion, that he be restored to Kingston, and churchmen through the whole kingdom were filled with indignation at the confinement of a bishop, which they said was an outrage upon the church of England, and the national custom of persons who were near the king's person. The clergy ventured to offer up public prayers for his health, in almost all the churches and chapels of London and Westminster. In the meantime the king, attended by the Prince of Wales, made a summer progress through the western counties. § IX. The new parliament being assembled on the ninth day of October, his majesty made them acquainted with the nature of the conspiracy. He said the conspirators had, by their emissaries, made the strongest instances for success from foreign powers; but were disappointed in their expectations. That, nevertheless, in confining in their numbers, they had resolved once more upon their own strength, to attempt the subversion of his government. He said they had been enabled considerably to increase the number of the guards and to engage great number of officers from abroad; secured large quantities of arms and ammunition; and had not the plot been timely discovered, the whole nation, and particularly the city of London, would have been involved in a state of blood and confusion. He expressed the nation's agreement with the laws and measures of the king; and, in the meantime, to continue to make the laws of the realm the rule and measure of all his actions. Such addresses were presented by both houses as the fears and attachment of the majority appear to have been determined on such an occasion. A bill was brought into the House of Lords, for suspending the habeas corpus act for a whole year; but they were far from being unanimous in agreeing to such an unusual length of time. By this suspending the habeas corpus, the ministry with a dictatorial power over the liberties of the people.

§ X. The opposition in the House of Commons was so violent, that Mr. Robert Walpole found it necessary to alarm their apprehensions by a dreadful story of a design to seize the bank and exchequer, and to proclaim the per- former on the Royal Exchange. Their passions being in- flamed by this new information, the house passed the bill, which immediately received the royal assent. The Duke of Norfolk being brought from Bath, was examined before time greatly impaired. He was interned in Westminster abbey, with such professor of funeral orations, as excelled the pride and oratorical, much of the manner and eloquence of the orator, of whom the oration, which was pronounced as master of orations, and colonel of the first regiment of foot guards, by Earl Cadogan. the council, and committed to the Tower, on suspicion of high treason. On the sixteenth day of November, the king sent to the House of Peers the original and printed copy of a declaration signed by the pretender. It was dated the twenty-third of September, in the present year, and appeared to be a proposal addressed to the subjects of Great Britain and Ireland, as well as to all foreign princes and states. In this paper, the Chevalier declared himself to be King James in right of his mother, the queen of Great Britain, and the throne of Ireland, laying violent hands upon the persons of his most sacred majesty and the Prince of Wales, in order to subvert our present happy establishment in church and state, by placing a popish pretender upon the throne. This declaration, and the great invasions of the natural rights of mankind, and the state of proscription in which he supposed every honest man to be, very gravely proposed, that if King George would refuse to grant him the throne of Great Britain, he would, in return, bestow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other states to confirm it; he likewise promised to leave to King George his succession to the British dominions secure, whenever, in due course, his natural right should take place. The lords unanimously resolved, that this declaration was a false, insolent, and traitorous libel; and ordered it to be burned at the royal exchange. The Commons concurred in these resolutions. Both houses joined in an address, expressing their utmost astonishment and indignation at the surprising insolence of the pretender; and assuring his majesty, they were determined to support his title to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland. They prepared a bill for raising one hundred thousand pounds upon the real and personal estates of all papists, or persons educated in the papish religion, towards defraying the expenses of the late and present invasion. This bill, though strenuously opposed by some moderate members, as a species of persecution, was sent up to the house of lords, together with another, obliging all persons, being papists, in Scotland, and all persons in Great Britain refusing or neglecting to take the oaths appointed for the security of the king's person and government, to register their names and real estates. Both these bills passed through the upper house without amendments, and received the royal sanction.

§ XI. Mr. Layer, being brought to his trial at the king's bench, on the twenty-first day of November, was convicted of having enlisted men for the pretender's service, in order to stir up a rebellion, and received sentence of death. He was reprieved for some time, and examined by a committee of the house of commons: but he either could not, or would not, discover the particulars of the conspiracy, so that he suffered death at tyburn, and his head was fixed up in the fields. Mr. Fullemey, chairman of the common council committee, reported to the house, that, from the examination of layer and others, a design had been formed by persons of figure and distinction at home, in conjunction with traitors in the colonies, to raise and proclaim the duke of orrery, lord north and lord rochester, as his majesty's. that their first intention was to procure a body of foreign troops to invade the kingdom at the time of the late elections; but that the conspirators being disapponted in this expectation, resolved to make an attempt at the time that it was generally believed the king intended to go to hanover, by the help of such officers and soldiers as could pass into england unobserved, from abroad, under the command of the late duke of ormond, who was to have landed in the river with a great quantity of arms, provided in spain for that purpose; at which time the tower was to have been seized. That this scheme being also defeated by the vigilance of the government, they deferred their enterprise till the breaking up of the camp; and, in the meantime, employed their agents to corrupt and seduce the officers and soldiers of the army: that it appeared from several letters and circumstances, that the late duke of ormond, the duke of norfolk, the earl of orrery, lord north and lord rochester, were concerned in this conspiracy; that their acting agents were christopher layer and john plunket, who travelled together to home; dennis kelly, george kelly, william carter, john powell, and the irish priest, who by this time was drowned in the river thames, in attempting to make his escape from the messenger's house, mrs. spilman, also yallop, and john spilman.

§ XII. This pretended conspiracy, in all likelihood, extended no further than the first rudiments of a design that was never digested into any regular form; otherwise the persons said to be concerned in it must have been infatuated to a degree of frenzy: for they were charged with the king's military committee in september, in the present year, and appeared to be a proposal addressed to the subjects of great britain and ireland, as well as to all foreign princes and states. In this paper, the chevalier declared himself to be king james in right of his mother, the queen of great britain, and the throne of ireland, laying violent hands upon the persons of his most sacred majesty and the prince of wales, in order to subvert our present happy establishment in church and state, by placing a popish pretender upon the throne. this declaration, and the great invasions of the natural rights of mankind, and the state of proscription in which he supposed every honest man to be, very gravely proposed, that if king george would refuse to grant him the throne of great britain, he would, in return, bestow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other states to confirm it: he likewise promised to leave to king george his succession to the british dominions secure, whenever, in due course, his natural right should take place. The lords unanimously resolved, that this declaration was a false, insolent, and traitorous libel: and ordered it to be burned at the royal exchange. The commons concurred in these resolutions. Both houses joined in an address, expressing their utmost astonishment and indignation at the surprising insolence of the pretender: and assuring his majesty, they were determined to support his title to the crown of great britain and ireland. They prepared a bill for raising one hundred thousand pounds upon the real and personal estates of all papists, or persons educated in the papish religion, towards defraying the expenses of the late and present invasion. this bill, though strenuously opposed by some moderate members, as a species of persecution, was sent up to the house of lords, together with another, obliging all persons, being papists, in scotland, and all persons in great britain refusing or neglecting to take the oaths appointed for the security of the king's person and government, to register their names and real estates. Both these bills passed through the upper house without amendments, and received the royal sanction. had been raised. He said the known rules of evidence, as laid down at first, and established by the law of the land, which he thought ought to be constantly borne in mind, ought to be constantly observed, not only in the inferior courts of judicature, but also in both Houses of Parliament, till altered by the legislature; that the admitting of the presence of the imprisoned lords and gentlemen to bail; that granting a pardon to Lord Bolingbroke; and ordered the Bishop of Rochester to be considered a friendly act, and that he might have been the occasion of many apprehensions; and Lords of the Privy Council, where the office was a very dangerous precedent. In former times, (said he) it was thought very grievous that in capital cases a man should be affected by sultanates of hands; but here the case is much worse, since it is allowed that the clerks of the house are as capable as any exercising the same by their own hands in months in their minds. He applauded the bishop's noble department, in declining to answer before the House of Commons, whose proceedings in this unprecedented manner against a lord of parliament, was such an encroachment on the prerogative of the people, that if they submitted to it, by passing the bill, they might be termed the last of British peers, for giving up their ancient privileges. The other party were not so solicitous about answering reasons, as eager to put the question, when the bill passed, and a protest was entered. By this act the bishop was deprived of all offices, benefices, and dignities, and rendered incapable of enjoying any for the future: he was banished the whole year, which was a confidential act, he should return, as were all persons who should correspond with him during his exile. Dr. Friend, the celebrated physician, was a member of the House, and had everywhere been entertained, was now taken into custody, on suspicion of treasonable practices.

§ XIV. The next object that excited the resentment of the Commons was the scheme of a lottery, to be drawn at Harbou, in the king's German dominions. The House appointed a committee to inquire into this and other lotteries at that time on foot in London. The scheme was published, on pretense of raising a subscription for maintaining a trade between Great Britain and the king's territories on the continent. It was a mysterious scene of inquiry, which the committee, with all their penetration, could not fully discover. They reported, however, that it was an infamous, fraudulent undertaking, whereby many unhappy persons had been drawn in, to their great loss: that the manner of carrying on it had been a manifest violation of the laws of the kingdom; that the managers and agents of this lottery had, without any authority for so doing, made use of his majesty's royal name, thereby to give countenance to the infamous project, and induce his majesty's subjects to engage or be concerned therein. A bill was brought in to suppress this lottery, and to oblige the managers of it to make restitution of the money they had obtained by their knavery; but the House resolved, that John Lord Viscount Barrington had been notoriously guilty of promoting, abetting, and carrying on that fraudulent undertaking; for which offence he should be imprisoned, and his banishment was urgently pressed. The House at last erected an East India company at Ostend, upon a scheme formed by one Colebrook, an English merchant, Sir Nathaniel Gould represented to the House of Commons the great detriment which the English East India company had already received, and were likely further to sustain, by this Ostend company. The House immediately resolved, that for the subjects of this kingdom to subscribe, or be concerned, in encouraging any subscription, to promote an East India company now erecting in the Austrian Netherlands, was a high crime and misdemeanor; and a law was enacted for preventing British subjects from engaging in that enterprise. By another act, relating to the South Sea company, the two millions of stock which had been annihilated were revived, added to the capital, and divided among the proprietors. A third law passed, for the more effectual execution of justice in a part of Southwark, called the mint, where a great number of debters had taken sanctuary, on the supposition that it was a privileged place. On the twenty-seventh day of May the session was closed, with a speech that breathed nothing but panegyric, acknowledgment, and affection to a parliament which had composed their minds on all his majesty's business.

§ XV. His majesty, having emboldened the son of Mr. Robert Walpole, in consideration of the father's services, made a good number of church promotions. He admitted the unjustified lords and gentlemen to bail; granted a pardon to Lord Bolingbroke; and ordered the Bishop of Rochester to be considered a friendly act, and that he might have been the occasion of many apprehensions; and Lords of the Privy Council, where the office was a very dangerous precedent. In former times, (said he) it was thought very grievous that in capital cases a man should be affected by sultanates of hands; but here the case is much worse, since it is allowed that the clerks of the house are as capable as any exercising the same by their own hands in months in their minds.  assay and trial of Wood's half-pence, and found he had complied with the terms of the patent. They declared the coin to be extended in the value of metal, all the copper money which had been coined in Ireland, in the reigns of King Charles II, King James II, King William and Queen Mary. The privy council likewise demonstrated, that his majesty's predecessors had always exercised the undisputed prerogative of granting patents for copper coinage in Ireland to private persons that none of these patents had been so beneficial to the kingdom as this granted to William Wood, who had made use of it in an unprofitable manner, but that he had not referred the attorney and solicitor-general, and after Sir Isaac Newton had been consulted in every particular; finally, they proved, by a great number of witnesses, that there was such a real want of money in Ireland. Notwithstanding this decision, the fermten of the Irish nation was industriously kept up by clannish, pamphlets, papers, and pamphlets, written by Dean Swift and other authors; so that Wood voluntarily reduced his coinage from the value of one hundred thousand to that of forty thousand pounds. Thus the noise was silenced. The Commons of Ireland passed an act, for accepting the affiliation of the quakers instead of an oath; and voted three hundred and forty thousand pounds as the debt of the nation, which amounted to about double that sum.

§ XVII. In the month of October, England lost a worthy nobleman in the death of Earl Cowper, who had twice been a member of his lord chancellor, with equal discernment and integrity. He was a man profoundly skilled in the laws of his country; in his apprehension quick and penetrating; in his judgment clear and determinate. He possessed a manly eloquence; his manner was agreeable, and his deportment graceful. This year was likewise remarkable for the death of the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, who, since the decess of Louis XIV, had ruled that nation with the most absolute authority. He was a prince of taste and learning, endowed with the genius for empire, which he did not fail to display, even in the midst of effeminate pursuits and idle debauchery. From the infirm constitution of the infant king, he had conceived laides of ascending the throne, and taken his measures accordingly; but the young monarch's health began to be established, and all the duke's schemes were defeated by an apoplexy, of which he died, in the fiftieth year of his age, after having nominated the Duke of Bourbon as prime minister. King George immediately received assurances of the good disposition of the French court to cultivate and even improve the good understanding so happily established between France and Great Britain. The convention was signed in English and French, on the nineteenth of December; and on the ninth day of January the parliament was assembled. His majesty, in his speech, recommended to the Commons the care of the public debts; and expressed his satisfaction at seeing the sinking fund instituted, and determined to put the device of that system into a method of being speedily and gradually discharged.

§ XVIII. This was the repeated theory of patriotism, which, unhappy for the subjects, was never reduced to practice; not but that a beginning of such a laudable work was made in this very session, by an act for lessening the public debts. This law provided that the annuities at five per cent. charged on the general fund by a former act, except such as had been subscribed into the South Sea, together with the unsubscribed blanks of the lottery in the year one thousand seven hundred and fourteen, should be paid off at Lady-day of the year next ensuing, with the money arising from the sinking fund. The ministry, however, did not persevere in this path of prudent economy. The Commons granted all the supplies that were demanded. They voted ten thousand scoters; and the bill for the act was not without some opposition, even to maintain four thousand additional troops, which had been raised in the preceding year; so that the establishment of the land forces amounted to eighteen thousand two hundred. The expenses, necessary for the public charge, were defrayed by a land tax and malt tax. The Commons having despatched the supply, took into consideration a grievance arising from protections granted by foreign ministers, peers, and members of parliament, under which Protestant persons used to screen themselves from the execution of their just creditors. The Commons resolved, that all protections granted by members of that House should be declared null and void; and the Lords made a declaration to a similar purpose, with an exception of menial servants, and those necessarily employed about the estates of peers.

On the twenty-fourth day of April, his majesty closed the session in the usual manner, made some alterations in the disposition of the great offices of state, and sent Mr. Horatio Walpole as ambassador- extraordinary to the court of France.

§ XIX. In the beginning of this year, Philip King of Spain, retiring with his queen to the monastery of St. Ildefonso, sent the Marquis of Grimadl, his principal secretary of state, to his son Louis, Prince of Asturias, with a solemn resolution of the debt of the kingdom, in which he exhorted him to cultivate the blessed Virgin with the warmest devotion; and put himself and his kingdom under her protection. The resolution was published through the whole of Europe; and the council of Castile resolved, that Louis might assume the reins of government without assembling the Cortes. The English minister at Paris was instructed to interpose in behalf of the French protestants, against whom a severe edict had been lately published; but his remonstrances produced no effect. England, in the meantime, was quite barren of such events as deserve a place in history. The government was now firmly established on the neck of opposition; and the greater part of all the three branches, or rather of all the three branches, were flourished even under the load of grievous impositions.

§ XX. The next parliament, which met on the twelfth day of November, seemed to be assembled for no other purpose than that of establishing funds for the expense of the ensuing year; yet the session was distinguished by a remarkable incident; namely, the trial of the Earl of Macclesfield, lord chancellor of England. This nobleman had connived at certain venal practices touching the sale of places, and the money of senators deposited with the masters of chancery, so as to incur the general reproach of the nation. He found it necessary to resign the great seal in the beginning of January. On the ninth day of the ensuing month, he was indicted for ten various, importing, that his majesty, having reason to apprehend that the senators in the court of chancery were in danger of losing a considerable sum of money, from the insolvency of some of the masters, thought himself obliged, in justice and compassion to the said sufferers, to take the most speedy and proper method the law would allow for inquiring into the state of the masters' accounts, and securing their effects for the benefit of the suitors; and his majesty having had several reports laid before him in pursuance of the directions he had given, had ordered the reports to be communicated to the House, that they might have as full and as perfect a view of this important affair as the shortness of the time, and the circumstances and nature of the proceedings, would admit.

§ XXI. These papers being taken into consideration, Sir George Oxenden observed, that enormous abuses had crept into the high court of chancery, that the utmost names and insignifications of the said chancellor were many and various, but might be reduced to the following heads: that he had embarrassed the estates and effects of many widows, orphans, and lornatics; that he had raised the offices of masters in chancery to such a height of inflating their hands large sums of money belonging to suitors, that they might be enabled to comply with his exorbitant demands; and that in several cases he had made divers irregular orders. He therefore moved, that Thomas Earl of Macclesfield should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Pulteney moved, that this affair might be left to the consideration of a select committee. Sir Annals, 11st. William Wyndham asserted, that in proceeding, New, Feb. 19, by way of impeachment upon reports to the House, the highwaysiders of Southwark engaged in precedent; and seem to give up the most valuable of their privileges, the inquest after state criminals. The question being put, it was carried for the impeachment.

The word was, that the king had in the last time, or any other time, upper House; a committee was appointed to prepare articles; and a bill was brought in, to indemnify the masters in chancery from the penalties of the law, upon discovering what consideration they had paid for their admission to their respective offices. The bill lasted twenty days: the earl was convicted of fraudulent practices; and condemned in a fine of thirty thousand pounds, with imprisonment until that sum should be paid. He was immediately committed to the Tower, where he continued about six weeks; but upon producing the money he was discharged; and Sir Peter King, now created Baron of Oakham, succeeded him in the office of chancellor.

A. D. 1723. April was so memorable in the eighth day of April gave the House of Commons to understand, that having been engaged in some extraordinary expenses, he hoped he should be enabled to raise a sum which would defray the interest of the money already established for the payment of the civil list annuities, in order to discharge the debts contracted in the civil government. Mr. Pulteney, cofferer of the household, moved for an address, that an account should be laid before the House of all sums which had been betted by the counties, from the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and one, and to the twenty-fifth of the same month in the present year. This address being voted on, the earl of Sunderland, under the consideration of his majesty’s pardon, without an act of parliament. Lord Finch moved that a bill might be brought in for this purpose, and was warmly opposed by Mr. Methuen, controller of the household, who represented Bolingbroke as a monster of iniquity. His resolutions were supported by Lord William Paulet, and Mr. Onslow; nevertheless, the bill was prepared, passed through both Houses, and received the royal assent. An act being passed for disarming the highwayiders of Southwark, several persons were arrested within the city of London; a third for reducing the interest of several bank annuities, together with some bills of a private nature; the parliament was prorogued in May, after the permutation of the Act. His majesty’s resolve was, expressed his approbation of their conduct. Then he appointed lords justices to govern the nation in his absence: and set out in June for his German dominions.

§ XXV. The tide of political interests on the continent had begun to flow in a new channel, so as to render ineffectual the mounds which his Britannic majesty had raised by his multiplicity of negociations. Louis, the Spanish monarch, dying soon after his elevation to the throne, his father Philip resumed the crown which he had resigned; and gave himself up implicitly to the conduct of his queen, who was a princess of indefatigable intrigue and insatiable ambition. The infanta, who had been married to Louis XIV, was not favorable to her husband’s plan, and the whole French nation began to apprehensive of a civil war, in consequence of his dying without male issue; he therefore determined, with the advice of his council, to have the nuptials hurried through; and he was summoned: and she was attended to Madrid by the Marquis de Montaleone. The Queen of Spain resisted this insult offered to her daughter; and in revenge, dismissed Madame Rolande de Beaujouens, one of the regent’s daughters, whom she had betrothed to her son Don Carlos. A congress at Cambrai had proved ineffectual, she offered to adjust her differences with the emperor, under the sole mediation of Great Britain. This was an honour which King George declined; he was aware that his own state was such that might interrupt the harmony subsisting between him and the court of Versailles; and he had taken umbrage at the emperor’s refusing to grant the investiture of Bremen and Verden except upon terms which he did not choose to embrace. The peace between the courts of Vienna and Madrid, which he refused to mediate was effected by a private negociation, under the management of the Duke de Ripperta, a native of the States-general, who had released from the protestant religion, and entered into the ship of his catholic majesty. By two treaties, signed at Vienna in the month of April, the emperor acknowledged Philip as King of Spain and the Indies, promised that he would not molest him in his possessions; and that the annuities which his majesty’s command, that, seven years before, the petitioner had made his humble application and submission to the king, with assurances of duty, allegiance, and fidelity; that, from his behaviour since that time, his majesty was convinced of his being a fit object of his mercy; and consented to his petitioning the House. The petition being read, Mr. Walpole declared himself fully satisfied, that the petitioner had observed all his engagements; and therefore deserved the favour of that House, so far as to enable him to enjoy the family inheritance that was settled upon him, which he could not do by virtue of his defensive treaty with France and Prussia. This alliance, limited to the term of fifteen years, was negociated and concluded at Hanover in the month of September. It supposed the extension of the common provisions of the treaty of commerce, and of the mutual engagements for the protection of the contracting parties, their rights and privileges, those of commerce in particular, and an engagement to procure satisfaction to the protestants of Thorn, who had lately been oppressed by the catholics, contrary to the treaty at Oliva. The king, having taken these precautions at Hanover, set out on his return for England; embarked at Helvoetsluys in the middle of December; and after having been exposed to the fury of a dreadful storm, was landed without any loss at Rye, from whence he proceeded to London. The parliament meeting on the twentieth day of the next month, he gave them to understand that the distressed condition of some of their protestant brethren abroad, and the negociations and engagements contracted by some foreign powers, which seemed to have laid the foundation of new troubles and disturbances in Europe, and to threaten his subjects with the loss of several of the most advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged him to concert with other powers such measures as might give a check to the ambitious views of those who were endeavouring to render themselves formidable; and put a stop to the further progress of such dangerous designs upon them, that their engagements were already very busy, by their instruments and emissaries in those courts whose measures seemed most to favour their purposes, in soliciting and promoting the cause of their pretended grand design. One event in particular, the revolution of Germany dictated the treaty of Hanover; but, in order to secure the approbation of Great Britain, upon which the support of this alliance chiefly depended, it was judged necessary to insert the articles relating to commerce and the protestant religion, as if the engagement had been contracted purely for the advantage and glory of England. In a word, the ministry began now to ring the changes upon a few words that have been repeated ever since, like odes. It was now that the danger seemed to have grown into a very dangerous connexion with the concerns of the continent. They hurried, they insisted upon the machinations of the disaffected, the designs of a popish pretender, the protestant interest, and the balance of power, until these expressions became absolutely terms of rubric with every person of common sense and reflection. The people were told, that the emperor and the King of Spain, exclusive of the public treaties concluded at Vimeiro, had entered into private engagements, impeding that the imperialists should join the Spaniards in recovering Gibraltar and Port-Mahon by force of arms, in case the King of England should refuse to restore them amenable for the prince of Orange. What was more, this double marriage should take place between the two Infants of Spain and the two Archduchesses of Austria; and that means should be taken to place the pretender on the throne of Great Britain.

§ XXVI. When the treaties of Vienna and Hanover fell under consideration of the House of Commons, Horatio Walpole, afterwards termed, in derision, "the balance master," opened the debate with a long unmeaning oration, giving a detail of the affairs of Europe since the treaty of Utrecht. He enumerated the barrier treaty, the convention for executing that treaty, the defensive alliance with the emperor, the other with the most christian king and Holland, another convention, the quadruple alliance, the congress at Cambray, the treaty at Hanover, and that of Vienna. He explained the nature of each engagement. He said, the main design of the treaty of commerce concluded between the emperor and Spain, was to countenance and support the East India company established at Ostend, which interfered so essentially with the East India companies of England and Holland, and was directly contrary to several solemn treaties still in force. It was in the teeth of the danger to the interest of power would be exposed, should the issue-make of this projected marriage between the houses of Austria and Spain ever possess the imperial dignity and the kingdom of Bohemia. The reader will recollect, as the contract was negociated, the marriage of the daughter of Pretender, and the marriage of the son of the Pretender, to the princess Anne. The Pretender was in the court of Vienna, from whence he proceeded to very man was one of those who exclaimed against that article of the treaty of Utrecht, which previded the power of those two houses from being immediately united in the person of the same person. It was a mistake; it was upon the pretended secret engagement concerning Gibraltar and Minorca, and the king's pious concern for the distressed protestants of Thorn in Poland. In vain did Mr. Richarson urge, that the treaty of Hanover would engage the British nation in a war with the defensiveness of the king; German dominions, contrary to an express proviso made in the act of limitation. These arguments had lost all weight. The opposition was so considerable, that the ministry were determined to propose no further engagements than they should propose. An address was voted and delivered to his majesty, approving the alliance he had concluded at Hanover, in order to obviate and disappoint the dangerous views and consequences of the treaty of peace between the emperor and the King of Spain: and promising to support his majesty against all insults and attacks that should be made upon any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain. An address of the same kind was presented by the House of Lords in a body. A bill was brought in, empowering the commissioners of the treasury to compound with Mr. Richard Hampden, late treasurer of the navy, for a debt he owed to the crown, amounting to 100,000l. In pursuance of this bill, the deficiency was occasioned by his embarking in the South Sea scheme. The king recommended his petition; and the House complied with his request, in consideration of his great distress. He was, the famous John Hampden, who made such a noble stand against the arbitrary measures of the first Charles.

§ XXVII. The malt tax was found so grievous to Scotland, that the people refused to pay it, and riots were excited in different parts of the kingdom. At Glasgow, the populace, armed with clubs and staves, rifi-fed the house of Daniel Campbell, their representative in parliament, who had voted for the bill; and maltreated some excisemen, who attempted to enforce it. The city of Glasgow had been encircled by the forces of the Spaniards. Wade, who commanded the forces in Scotland, had sent two companies of soldiers, under the command of Captain Bushel, to prevent or appease a disturbance of this nature. That officer drew up his men in the street, where they were pelted with stones by the multitude, which he endeavoured to disperse by firing among them without shot. This expedient failing, he ordered his men to load their pieces with hail, and at a time when the magistrates were advancing to quench him in a body, at the suggestion of advice and influence, he commanded the soldiers to fire four different ways, without the sanction of the civil authority. About twenty persons were killed or wounded on this occasion, and had made: the distaste and terror were exaggerated beyond all sense of danger. They began to procure arms, and breathed nothing but defiance and revenge. Bushel thought proper to retreat to the Castle of Dumfries; and was pursued above three hundred men enraged multitude. General Wade being informed of this transaction, assembled a body of forces; and being accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, took possession of Glasgow. The magistrates were Oldenlun, Arlindale, and conveyed prisoners to the Oldenlun, in Parliament. Mem. of the Tindal.
A.D. 1796.

King sent a message to the House by Sir Paul Methuen, desiring an extraordinary supply, that he might be able to augment his maritime force, and concert such other measures as should be necessary for the defence of the coast, until he heard their resolves; but the majority complied with the demand. Some members in the upper House complained that the message was not sent to both Houses of parliament, and this suggestion gave rise to another declaratory act, which Lord Balthur and others made melancholy reflections upon the state of insubordination to which the peers of England were reduced. Such remarks, however, were very little noticed by the House, for the greater part of his Majesty's officers were ruinous over all opposition. The supplies, ordinary and extraordinary, being granted, with every thing else which the court thought proper to ask, and several bills passed for the regulation of civil economy, the king dismissed the parliament on the twenty-fourth day of May.

§ XVIII. By this time Peter the Czar of Muscovy was dead, and his Empress Catharina had succeeded him on the Russian throne. The princess had begun to assemble forces in the neighbourhood of Petersburgh, and to prepare a formidable armament for a naval expedition. King George, concluding that her design was against Sweden, sent a strong squadron into the Baltic, under the command of Sir John Jernings, to intercept her projects upon his allies. The English fleet being joined at Copenhagen by a Danish squadron, alarmed the court of Russia, which immediately issued orders for reinforcing the garrisons of Viborg, Cronstron, Rewi, and Riga. The French envoy, on the other side, made an address to the Swedish majesty, steered towards Revel, and sent thither a lieutenant, with a letter from the King of Great Britain to the empress. This was an expostulation, in which his majesty observed, that he and his subjects could not fail of being alarmed at her great preparations by sea and land. He complained that measures had been taken at her court in favour of the pretender; that his repeated instances for effecting a war had been attended with neglect; and he gave her to understand, that he had ordered his admiral to prevent her ships from coming out of her harbours, should she persist in her resolution to execute the designs she had projected. The empress, in her answer to the king, expressed her surprise, that she had not received his majesty's letter until his fleet was at anchor before Revel, since it would have been more agreeable to the custom established among sovereigns, and to the dignity of his court, if it had been delivered between his dominions and the crown of Great Britain, to expostulate with her on her armament, and expect her answer, before he had proceeded to such an offensive measure. She assured him that neutrality would repair all the injuries that might happen between her and the British fleet. As to the design of disturbing the peace of the north; and with regard to the pretender, it was a frivolous and state accusation, which had been frequently used as a pretext to cover all the villainous steps lately taken against the Russian empire. Sir Charles Wager continued in this station until he received certain intelligence that the Russian galleys were laid up in their winter harbour; then he set sail for the coast of Denmark, from where he returned to England in the month of November.

§ XXIX. King George, that he might not seem to convert all his attention to the affairs of the north, had equipped two other squadrons; one of which was destined for the West Indies, under the command of Admiral Hosier; the other, which was stationed between Jersey and the Channel Islands, was under the command of Lord John Jennings, having on board a body of land-forces, sailed from St. Helens's on the twelfth day of July, entered the bay of St. Antonio, then visited Lisbon, from whence he directed his course to the Azores and Madeira, and the Canaries; and then to the coast of Africa; then to the coast of Brazil; and then to the east coast of South America, where he was ordered to take possession of the Cape of Good Hope, and to proceed in the direction of the Cape of Horn, from whence he was ordered to return to England, in the month of February. It was observed by the Courrier de St. George with credentials to the court of Madrid, where he addressed the protestant religion, married a lady of the Queen of Porto-Bello, the treasure, consisting of above six millions sterling, had been unloaded, and carried back to Panama, in pursuance of an order sent by an advice-boat which had the start of Hosier. This admiral lay inactive on that station, until he heard these developments. He returned to Jamaica, where he found means to reinforce his crews; then he stood over to Carthagena. The Spaniards had by this time seized the English South Sea ship at Lo, Ver-Cruz, together with all the effects belonging to that company. Hosier in vain demanded restitution: he took some Spanish ships by way of reprisal, and continued cruising in those seas until the great part of his men-of-war were victualled over all opposition. The supplies, ordinary and extraordinary, being granted, with every thing else which the court thought proper to ask, and several bills passed for the regulation of civil economy, the king dismissed the parliament on the twenty-fourth day of May.

§ XXX. The Duke of Ormond and Wharton, and the Earl Marischal, were certainly at Madrid; and the Duke de Rippenda, now prime minister of Spain, dropped some hints that he would establish a new anti-separatist design, which, however, the court of Madrid positively denied. Rippenda, as a foreigner, felt a sacrifice to the jealousy of the Spanish ministers. He was suddenly dismissed from office, and the king of Great Britain, who had entered into engagements in favour of the pretender.

§ XXXI. The seventeenth day of January, the British parliament was opened with a long, elaborate speech, importing that the proceedings and transactions of the emperor and King of Spain, and the secret offensive alliances concluded between them, had laid the foundations of a most exorbitant and formidable power: that they were directly levelled against the most valuable and daring interests and privileges of the English nation; which must either be fortified and sustained by the British empire; that the king of Spain purchased ships of war; began to make preparations for some important undertaking; and assembled an army of twenty thousand men at St. Roch, on the confines of Portugal and Andalusia, under the command of the Duke of Albuquerque. The States-general and the King of Sweden acceded to the treaty of Hanover; but the King of Prussia, though his majesty's son-in-law, was detached from the alliance by the emperor, with whom he contracted new engagements. The secret articles was, the placing the pretender on the throne of Great Britain; and another the conquest of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon. The emperor confined himself entirely to Russia; and that the English fleet seasonably prevented such designs as would have opened a way to the invasion of those kingdoms. He exerted the Commons to grant such supplies as should be necessary for the defense of that country, and for making Spain's best efforts, and obtained the rank and appointment of a first-rate-captain in the Spanish service. But the situation was not yet such as to require the exercise of the powers, which were now vested in his majesty's hands. good his engagements with the allies of Great Britain. He told them, that the King of Spain had ordered his minister residing in England to quit the kingdom; and that he had left a memorial little short of a declaration, in which he hinted, that the restoration of Gibraltar did not fail to touch the energetic strings which always moved their passions: the balance of power in Europe, the security of the British commerce, the designs of a papish pretender, the present happy establishment, the relations of possessions and properties of a Protestant people. Such addresses of thanks were penned in both Houses as the ministers were pleased to dictate: yet not without opposition from a minority, which was far from being formed, though headed by influential characters and resolution. The Commons voted twenty thousand scamen, besides six-and-twenty thousand three hundred and eighty-three men for the land-service; and, to defray the extraordinary expense, a land-tax of four shillings in the pound was granted.

§ XXXI. The House of Lords having taken into consideration the letters and memorials between the ministers of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the papers relating to the accession of the States-general to the treaty of Hanover, a warm debate ensued. Lord Bathurst took notice, that the accession of the States-general to the treaty was upon condition that their act should be approved by the King of Great Britain, and the Most Christian King, and the King of Prussia; but that the minister of his Prussian majesty had refused to sign the act of accession, which was therefore of no effect: that if the ministry should, for the same reason, for itself disengaged from the Hanover alliance, Britain alone would be obliged to bear the burthen of an expensive war against two of the greatest potentates of Europe. He said he could not see how just reason for a rupture with Spain; that indeed the Duke of Richmond might have dropped some indiscreet expressions; he was known to be a man of violent temper; and he had been solemnly disavowed by his catholic majesty; that, in the memorial left by the Spanish ambassador, he imputed the violent state of affairs between the two crowns to the ministers of England; and mentioned a positive promise made by the King of Great Britain for the restitution of Gibraltar: that methods of accommodation might be tried, before the kingdom engaged in a war which must he attended with dangerous consequences: that the nation was loaded with a debt of fifty millions; and, in order to maintain such a war, would be obliged to raise seven millions yearly; an annual sum by which the people would be impoverished. He observed, that in some papers laid before the House, mention was made of great sums distributed in divers places, to bring certain measures to bear. He declared, that in his opinion, it had been too easily submitted to English gold: he was neither a Spaniard nor a Frenchman, but a true Englishman, and so long as he had the honour to sit in that House, he would speak and act for the good of his country. He, therefore, desired their lordships seriously to consider the matter before them, which was of the last consequence and importance to the whole nation. He said nothing could be gained by the war, should it prove serviceable: and every thing would be lost should it be unprosperous. He was answered by Lord Townshend, who affirmed that his majesty had received positive and certain information with respect to the secret article of alliance between the courts of Vienna and Madrid, in favour of the pretender, though the safety of the state did not permit him to lay these advices before the parliament. After much altercation, the majority resolved, that the measures his majesty thought fit to take were honourable, just, and necessary for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements entered into in favour of the pretender; for preserving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by solemn treaties, and for making the King of Great Britain the protector of Gibraltar, the Iberian possessions, and for maintaining to his people their most valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Seventeen lords entered a protest against this resolution. Dissents of the same nature arose from the same subject in the lower House. Lord Townshend had affirmed in the House of Peers, that no promise of restoring Gibraltar had been made: Sir Robert Walpole owned such a promise in the House of Commons: a motion was made for an address, desiring these engagements might be laid before the House; another member moved for a blank motion, and Mr. Pulteney moved for the King of Sweden, and for the secret offers and article between the courts of Vienna and Madrid: a third motion was made to address the king for such memorials and representations from the courts of Sweden and Denmark, as inducing him to prevent any more violence being used on the part of the potentates of France and Spain, to send a squadron to the Baltic. In the account of the money granted for the service of the last year, there was an article of one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds charged as an expense of the late war, for buildings, emoluments and expenses, and over above such as were specified. Mr. Pulteney moved for an address on this subject; but each of these motions was rejected on a division: and the majority concurred in an address of thanks to his majesty, for the great wisdom of his conduct. They expressed the most implicit confidence in his goodness and discretion, they promised to support him in all such further measures as he should find necessary and expedient for preventing a rupture, as well as for consulting the honour and advantage of these kingdoms.

§ XXXIII. His majesty's speech gave such umbrage to the court of Vienna, that Mr. Palms, the imperial resident at London, was ordered to return to his own court, to inform the king, and afterwards to publish it to the whole nation. In this bold remonstrance, the king was charged with having deceived the throne, as certain and undoubted facts, several years, for the same reason, for having himself disengaged from the Hanover alliance, Britain alone would be obliged to bear the burthen of an expensive war against two of the greatest potentates of Europe. He said he could not see how just reason for a rupture with Spain; that indeed the Duke of Richmond might have dropped some indiscreet expressions; he was known to be a man of violent temper; and he had been solemnly disavowed by his catholic majesty; that, in the memorial left by the Spanish ambassador, he imputed the violent state of affairs between the two crowns to the ministers of England; and mentioned a positive promise made by the King of Great Britain for the restitution of Gibraltar: that methods of accommodation might be tried, before the kingdom engaged in a war which must he attended with dangerous consequences: that the nation was loaded with a debt of fifty millions; and, in order to maintain such a war, would be obliged to raise seven millions yearly; an annual sum by which the people would be impoverished. He observed, that in some papers laid before the House, mention was made of great sums distributed in divers places, to bring certain measures to bear. He declared, that in his opinion, it had been too easily submitted to English gold: he was neither a Spaniard nor a Frenchman, but a true Englishman, and so long as he had the honour to sit in that House, he would speak and act for the good of his country. He, therefore, desired their lordships seriously to consider the matter before them, which was of the last consequence and importance to the whole nation. He said nothing could be gained by the war, should it prove serviceable: and every thing would be lost should it be unprosperous. He was answered by Lord Townshend, who affirmed that his majesty had received positive and certain information with respect to the secret article of alliance between the courts of Vienna and Madrid, in favour of the pretender, though the safety of the state did not permit him to lay these advices before the parliament. After much altercation, the majority resolved, that the measures his majesty thought fit to take were honourable, just, and necessary for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements entered into in favour of the pretender; for preserving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by solemn treaties, and for making the King of Great Britain the protector of Gibraltar, the Iberian possessions, and for maintaining to his people their most valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Seventeen lords entered a protest against this resolution. Dissents of the same nature arose from the same subject in the lower House. Lord Townshend had affirmed in the House of Peers, that no his trouble, the King of Prussia, who had espoused his daughter, detested his interest; and the States-general stood aloof. For the security of his German dominions, he sent his brother, the Dauphin, as a garrison to the most precarious ally; to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, and the principality of Hesse Cassel: but none of these powers would contribute their assistance without being gratified with exorbitant subsidies, though the danger was common, and the effort to have been equal. Instead of allies, they professed themselves mercenaries. Great Britain paid them for the defence of their own dominions: she, moreover, undertook to maintain a powerful fleet, by which she might, if in extremity, be too weak to think, or so fool-hardy as to affirm, that this was a British quarrel?

A.D. 1727. For the support of those expensive treaties, Sir Scroope, secretary of the treasury, moved in the House of Commons, that in the malt tax bill they should insert a clause of appropriation, empowering the king to apply such sums as should be necessary for defraying the expenses and engagements which had been, or should be, made before the first day of September, in concerting such measures as he should think most conducive to the security of trade, and restoring the peace of Europe. To little purpose did the minister move: the King of France united in advising, and granting supplies was unparliamentary: such a clause would render ineffectual that appropriation of the public money, which the wisdom of all parliaments had thought indispensable to the safety of a nation, which was the more to be feared, as no provision was made to call any person to account for the money that should be disposed of by virtue of this clause: that great sums had already been granted: that such an unlimited power ought never to be given in a free government: that such a confidence in the crown might, through the influence of evil ministers, be attended with the most dangerous consequences: that the constitution could not be preserved, but by keeping a strict adherence to those essential parliamentary forms of granting supplies upon estimates, and of appropriating these supplies to services and occasions publicly avowed and judged necessary: that such clauses, if not sensibly checked, would become so frequent, as in time to lodge to the crown and in the ministers, on absolute and uncontrollable power of raising money upon the people, which by the constitution is, and with safety can only be, lodged in the whole legislature. The motion was carried. Few were the consequences of this. Sir William Yonge moved, that towards the supply granted to the Crown in the last session, the interest of the hundred pounds should be raised by loans on exchequer bills, to be charged on the surplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reserved for the parliament's disposal. Though this motion was vigorously opposed by Sir Joseph Jekyll and Mr. Pulteney, as a dangerous deviation from several votes and acts of parliament, by which the proceeds of the public funds were appropriated to the discharge of the national debt, or to the increase of the sinking funds, it was carried by the majority.

A.D. 1727. On the fifteenth day of May the parliament was prorogued, after the king had acknowledged their zeal, liberality, and despatch; and given them to understand that the dispute between the nations was wrought up by the treacheries opened before this fortress on the eleventh day of February, by the Conde de las Torres, at the head of twenty thousand men. The place was well provided for a defence; and the old Earl of Portmore, who was then in command, and had been distinguished in the late convoy of a fleet commanded by Sir Charles Wager. He arrived at Gibraltar in the beginning of April, where he landed the troops, with a great quantity of ammunition, warlike stores, and four-and-twentie pieces of cannon. At the same time, the King of France, in the same garrison, had so that the garrison amounted to six thousand, plentifully supplied with fresh provision from the coast of Barbary, and treated the efforts of the besiegers with great contempt. The besiegers, not being able to get leave to attempt upon their barrier in the Netherlands, desired the king would hold in readiness the ten thousand auxiliaries stipulated in the treaty. These were immediately prepared for embarkation, and the forces of England were augmented with thirty new-raised companies. Sir John Norris set sail with a powerful fleet from the Baltic, and was joined by a Danish squadron: but the czarina dying on the seventeenth day of May, he had no occasion to commit hostilities, as the Russian armament was laid aside.

§ XXXVII. Meanwhile the powers at variance, though extremely irritated against each other, were all equally averse to a war that might agano embroil all Europe. The mediation of the French ministers was effectually conducted by the Duke de Richelieu, his ambassador at Vienna. Plans and counterplans of pacification were proposed between the two crowns and the allies. At length, all the preliminaries necessary to a truce were signed in May at Paris, by the ministers of the Hanover alliance, and afterwards at Vienna, by the imperial and Spanish ambassadors. These importations, that hostilities should immediately cease: that the charter of the Osnaburg company should be suspended for seven years: and that a congress should in four months be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, for adjusting all differences, and consolidating the peace of Europe. This congress was afterwards transferred to Stouss, and a trinitarian of the French minister, whose presence was necessary at court. The siege of Gibraltar was raised, after it had lasted four months, during which the Spaniards lost a great number of men by sickness, while the garrison sustained very little damage. The court of Madrid, however, started some new difficulties, and for some time would not consent to the restitution of the South Sea ship, which had been detained at La Vera Cruz, in the West Indies; so that Sir Philip soma. Charles Wager continued in his cruise on the coast of Spain; but these objections were removed in the sequel.

§ XXXVIII. King George, having appointed a regency, embarked at Greenwich, on the third day of June, and landed in Holland on the seventh, set out for Hanover. He was suddenly seized with a paralytic disorder on the road: he forthwith lost the faculty of speech, became lethargic, and was conveyed in a state of insensibility to Osnabruck. There heexpired on Sunday the eleventh day of June, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and in the thirteenth of his reign."—George I. was plain and simple in his person and address; grave and composed in his deportment, though easy, familiar, and facetious in his hours of relaxation. Before he ascended the throne of Great Britain, he had acquired the character of a circumspect general, a just and merciful prince, a wise politician, who perfectly understood, and steadily pursued, his own interest. Of his detail, we are not so well acquainted, though with less art and precision—Steele, who in his connoisseuses successfully ingrained modern characters on the asserted drama—Farquhar, who drew his pictures from nature rather than from nature, and whose chief merit consists in the agreeable present and vivacity of his drollery— Addison, whose form as a poet greatly exceeded his talents as a satirist. The subject of these two characters, monarchical monarchy; was a cypher rather than a poet, and his natural dryness of manner gave agreeable vivacity to his drivel; he was a mean pedestrian, but a poet: he feigned his poetry, by adopting the extravagant language of Racine and Tasso— Pope, the prince of lyric poetry, unrivalled in satire, epic, and the various species of composition, to whose vigour of invention, and who contrived to maintain the liveliness of language that is so difficult to be obtained in all whose works are a perfect system, and are equally admirable. All his works are true translations. The following is a correct estimate of him:—"In his familiar style, when his versification is tolerable, his ideas are not so luminous for strength of character and power of inspection, as for wit, elegance, and regularity—Vauhall, who wrote with more mature posed to govern his new subjects according to the maxims of the British constitution, and the genius of the people; and if ever he seemed to deviate from these principles, we may take it for granted, that he was misled by the venal suggestions of a ministry whose power and influence were founded on corruption.

the effect of personal animosity to Sir R. W. with whom he had been formerly connected.

§ III. An expas was opened on the fourteenth day of November with an address on the kun's death, his late majesty King George II. removed from Richmond, where he received this intelligence, to Leicester House; and the members of the privy council being assembled, were sworn anew. The king declared his firm purpose to preserve the constitution in church and state, and to cultivate those alliances which his father had made with foreign princes. At the same time, he took and subscribed the oath for the security of the union, which he was to be the advocate of union. Next day he was proclaimed King of Great Britain. The parliament assembled in pursuance of the act made for that purpose; but was immediately prorogued by commission to the twenty-seventh day of the month.

All the great officers of state continued in their places: Sir Robert Walpole kept possession of the treasury; and the system of politics which the late king had established underwent no sort of alteration. The king, in his speech to both Houses at the opening of the session, professed a fixed resolution to mort the love and affection of his people, by maintaining them in the full enjoyment of their religious and civil rights. He promised to lessen the public debt, and to do all in his power to secure the happiness of his subjects. He said, he would permit: he observed to the Commons, that the grant of the greatest part of the civil-list revenues was now determined; and that it would be necessary for them to make a new provision for the support of the king and his family; lastly, he added, that it was not in his power to contract the business that should be necessarily brought before them, as the season of the year and the circumstances of time required their presence in the country. Addressed of conduct and congratulation being drawn up and presented, the Commons, in a committee of the whole House, took into consideration a motion for a supply to his majesty. Sir Robert Walpole having observed, that the annual sum of money one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds granted to, this last session, on the late king, had fallen short every year; and that his present majesty's expenses were likely to increase, by reason of the largeness of his family, moved, that the entire revenues of the civil-list, which produced about eight hundred thousand pounds per annum, should be settled on the king during his life. Mr. Shippen opposed this motion, as inconsistent with the trust reposed in them as representatives of the people, who ought to be very fugal in exercising the right of giving away the public money. He said the sum of seven hundred thousand pounds was not obtained for his late majesty without a long and solemn debate; and every member who contended for it at that time, had declared, that the revenue would not be sufficient, though his majesty's family should be enriched, a circumstance which had been urged as one reason for the motion, he presumed the appointments of Prince Frederick would be much inferior to those settled on his present majesty when he was Prince of Wales; besides, it was to be hoped that many personal, many particular expenses in the late reign, especially those for frequent journeys to Hanover, would be discontinued, and entirely cease. He observed, that the civil-list branches in the queen's reign did not often exceed the sum of five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; nevertheless, she called upon her parliament but once, in a reign of thirteen years, to pay the debts contracted to her late civil government; and these were occasioned by the unparalleled instances of her pety and generosity. She gave the first fruits and tithes, arising to nineteen thousand pounds a year, as an augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy. She bestowed five thousand pounds per annum out of the post-office, on the Duke of Marlborough; she suffered seven hundred pounds to be charged weekly on the same office for the service of the public: she expended several hundred thousand pounds in the great war; the nation, although the nation, did not pay the expenses of the war, and the Jesuits annually to Prince Charles of Denmark: she sustained great losses by the tin contract; she supported the poor Palatines: she exhibited many other proofs of her benefactions. In fact, she had formed a plan of retrenchment, which would have reduced her yearly expenses to four hundred and fifty-nine thousand pounds, and forty-one pounds. He affirmed, that a million a year would not be sufficient to carry on the exorbitant expenses, so often and so justly complained of in the House of Commons, in addition to the yearly allowance of seven hundred thousand pounds, many occasional taxes, many excessive sums were raised, and all sunk in the bottomless gulf of secret service. Two hundred and fifty thousand pounds were raised in defiance of the ancient parliamentary methods, to secure the kingdom from a Swedish invasion; then the two insurance offices were erected, and paid near three hundred thousand pounds for their charters: our enmity with Sweden being changed into friendship by the treaty of seventy-two, the public service was implicitly granted, to fulfil some secret engagement with that crown; four-and-twenty thousand pounds were given for burning merchant ships arrived from infected places, though the goods, which ought to have been destroyed for the public safety, were afterwards privately sold: a sum of five hundred thousand pounds was demanded, and granted, for paying the debts of the civil list; and his majesty declared, by message, he was resolved to retrench his expenses for the future. Notwithstanding this resolution, in less than four years, a new demand of the like sum was made and granted, to discharge new encumbrances: the Spanish ships of war which Admiral Byng took in the Mediterranean, were to be paid the sum of money: one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds were granted in the last session, to be secretly disposed of for the public utility; and there was still a debt in the civil government amounting to two hundred thousand pounds. He took notice, that the extravagance happened under the conduct of persons pretending to surpass all their predecessors in the knowledge and care of the public revenue; that none of these sums had been accounted for, they were, in all probability, employed in services not fit to be owned. He said, he heartily wished that time, the greatest discoverer of hidden truths, and concealed iniquities, might produce a list of all such sums, and all such accounts; and that, a sufficient account should be given of such persons and such transactions: who had been the hired slaves and the corrupt instruments of a profuse and vain-glourours administration. He proposed, that instead of granting an addition to the civil list, they should restrict that revenue to a certain sum, by concluding the question with these words, 'in like manner as they were granted and continued to his late majesty, so as to make up the clear yearly sum of seven hundred thousand pounds.' To these particulars, which were indeed unanswerable, no reply was made. Even this mark of decency was laid aside as idle and superfluous. The House agreed to the motion; and a bill was brought in for the better support of his majesty's house-hold. The Commons had passed a resolution to make the payment of the expense of the three persons, who had paid for the crown, a part of the public revenue; and for making it an act of treason to make the crown by any means, either emit a proclamation, or act against the crown, in any manner. The House agreed to the motion; and a bill was brought in for the better support of his majesty's house-hold. The Commons had passed a resolution to make the payment of the expense of the three persons, who had paid for the crown, a part of the public revenue; and for making it an act of treason to make the crown by any means, either emit a proclamation, or act against the crown, in any manner.
usual solemnity. By this time the courts of France and Spain were perfectly reconciled: all Europe was freed from continual alarms of war, and the English nation suffered no interruption, except from some transient tumults among the tinners of Cornwall, who, being provoked by a scarcity of corn, rose in arms and plundered the granaries and fifty thousand pounds, and half a million of pounds, for the maintenance of twelve thousand Hessian troops; a subsidy of fifty thousand pounds to the King of Sweden; and half that sum to the King of Brunswick. The expense of the year amounted to four millions, raised by a land tax of three shillings in the pound, a malt tax, and by borrowing of the Bank one million seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for which, amounts to the amount of seventy thousand pounds, to be raised by duties on coals imported in the city of London, were granted to that corporation.

§ VI. All these sums, however, were not granted without question. The number of land forces occasioned a debate; and the Hessian auxiliaries were not allowed without dispute and opposition. When they deliberated on the loan of the bank, Mr. W. Pulteney observed, that the shifting of funds was but perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day; that notwithstanding the great merit which some persons had built on the sinking fund, it appeared that the national debt had been increased since the setting up that pompous project. Some warm altercation passed between him and Sir Robert Walpole on this subject. The lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London, presented a petition setting forth, that the House of Commons had already laid upon coals and cullen, imported into London, affected the trade of that city only; that the inequality of the interest and dividends of the funds of Great Britain was an encouragement to extravagance, and a hardship upon all the trading inhabitants. The petition was rejected, and the tax imposed. The House had addressed the King for a particular and distinct account of the amount of the public engagements, and the sum of twenty thousand pounds, charged to have been issued for securing the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and preserving and restoring the peace of Europe, he declined granting their request, but signified in general, that part of the money had been disbursed, and the remainder by himself, for carrying on the same necessary services, which required the greatest secrecy. Such a message in the reign of King William would have raised a dangerous flame in the House of Commons. Mr. W. Pulteney inveighed against such a vague and general way of accounting for the public money, as tending to render parliaments altogether insignificat, to cover embezlements, and to screen corrupt and rapacious ministers. The Commons having taken into consideration the state of the national debt, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers. A motion was made by a court member, that it appeared the monies already charged to the interest, as debtors, and the interest of the debts, together with a sum to be issued at Lady-day, amounted to six millions six hundred and forty-eight thousand seven hundred and sixty-two pounds, five shillings, one penny, and in general, to the said ministers, and the opposition expose the fallacious tendency of this motion. In vain did they demonstrate the fraudulent artifice used in drawing up the accounts; the motion was carried; and several resolutions were taken on the state of the national debts. In the particular account of these debts, upon which the House resolved to form a representation to his majesty, an article of three hundred thousand pounds relating to the duty upon wrought plate was totally omitted. Thus exposing every omission being by the House, a very warm debate, and to very severe reflections against those who superintended the public accounts. This error being rectified, a committee appointed for the purpose drew up the representatives, containing a particular detail of the national debts discharged and incurred since the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and sixteen, with a state of the sinking fund and of the public credit. The draft, being approved by the House, was presented to the king, who received it graciously. He took this opportunity of saying, that the provision made for gradually discharging the national debt was now become so certain and considerable, that nothing but some unforeseen occurrence could prevent the national debt from being extinguished within the time that afforded the fairest prospect of seeing the old debts discharged without any necessity of incurring new encumbrances.

§ VII. This answer, fraught with many other expressions of fatherly tenderness for his people, paved the way for a message to the House, demanding a vote of credit to fulfill certain engagements entered into, and concerted, with the advice and concurrence of the last parliament, for securing the trade and navigation of this kingdom, and for restoring and preserving the peace of Europe. Though a debate ensued upon this message, the majority resolved, that an address should be presented to his majesty, declaring the duty and fidelity of the Commons, their entire confidence in his royal care and goodness, and their readiness to enable his majesty to fulfill his engagements. A vote of credit passed accordingly. During this session, the peers were chiefly employed in examining copies of several treaties and alliances which the king submitted to their perusal; they likewise prepared a bill for amending the statute of limitation, which, however, did not pass into a law; they considered the state of the national debt, subject fruitful of debates; they passed the mutiny bill, and those that were sent up from the Commons, touching the supplies; together with an act, obliging ships arriving from infected places to perform quarantine; and some others of a more private nature. These bills having received the approbation, on the twenty-eighth day of May, when he thanked the Commons for the effectual supplies they had raised, and, in particular, for having empowered him to borrow five hundred thousand pounds for the discharge of wages due to the soldiers in the provinces.

§ VIII. England was at this period quite barren of remarkable events. The king's uncle, Ernest Augustus, Prince of Brunswick, Duke of York, and Bishop of Osnabruck, by the death of his father, succeeded in the bishopric by the Elector of Colzon, according to the testament by which Osnabruck is alternately possessed by the house of Brunswick and that elector.

In the beginning of December, his majesty's eldest son Prince Frederick arrived in England from Hanover, where he had hitherto resided, was introduced into the privy council, and created Prince of Wales. Signor Comte, resident from the Duke of Parma, was ordered to quit the kingdom, because his master paid to the pretended the honors due to the King of Great Britain. The congress opened at Soissons, for determining all disputes among the powers of Europe,proved ineffectual. Such difficulties occurred in the arrangements for peace that the Congress was discontinued, and the contracting parties in the alliance of Hanover proposed a provisional treaty, concerning which no definitive answer was given as yet by the courts of Vienna and the Hessian princes, and which was to be continued in suspense: the English fleet lay inactive and rotting in the West Indies: the sailors perishing miserably, without daring to avenge their country's wrongs; while the Spanish cruisers committed depredations with impunity on the commerce of Great Britain. The court of Spain, at this juncture, seemed cold and indifferent with regard to a pacification with England. It had renewed a good understanding with France, and now strengthened the power of that nation by the augmentation of its maritime family of Portugal. The infanta of this house was betrothed to the Prince of Asturias; while the Spanish infanta, formerly affianced to the French king, was now matched with the Prince of Brazil, eldest son of his Portuguese majesty. In the month of January, the two courts met in a wooden house built over the little river Coya, that separates the two kingdoms, and there the peace was exchanged.

§ IX. The peace of Great Britain meeting according to their last prorogation on the twenty-first day of January, the king in his speech communicated the nature of the negotiations at the congress. He demanded such security as might ensure the future confidence of his allies, provided his endeavours to establish an advantageous peace should miscarry; and he hinted that the dilatory conduct of the courts of Vienna and Madrid proceeded in a great measure from the hopes that were given of creating discontentments and divisions among the subjects of Great Britain. This suggestion was a ministerial artifice to inflame the zeal and resentment of the nation, and intimidate the members in the opposition. Accordingly the hint was pursued, and in the address from both Houses, that could not fail of being agreeable, considering the manner in which they were dictated, particular notice was taken of this article: both peers and Commons, in many and various quarters, accused those, who, by such base and unnatural artifices, suggested the means of distressing their country, and clamoured at the inconveniences which they themselves had occasioned. To these addresses, likewise, the parliament congratulated his majesty on the arrival of the Prince of Wales in his British dominions; and the Commons sent a particular compliment to his royal highness on that occasion. The house was examined in the usual form, the House voted fifteen thousand pounds for the ensuing year; but the motion for continuing the same number of land forces which had been allowed in the preceding year, was not carried without dispute. All the arguments against a greater army in time of peace, were inconsistent with the British constitution, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, were repeated with great viracity by Mr. Shippen and Mr. W. Pulteney. These, however, were answered, and represented as absurd, by Mr. Horatio Walpole and Mr. D. two stanch adherents of the ministry. It was, as it seemed, a novel practice to be employed in different negociations: he was blunt, awkward, and slow: an orator without eloquence, an ambassador without dignity, and a plebeian without address. The other had natural parts and acquired knowledge; spoke with confidence; and in dispute was rancorous, sarcastic, peevish, and abusive.

§ X. The subsidies to Sweden, Hesse-Cassel, and Wolfenbuttel, were continued, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Mr. John Jekyll, Mr. W. Pulteney and Sir Robert Walpole, who last observed, that as the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, usually maintained a certain number of troops in their pay, it was but reasonable that Great Britain should defray no more than the expense of the additional forces which those powers had raised in consequence of their conventions with the King of England. Sir Robert Walpole perceiving that this remark made an impression on the House, thought it necessary to vindicate his measure. He explained upon the wisdom of the late king, in concluding the Hanover alliance. He affirmed, that the convention with Hesse-Cassel had prevented a war in the empire, for the interests, to which the courts of Vienna and Madrid, were attached in suspence; that the emperor had not only augmented his own forces by the help of Spanish subsidies, but also retained the troops of three electors; and if he had not been overruled and his court allowed to have as many subsidies, and all other advances towards a pacification; that, therefore, they ought not to grudge an expense which had already proved so beneficial to the tranquility of Great Britain. Sir Joseph Jekyll replied, that whatever gloss might be put upon such measure, they were repugnant to the maxims by which England in former times had steered and squared its conduct with relation to its interest abroad: that the navy was the natural strength of Great Britain—its best defence and its only interest by an engagement in war; they should be so free-hearted as to buy and maintain the forces of foreign princes, they were like never to see an end of such extravagant expenses. This gentleman, who exerted the office of master of the rolls, had approved himself a zealous defender of whip principles, was an able lawyer, a sensible speaker, and a conscientious patriot. The supplies were raised by a continuation of the land tax, the duties upon malt, cider, and perry, an additional impost on spirits and on dried fish, and by a new grant of annuities to the bank not exceeding fifty thousand pounds per annum.

§ XI. Petitions were delivered to the House of Commons from the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Bristol, complaining of the interruptions they had suffered in their trade for several years, by the depredations of the Spaniards in the West Indies. These being considered, the House ordered the lords of the admiralty to produce the other memorials of the same kind which they had received, that they might be had before the congress at Soissons; then they addressed his majesty for copies of all the letters and instructions which had been sent to Admiral Hosier, and those who succeeded him in the command of the West India squadron. Mr. Ogilthorpe having been informed of shocking cruelties and oppressions exercised by googlers upon their prisoners, moved for an examination of the evidence and with a request that those, who, by such base and unnatural artifices, suggested the means of distressing their country, and clamoured at the inconveniences which they themselves had occasioned. To these addresses, likewise, the parliament congratulated his majesty on the arrival of the Prince of Wales in his British dominions; and the Commons sent a particular compliment to his royal highness on that occasion. The house was examined in the usual form, the House voted fifteen thousand pounds for the ensuing year; but the motion for continuing the same number of land forces which had been allowed in the preceding year, was not carried without dispute. All the arguments against a greater army in time of peace, were inconsistent with the British constitution, and dangerous to the liberties of the people, were repeated with great into dungeons, and destroyed prisoners for debt, under his charge, treating them in the most barbarous and cruel manner, in high violation and contempt of the laws of the kingdom. When Huggins, Bagnall, and two others of the Fleet-prison, were subjected to a resolution of the same nature. The House presented an address to the king, desiring he would direct his attorney-general forthwith to prosecute these persons and their accomplices, who were parties to these enormities; to Newgate, where the bill was brought in, disabling Bankbridge to execute the office of warden: for another the better regulating the prison of the Fleet; and for the more effectually preventing and punishing arbitrary and illegal practices of the warden of the said prison.

§ XI. Other merchants complained by petition of the losses sustained by the Spaniards. The House, in a grand committee, deliberated on this subject, inquired into the particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an address to the king, desiring his majesty would be graciously pleased to use his utmost endeavours for preventing such depredations; for procuring just and reasonable satisfaction, and for securing to his subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British colonies in America. The king assured them he would use his best endeavours to answer the desires and expectations of his subjects in so much as he could, and the answer was, in another address, thanked him for his gracious answer. They did not, however, receive such a satisfactory reply to a former address, touching the sum of sixty thousand pounds that had been stated in the public account, without specification of the particular uses to which it was applied. His majesty gave them to understand that the money had been issued and disbursed for secret services; and that a distinct and particular account of the distribution of it could not be given without a manifest prejudice to the public. A bill was prepared for the more effectual preventing bribery and corruption in elections for members of parliament; and it passed through the House without opposition. It was employed upon the Spanish depredations, which had raised a great clamour through the whole kingdom, and excited very warm disputes in parliament; for they were generally reputed the fruits of negligence, incapacity, or want of vigour in the ministers. The Commons having made further progress in the inquiry, and received fresh petitions from the merchants, passed some resolutions, in which the Spaniards were accused of having violated the treaty subsisting between the two crowns; and with having treated inhumanly the masters and crews of the ships belonging to Great Britain. They justified the instructions given to Admiral Hower, to seize and detain the flota and galleons of Spain; and satisfaction would be evident of it to his majesty and his allies; nay, even declared that such seizure would have been just, prudent, and necessary, tending to prevent an open rupture, and to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. They again addressed the king in use his endeavours to procure satisfaction; and he promised to comply with their request.

§ XI. Mr. Scroope, member for Bristol, moved for an address entitling his majesty to order an account of the produce of the civil-list revenues for one year to be laid before the House. The address was presented, the account produced, and the House in a grand committee, took this affair into consideration. The courtiers affirmed that they believed none but the high officers were then employed upon his majesty; and Mr. Scroope proposed that the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds should be granted to the king, on account of those deficiencies and arrears. The motion was vigorously opposed by Mr. Pultney and other members. They expressed their surprise that it should be made so late in the session, when no further demand of money could be reasonably expected; and that the more extraordinary, because it did not appear in the former session, from the examination of the accounts then before the House, that the revenues of the civil list produced yearly a much greater sum than that for which they were given. Mr. Pultney mov'd, that the accounts and papers should be referred to the examination of a select committee, properly empowered to investigate the justice of the truth of the motion; and the question being put, it passed in the negative. The majority voted the sum demanded; and in a bill for settling the price of imported corn, they inserted the resolution for granting to his majesty the sum of one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds, so account of arrears due on the civil-list revenues.

§ XIV. The House of Lords having prepared a bill for the more effectual punishment of forgery, which was passed into a law, and ordered the judges to bring in on the report of a committee appointed to consider the case of imprisoned debtors, at length deliberated upon the state of the nation, particularly the positive demands made by the court of Spain for the restitution of Gibraltar, grounded in a letter written by the late king to his catholic majesty. From a copy of the letter laid before the House, it plainly appeared that King George I. had consented to this restitution. A motion being made for a resolution, importing that for the honour of his majesty, and the preservation and security of the trade and commerce of the kingdom, effectual care should be taken in the present treaty that the King of Spain should renounce all claims of property, interest, and pretensions, on both sides, and to maintain strong terms: a debate ensued, and the question being put, passed in the negative, though not without a protest. Then the majority resolved, that the House did entirely approve of their majesty's grants of the whole sum to the nation, for honour and securing the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the present treaty to preserve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and Minorca. When the House examined the proposed relations of the Spanish depredations, many severe reflections were uttered against the conduct of the ministry; and the motion was made, to resolve that House's expedition was an unreasonable burthen on the nation: but this too was rejected, and occasioned another protest, which was read in the corn bill, for granting one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds to his majesty, pass through the House of Peers without warm opposition. Divers lords alleged, that, instead of a deficiency in the civil-list revenues, there was a considerable surplus; that this was a new grant, and a new burthen on the people: that the nation was loaded, not to complete, but to augment, the sum designed for the civil list; and that at a time when the public debts were increased, when the taxes were heavily felt in all parts of the country; when the foreign trade of Britain was encumbered and diminished; when her manufactures were decayed, her poor multiplied, and she was surrounded by many other distresses, and insufficiencies, it would be evident of it to his majesty and his allies; nay, even declared that such seizure would have been just, prudent, and necessary, tending to prevent an open rupture, and to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. They again addressed the king in use his endeavours to procure satisfaction; and he promised to comply with their request.

§ XV. The king had, on the twenty-fourth day of March, given the royal assent to five bills; and on the fourteenth day of May, the same sanction was given to thirty other bills, including an act, enabling the queen to be regent in the kingdom during his majesty's absence, without taking the oaths; and the bills were passed at the same time two-and-thirty private bills were passed: then the king expressed his approbation of the parliament, signified his intention to visit his German dominions, and ordered the chancellor to prorogue both Houses. His majesty was then informed, that a force of men was set out for Hanover, on the seventeenth day of May, in order to remove a petty misunderstanding which had happened between that electorate and the court of Berlin. Some sums of money, which were previously voted, were voted into the service of Prussia: and the regents of Hanover had seized certain Prussian officers, by way of reprisal. The whole united kingdom of Great Britain at this juncture enjoyed uninterrupted repose; and commerce continued to increase, in spite of all restriction and discouragement. The people of Ireland found themselves happy under the government of Lord Carteret; and their parliament, assembling in the month of September, approved themselves the hopes of their country. They established funds for the charge of their national debt, and for maintaining the expense of government; they enacted wholesome laws for the encouragement of manufactures, trade, and agriculture; and the ministers of the crown were employed in different branches of civil economy. Some time after this session, which was conducted with so much harmony and patriotism, Lord Carteret returned to England; and was succeeded by the Countess Dowager of St. Sebastian, who declined the title of queen, but assumed that of Marchioness of Somer- rive. Though the congress at Sissinghurst proved abortive, conferences were begun at Seville, between the plenipo- tentiaries of England, France, and Spain; and a treaty was concluded for settling the debts of the crown, without the concurrence of the emperor, but even contrary to his right, as established by the quadruple alliance. On this subject he communicated an imperial commission to the duchy of Parma, and the principality of Arenberg, to Ratisbon, which was answered by the French minister de Chavigny. In October, Peter H. Czar of Muscovy, and grandson of Peter I, died in the fifteenth year of his age, at Moscow, and was succeeded on the Russian throne by the Princess Anne Ivanowna, second daughter of John Alexowitz, elder brother of the first Peter, and widow of Frederick William Duke of Courland. The following month was renowned remarkable by the death of Pope Benedict XIII, in whose room Cardinal Laurence Cecchi was raised to the pontificate, and assumed the name of Clement XII.

§ XVII. The British parliament assembling on the thir- teenth day of January, the king gave them to understand, that the peace of Europe was now established by the treaty of Seville, built upon the foundation of former treaties, and tending to render more effectual what the contracting powers in the quadruple alliance were before engaged to see performed. He assured them, that all former conventions made with Spain in favour of the British trade and navigation were renewed and confirmed: that the free, unconditional treaty concluded by the states-general of Spain, that the court of Spain had agreed to an ample restitution and reparation for unlawful seizures and depredations; that all rights, privileges, and possessions, belonging to him and his allies, were solemnly re-established, confirmed, and confirmed; and that the nation, renouncing the right to the prejudice of his subjects. He told them that he had given orders for reducing a great number of his land forces, and for laying up great part of the fleet: and observed that there would be a considerable saving in the expense of the current year. After both Houses had presented their address to the king, and the king, on the peace of Seville, the Lords took that treaty into consideration, and it did not pass inquiry without severe amendment.

§ XVIII. The lords in the opposition excepted to the article by which the merchants of Great Britain were obliged to make proof of their losses at the court of Spain. They said this stipulation was a hardship upon British subjects, and dishonourable to the nation: that few would care to undertake, much more to undergo, a journey, especially as they had reason to apprehend their claims would be counterbalanced by the Spaniards; and, after all, they would have no more than the slender comfort of hoping to obtain that redress by commissaries which they had not been able to procure by plenipoten- tiaries. They thought it very extraordinary, that Great Britain should be bound to ratify and guarantee whatever agreement should be made between the King of Spain and the Duke of Parma and Tuscany, concerning the garrisons once established in their countries; that the English should be obliged to assist in effectuating the introduction of six thousand Spanish troops into the towns of Tuscany and Parma without the specification of the terms on which they were taken, or the charge to be incurred in giving that assistance; that they should guarantee for ever, not only to Don Carlos, but even all his successors, the possession of the estates of Tuscany and Parma, or the probability that it would involve Great Britain in endless quarrels and disputes, about a country with which they had no concern. They affirmed that the treaty of Seville, instead of confirming other treaties, was calculated to produce the quadruple alliance, particularly in the article of introducing Spanish troops into Tuscany and Parma, in the room of neutral forces stipulated by the former alliance; and agreeing that they should there remain until Don Carlos and his successors should be secure and exempt from all interdicts. They complained that these alterations, from the tenor of the quadruple alliance, were made without the concurrence of the emperor, and even without inviting him to accede; an affront which might alienate his friendship from England, and hazard the loss of such an ancient, powerful, and faithful ally: they declared that throughout the whole treaty there seemed to be an artful omission of any express stipulation, to secure Great Britain in her right to Gibraltar and Minorca. But the objections put on the peace of Nantes, in the form of the objections made to the peace: then Lord Bathurst moved for a resolution, that the agreement on the treaty of Seville, to secure the succession of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuscany and Parma, and the sending of Spanish troops, was a manifest violation of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, tending to involve the nation in a dangerous and expensive war, and to destroy the balance of power in Europe. The question was put, and the motion rejected. Such too was the fate of two other motions, to resolve that Great Britain's right of sovereignty, dominion, possession, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, were not ascertained by the treaty of Seville: and that the stipulations in that treaty for repairing the losses of the British merchants were insufficient and precarious. The majority, far from stigmatizing this transaction, resolved, that the treaty did contain all necessary stipulations for maintaining and securing the honour, dignity, rights, and posses- sions of the crown: that all due care was taken therein for the support of the trade of the kingdom, and for re- pairing the losses sustained by the British merchants. On these resolutions an address of approbation was ordered, but when a motion was made for an address to his majesty, that he would order to be laid before the House a list of all pensions payable to the crown, it was immediately re- solved in the negative. The大理 letto courtp the question of arose upon the ministry bill, the pension bill, and the mainte- nance of the twelve thousand hussars; but the ministry bore down all opposition, though their triumphs were clouded with vigorous protest, which did not fail to make impression upon the body of the peers; and the motion rejected.
House of Commons altogether pure, and free from exception and dispute. When the charge of the land forces fell under the consideration of the Commons, and Mr. Henry Pelham,secretary at war, advised that a fresh remit for the land service of the ensuing year should be fixed at seventeen thousand seven hundred and nine, Mr. Pulney intimated upon its being reduced to twelve thousand. Mr. Skippon affirmed, that Mr. Pelham's motion was a dot negative to the address for which he voted on the first day of the session, as it plainly implied a distrust of the validity of the late treaty, which he then assured the House would immediately produce all the beneficial effects of the peace, and that the King was solicited from the apprehensions of inconveniences of a war. He said the motion tended directly towards the establishment of an army in Great Britain, which he hoped would never be so far Germanized, as to submit to a military government. He observed, that the motion could have no occasion for all the troops that were demanded, considering the glorious scene of affairs which was now opened to all Europe. "They are not necessary (said he) to save Spain into a firm adherence to its own treaty; they are not necessary to force the emperor into an immediate accession; nor are they in any sort necessary for the safety of his majesty's person and government. Force and violence are the means of improper ends only; it is because they are, with good reason, distressful of the people whom they oppress; and because they have no other security for the continuance of their unlawful and unnatural dominion than what depends entirely on the immolation of their terminated strength." The motion, however, was carried in the affirmative.

§ XX. Another warm debate was excited by a bill which the courtiers brought in, to prevent any subjects of Great Britain from advancing sums of money to foreign princes or states, without having obtained licence from his majesty, under his privy-seal, or some great authority. The minister pretended that this law was proposed to disable the English merchants, and to prevent a great sum of money from the English merchants, from raising and maintaining troops to disturb the tranquility of Europe. The bill contained a clause, empowering the king to prohibit by proclamation all such loans of money, jewels, or bullion: the attorney-general was empowered to compel, by English bill, in the court of exchequer, the effectual discovery, on oath of any such bills; and it was enacted, that in default of an answer to any such bill the court should proceed against the person accusing the offender, Mr. Daniel Pulney, a gentleman of uncommon talents and abilities, and particularly acquainted with every branch of commerce, argued strenuously against this bill, as a violation of liberty, to which he conceived that the conduct of the English merchants, from raising and maintaining troops to disturb the tranquility of Europe, and the want of money to the nations of the continent. He said that by this general prohibition, extending to all princes, states, or potentates, the English merchants would be totally disabled from assisting these enemies at their best allies: that among others, the King of Portugal frequently borrowed money from the English merchants residing within his dominions; that while the licensing power remained in the crown, the licenses would be issued through the hands of the minister, who by this new trade might gain twenty, thirty, or forty thousand a-year: that the bill would render the exchequer a court of inquisition; and that whilst it restrained our merchants from assisting the princes and potentates, and from being enabled to trade in their markets, it would render the exchequer a court of inquisition for their funds without interruption. Other arguments of equal weight were enforced by Mr. Barnard, a merchant of London, who perfectly understood trade in all its branches, and particularly in the exportation of bullion, andupon all occasions steadily adhered to the interest and liberties of his country. After having explained his reasons, he declared he should never consent to a bill which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, a breach of our dear liberties, and a very dangerous and very servile kind. Sir William Wyndham distinguished himself on the same side of the question: the bill was vandicated by

Sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and Sir Philip Yong, attorney-general; and being supported by the whole weight of ministerial influence, not only passed through the House, but was carried in a number of effusions, which had never before been. The measure was granted according to the estimates which the ministry thought proper to produce, amounting to about two millions two hundred and eighty thousand pounds. It must be owned, however, for the credit of this session, that the House mortified one million pounds towards the discharge of the national debt; and by another act extinguished the duties upon salt, by which expedient the subject was eased of a heavy burden, not only in being freed from the duty, but also from a considerable charge of salaries given to a great number of officers employed to collect this imposition. They likewise encouraged the colony of Carolina with an act, allowing the planters and traders of that province to export rice directly to any part of Europe southward of Cape Finisterre; and they permitted salt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New York. The term of the exclusive trade granted by act of parliament to the British East India Company was extended to thirty years, to considerate merchants and others made application for being incorporated and vested with the privilege of trading to those countries, proposing to lay that branch of trade open to all the English, with the privilege of extension in strength. In consideration of an act of parliament for this purpose, they offered to advance three millions two hundred thousand pounds, for redeeming the fund and trade of the present East India Company. This proposal was rejected; and the exclusive privilege vested in the company was, by the act of parliament, protracted to the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, upon the following conditions: that they should pay into the exchequer the sum of two thousand pounds during the last two years of the term of the previous act, without interest or addition to their capital stock: that the annuity or yearly fund of one hundred and sixty thousand pounds, payable to them from the public, should be reduced to one hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds: that after the year one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, their right to the exclusive trade should be liable to be taken away by parliament, on three years' notice, and repayment of their capital.

§ XXII. On the fifteenth day of May, A.D. 1730, the king went to the House of Peers, and closed the session. In his speech he expressed his joy, that notwithstanding all the clamours which were raised, the parliament was determined to hand over to the Hollanders their consideration; a circumstance which, he said, could not fail to inspire all mankind with a just detestation of those incendiaries, who, by scandalous libels, laboured to alienate the affections of his people; to fill their minds with groundless jealousies and unjust complaints, in dishonour of him and his government, and in defiance of the sense of both Houses of parliament. The emperor was so much incensed at the insult offered him in the treaty of Seville, with respect to the garrisons of Tuscany and Parma, that he prohibited the subjects of Great Britain from trading in his dominions: he began to make preparations for war, and actually detached bodies of troops to Italy, with the intention of having his claim to the hereditary rights of the House of Austria. Yet the article of which he complained was not so much at invested him as an affront put upon the head of the empire; for the eventual succession to those Italian dukedoms had been secured to the Infant Don Carlos, by the quadruple alliance; and all that the emperor required was, that this prince should receive the investiture of them as fees of the empire.

§ XXIII. In Great Britain, that misfortune was not distinguished by any transaction of great moment. Seven chiefs of the Cherokee nations of Indians, in America, were brought to England by Sir Alexander Cummin. Being to take the oath therein mentioned. In all probability this bill would not have made any noise, if the ministry had had the prudence, which has never been well ascertained, it would stick with the upper House, where it was rejected at the second reading, though not without some opposition. introduced to the king they laid their crown and regalia at his feet; and by an authentic deed acknowledged themselves subjects to his dominion, in the name of all their companions. This was the last of parliament; and with the purpose.

They were amazed and confounded at the riches and magnificence of the British court: they compared the king and queen to the sun and moon, the princes to the stars of heaven, and themselves to nothing. They gave the present in the most solemn manner to articles of friendship and commerce, proposed by the lords commissioners for trade and plantations: and being loaded with presents of necessaries, arms, and ammunition, were reconveyed to their ships. A treaty of friendship, and a bill of trade to the Southern Carolinas. In the month of September a surprising revolution was effected at Constantinople, without bloodshed or confusion. A few mean janissaries displayed a flag in the streets, explaining that all true Mussulmen ought to follow them, and assist in reforming the government. They soon increased to the number of one hundred thousand, marched to the seraglio, and demanded the grand vizir, the kajta, and captain pacha. These unhappy ministers were immediately strangled. Their bodies being delivered to the insurgents, were dragged through the streets, and afterwards thrown to the dogs to be devoured. Not contented with this sacrifice, the revolted deputies grand Signor Aktials, and the sultan, who were allowed to live when they brought his nephew Machmut, and raised this last to the throne, after he had lived seven-and-twenty years in confinement.

§ XXVI. England was at this period infested with robberesses, assassins, and inconsiderate, the natural consequences of degeneracy, corruption, and the want of police in the interior government of the kingdom. This defect, in a great measure, arose from an absurd notion, that laws necessary to prevent this acts of cruelty, violence, and rapine, would be incompatible with the liberty of British subjects; a notion that confounds all distinctions between liberty and brutal licentiousness, as if that freedom was desirable, in the enjoyment of which, there is no other restraint on their lives or effects. The peculiar depravity of the times was visible even in the conduct of those who preyed upon the commonwealth. Thieves and robbers were now become more desperate and savage than ever they had appeared since mankind was civilized. In the exercise of their rapine, they wounded, maimed, and even murdered the unhappy sufferers, through a wantonness of barbarity. They circulated letters demanding sums of money from certain individuals, by way of fines, for the number of years, or their families to ruin; and even set fire to the house of a rich merchant in Bristol, who had refused to comply with their demand. The same species of villany was practised in towns of the British dominions across the Channel, where it was obliged to interpose, and offer a considerable reward for discovering the ruffians concerned in such execrable designs.

§ XXV. In the speech with which the king opened the session of parliament on the twenty-first day of January, he told them, that the present critical juncture seemed in a very particular manner to deserve their attention: that as the transactions then depending in the several courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might be very much affected by their first resolutions, which were expected by different powers with great impatience. He said, the continuance of that real and violent war with which their houses to attempt and him and his engagements, must at this time be of the greatest weight and importance, both with regard to his allies, and to those who might be disposed, before the suspension of actions, by an accommodation, to the fatal consequences of a general rupture. The former scene was repeated. Both Houses, in their addresses, promised to support his majesty, in all his engagements; yet the members in the opposition demonstrated the absurdisty of promising to fulfill engagements, before they could possibly know whether or not they were for the service of Great Britain. Another bill was brought into the House of Commons, to prevent pensioners from sitting as members of parliament, and with this the Lords concurred.

The supply fell under consideration, the debates were renewed upon the subsidies to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel and the Duke of Wolvenburg, which however were continued; and every article was granted according to the estimates given in for the expense of the ensuing year. Two petitions being presented to the Commons, representing the delays of justice, occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceed- ings, and the expense of this mode of proceeding, and enacting that all those processes and pleadings should be entered in the English language. Though one would imagine that very little could be advanced against such a regulation, the bill met with warm opposition, on presence that it would render useless the ancient records which were written in that language, and introduce confusion and delay of justice, by altering the established form and method of pleading: in spite of these objections it passed through both Houses and obtained the royal assent. A great number of merchants from different parts of the kingdom having repeated their complaints of deprecations and cruelties committed by the Spaniards in the American colonies, and in the East Indies, there was introduced another bill by which they brought his nephew Machmut, and raised this last to the throne, after he had lived seven-and-twenty years in confinement.

in consideration. A.D. 1731.

they read a bill for the free importation of woot from Ireland into England, which was fiercely opposed and had aside, contrary to all the rules of sound policy. They passed the bill for carving on proceedings at law in the English language; and a fruitless motion was made by Lord Bathurst for an address, to desire his majesty would give directions for discouraging the Hessian troops that were in the pay of Great Britain. On the seventh day of May the parliament was prorogued, after the king had given them to understand, that all apprehensions of war were now happily removed by a treaty signed at Vienna between him and the emperor. He said it was no less conciliated to the courts of France and Spain, as parties to the treaty of Seville, the execution of which it principally regarded; and that it was likewise submitted to the consideration of the States-general. He observed, that the conditions and engagements into which he had entered on this occasion were agreeable to that necessary concern which the British nation must always have for the security and safety of the balance of power in Europe: and that this happy turn, duly improved with a just regard to former alliances, yielded a favourable prospect of seeing the public tranquillity re-established.

XXVIII. On the death of James I., the Duke of Parma died, after having made a will in which he declared his duchess was three months advanced in her pregnancy; entitling the allied powers of Europe to have compassion upon her, and defer the execution of their projects until her consort should be delivered. In case the child should be still-born, or die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and avowed estates to the Infant Don Carlos of Spain; and appointed five regents to govern the duchy. Notwithstanding this testament, a body of imperial troops immediately took possession of Parma and Placentia, under the command of General Stampa, who declared they should conduct themselves with all possible regularity and moderation, and leave the administration entirely to the regents whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market-place, that they took possession of these dukedoms for the Infant Don Carlos, that in the deepest distress the king should not be defrauded of a prince, the said infant might receive the investiture from the emperor whenever he would, provided he should come without an army. Though these steps seemed to threaten an immediate war, the King of Great Britain had no intention of intervening in these-states-general interests, but he so effectually with the court of Vienna, that the emperor desisted from the prosecution of his design; and on the sixteenth day of March concluded at Vienna a treaty with his Hapsburg majesty, by which he consented to withdraw his troops from Parma and Placentia. He agreed, that the King of Spain might take possession of these places in favour of his son Don Carlos, according to the treaty of Rastatt; he likewise signed, the second company, which had given such umbrage to the maritime powers, should be totally dissolved, on condition that the contracting powers concerned in the treaty of Seville should guarantee the free navigation, or succession of the Austrian hereditary dominions to the heirs female of the emperor, in case he should die without male issue. The Dutch minister residing at the imperial court did not subscribe this treaty, because by the maxims received in that republic, and the nature of her government, he could not be vested with full powers so soon as it would have been necessary: nevertheless the States-general were, by a separate article, expressly named as a principal contractingparty to put an end to these hostilities.

XXIX. On the twenty-second day of July a new treaty was signed at Vienna between the emperor and the King of Great Britain and Spain, tending to confirm the former; and a treaty of alliance between the electorates of Saxony and Hanover was executed at Dresden. The court of Spain expressing some doubts with regard to the pregnancy of the Duchess of Parma, she underwent a formal examination by five midwives of different nations, in presence of the elder duchess dowager, several ladies of quality, three physicians, and a surgeon; and was declared with child: nevertheless, after having kept all Europe in suspense for six months, she owned she had been deceived; General Stampa, with the imperial forces, took formal possession of the dukedoms of Parma and Placentia. Spain and the Great Duke of Tuscany having acceded to the last treaty of Vienna, the crown of Great Britain engaged to equip an armament that should convey Don Carlos to his new dominions. Accordingly, Sir Charles Wager sailed with a strong squadron from Portsmouth on the twenty-sixth day of August, in September he arrived at Barceloneta, where, being joined by the Spanish fleet and transports, they sailed together to Leichon: from whence the admiral returned to England. Don Carlos passed through part of France, and embarking at Antibes on board of the Spanish galley, arrived at the balance of the fleet in December, and imperial general withdrew his forces into the Milanese; and the infant took possession of his new territories.

X. During these transactions France was distracted by religious disputes, occasioned by the bull Uniguisitque thundered against the doctrines of Jansenius; a bull which had produced a schism in the Gallican church, and created the most violent discontents and confusion. It was opposed by the parliaments and lay tribunals of the kingdom; but many bishops, and the Jesuits in general, were its most strenuous assurers. All the articles of the Edict of Nantes were on both sides inflamed the enthusiasm, and manage the superstition, of the people. Pretended miracles were wrought at the tomb of Abbe Pari, who had died without accepting the bull, which conspired to destroy the edifice of their constitution. On the other hand, the Jesuits exerted all their abilities and industry in preaching against the Jansenists; in establishing an opinion of their superior sanctity; and in inspiring a spirit of quietism among their members, who were transferring them only on both possessions, illumination, and supernatural converse. These arts were often used for the most infamous purposes. Female enthusiasts were brought up to such a violence of agitation, that nature fainted under the struggle, and the pseudo-saint seized this opportunity of violating the chastity of his penitent. Such was said to be the case of Madameisselle la Cadene, a young gentlewoman of Toulon, abused of two priests, and in consequence, of one of the Gird, a noted Jesuit, who undertook a trial before the parliament of Aix, and very narrowly escaped the stake.

XXX. The parliament of Great Britain meeting on the thirteenth day of January, the king in his speech declared, that the party would not be his mediators, until the difficulties were disposed of, which were caused by the law of 1728, and established by the last treaty of Vienna; and Don Carlos was actually possessed of Parma and Placentia; that six thousand Spaniards were quietly admitted and quartered in the ducy of Tuscany, to secure, by the express consent and agreement of the great duke, the reversion of his dominions; and that a family convention was made between the courts of Spain and Tuscany, for preserving mutual peace and commerce, and security of the Queens eldest son. Commons, that the estimates for the service of the current year would be considerably less than those of former years. He recommended unanimity: he observed that his government had no security but that he was equal and conducive to their happiness, and to the protection of his people: that their prosperity had no foundation but in the defence and support of his government. "Our safety, (said he,) is mutual, and our interests inseparable." The opposition to the court measures appears to have been uncommonly spirited during the course of this session. The minister's motions were attacked with all the artillery of eloquence. His principal emissaries were obliged to task the public mind to their full extent, in the perplexity where they could not demonstrate and convince, to misrepresent what they could not vindicate, and to elude the arguments which they could not refute. In the House of Commons, Lord Hervey, had submitted the chamberlain of his majesty's household, made a motion for an address of thanks, in which they should declare their entire approbation of the king's conduct, acknowledge the blessings they enjoyed under his government, express their confidence in the wisdom of his counsels, and declare their readiness to grant the necessary supplies. This member, son to the Earl of Bristol, was a nobleman of some parts, which, however, were more specious than solid. He was unacquainted to a minister, and appeared himself extremely active in forwarding all his designs, whether as a secret emissary or public orator: in which last capacity he appears to have been pert, frivolous, and frothy. His motion was seconded by Mr. Clutterbuck, and opposed by Sir Wilford Lawton, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pulteney, Sir William Wyndham, and Mr. Ogilvy-thorpe. They did not argue against a general address, but they apprehended a bad tendency of expressions which implied a blind approbation of all the measures of the ministry. Sir Wilford Lawton observed, that notwithstanding the great things we had done for the crown of Spain, and the favours we had procured for the nobility in that kingdom, little was said of the satisfaction had as yet been received for the injuries our merchants had sustained from that nation. Mr. Pulteney took notice, that the nation, by becoming guarantors to the pragmatic sanction, laid itself under an obligation to assist the Austrian family when attacked by any potentate whatever, except the grand signior: that they might be attacked when it would be much against the interest of the kingdom to engage itself in a war upon any foreign account: that it might always be found of more interest of the nation to join against them, in order to preserve the balance of Europe, the establishing of which had already cost England such immense sums of money. He insisted upon the absurdity of concluding such a number of inconsistent treaties; and concluded with saying, that if affairs abroad were now happily established, the ministry which conducted them might be compared to a pilot, who, though they navigate the ship very well, yet took it in his head to carry the ship a great way about, through sands, rocks, and shallows; who, after having lost a great number of seamen, destroyed a great deal of tackle and rigging, and subjected the owners to an enormous expense, at last by chance hits the port, and triumphs in his good conduct. Sir William Wyndham spoke to the same purpose. Mr. Goglethorpe, a gentleman of unblemished character, brave, generous, and humane, affirmed that it must always be found of more interest of the nation and interest of the nation than did the guarantee of the pragmatic sanction. He said he wished to have heard that the new works at Dunkirk had been entirely raised and defended. But the minister could not promise complete satisfaction for the depredations committed by the natives of Spain: that more care was taken in disciplining the militia, on whose value the nation must chiefly depend, and that never concur in a treaty which had been shown to the oppressed protestants in Germany. He expressed his satisfaction to find that the English were not so closely united to France as formerly; for he had generally observed, that when two dogs were in a leash to govern each other, they were always in contention; and this he said was always been the case between France and Great Britain. The motion was vigorously defended by Mr. Pelham, paymaster of the forces, and brother to the Duke of Newcastle, a man whose greatest fault was his being concerned in supporting the measures of a corrupt ministry. In other respects he was liberal, candid, benevolent, and even attached to the interest of his country, though erroneously mistaken in his notions of government. On this occasion he asserted, that it was no way inconsistent with the honour or dignity of that House, to thank his majesty in the most particular terms for every thing he had done pleased to communicate in his majesty's throne: that no expressions of approbation in the address could be any ways mode of to prevent an inquiry into the measures which had been pursed, when the treaties should be laid before the House. He said, at the opening of the present parliament, they had nothing to urge against the greatness of Great Britain, and from the parliament's first resolves all the neighbouring powers judged of the unanimity that would enter between his majesty and the representatives of his people: that their appearing jealous or diffident of his majesty's conduct would weaken his influence upon the councils of foreign states or potentates, and perhaps put it out of his power to rectify any false step that might have been made by his ministers. His arguments were reinforced by a long speech from Mr. H. Walpole. The question was put, the motion carried, and the address presented.

XXXI. The next subject of debate was the number of land forces. When the supply fell under consideration, Sir W. Strockland, secretary at war, moved that the same number which had been maintained in the preceding year should be continued in pay. On the other hand, Lord Morpeth, having demonstrated the danger to which the liberties of the nation might be exposed, by maintaining a numerous standing army in time of peace, made a motion that the number should be reduced to twelve thousand. A debate was opened upon this important subject, the first motion by Lord Hervey, Sir Robert Walpole, and his brother, Mr. Pelham, and Sir Philip York, attorney-general. This gentleman was counted a better lawyer than a politician, odious, and an orator in the House of Commons. The last partisan of the ministry was Sir William Yonge, one of the lords commissioners of the treasury: a man who rendered himself serviceable and necessary, by stooping to all compliances, running upon every scent, and haranguing on every subject with an even, uninterrupted, tedious flow of dull declamation, composed of assertions without vanity, conclusions from false premises, words without truth, and language without propriety. Lord Morpeth's motion was espoused by Mr. Watkin Williams Wynne, a gentleman of an ancient family and opulent fortune in Wales, whose open, honest speech, and warmly attached to the ancient constitution and hierarchy; he was supported by Mr. Walter Plumer, who spoke with weight, precision, and severity, by Sir W. Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, Mr. W. Pultney, and Mr. Stanley. He was of opinion that it was necessary to maintain such a number of land forces as might defeat the designs of malcontents, secure the interior tranquillity of the kingdom, defend it from external assaults, overawe its neighbours, and enable it to take vigorous measures in case the peace of Europe should be re-embroiled. They affirmed, the science of war was so much altered, and required so much attention, that no dependence was to be placed upon a militia: that all nations were obliged to maintain standing armies, and the security against the encroachments of neighbouring powers: that the number of troops in Great Britain was too considerable to excite the jealousy of the people even under the circumstances of that time; that his majesty's ministers entertained the least thoughts of infringing the liberties of his subjects; that it could not be supposed that the officers, among whom were many gentlemen of family and fortune, would ever concur in a treaty that would make the forces now in pay could not properly deemed a standing army, inasmuch as they were voted and maintained from year to year by the parliament, which was the representative of the people. The gentlemen argued the members in the opposition replied, that the principles of time in peace was unconstitutional, and had been always thought dangerous; that a militia was as capable of discipline as a standing army, and would have more incentives to courage and perseverance: that the civil magistrate was able to preserve the peace of the country: that the number of the malcontents was altogether contemptible, though it might be considerably augmented by maintaining a standing army; and other such absurd arguments: that other nations had been enslaved by standing armies: and howsoever they might find themselves necessitated to depend upon a military force for security against encroachments of foreign courts: that the numbers in Great Britain, for the defence of which nature had provided in a peculiar manner: that this provision was strengthened and improved by a numerous navy, which secured her dominion on the sea; and, if properly disposed, would render her paramount in all matters of war: that the land army of Great Britain, though sufficient to endanger the liberties of an unarmed people, could not possibly secure such an extent of coast, and therefore could be of very little service in preventing an invasion: that though they had all imaginable confidence in his majesty's regard for the liberty of his subjects, they could not help apprehending, that should a standing army become part of the constitution, another prince of more dangerous talents, and more fatal designs, might arise, and employ it for the worst purposes of ambition: that though many officers were gentlemen of honour and probity, these might be easily discarded by the government, which was a quite different temper. By these means, practised in former times, an army had been new modelled to such a degree, that they turned their swords against the parlia-dment, for whose defence they had been raised, and destroyed the constitution both in church and state.

With respect to its being wholly dependent on the parliament, the people of England would have reason to complain of the same hardship, whether a standing army were or were not necessary. The ministry, on the other hand, had been voted from year to year, according to the direction of the ministry: that the sanction of the legislature, granted to measures in which they are unconstitutional, boundless

chains of national slavery, would be that of ministerial influence operating upon a venal parliament. Such were the reasons urged against a standing army, of what number soever it might be composed: but the expediency of reducing the number from about eighteen thousand to twelve thousand, was insisted upon as the natural consequence of his majesty's declaration, by which they were to understand that the peace of Europe was established; and that he had nothing so much at heart as the ease of the people. It was suggested, that if eighteen thousand men were sufficient on the supposed eve of a general war in Europe, it was surely reasonable to think that a less number would suffice when peace was preserved.

Whatever had upon the body of the nation, they made an converts in the House, where the majority resolved that the standing army should be maintained without reduction. Mr. Plumer complained, that the country was oppressed by an arbitrary method of quartering soldiers, in an undue proportion, upon those publicans who refused to vote in elections according to the direction of the minister. Mr. Pulteney asserted, that the money raised for the subsistence of eighteen thousand men in England, would maintain sixty thousand French or Germans, or the same number of almost any other people on the continent. Sir William Wyndham declared, that eighteen thousand of the English troops were maintained at less than two-thirds of the sum now demanded for the like number: but no regard was paid to these allegations.

§ XXXI. The next object of importance that attracted the attention of the House, was the state of the charitable corporation. This company was first erected in the year one thousand seven hundred and seven. Their profession intention was to lend money at legal interest to the poor, upon small pledges; and to persons of a better rank upon an indissoluble and irreclaimable. Their capital was at first limited to thirty thousand pounds; but, by licences from the crown, they increased it to six hundred thousand pounds, though their charter was never confirmed by act of parliament. In the month of October, George Robinson, Esquire, member for Marlow, the cashier, and John Thompson, warehouse-keeper of the corporation, disappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held several general courts, and appointed a committee to inspect the state of their affairs. They reported, that for a capital of above five hundred thousand pounds no equivalent was found; insomuch as their effects did not amount to the value of thirty thousand pounds, the remainder having been embezzled by means which they could not discover. The proprietors, in a petition to the House of Commons, represented, that by the most meticulous breach of trust to west persons to whom the care and management of their affairs were committed, the corporation had been deprived of the greatest part of their capital; and that many of the petitioners were reduced to the utmost degree of misery and distress; they, therefore, prayed, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of those who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to justice, without the aid of the power and authority of parliament, the House would vouchsafe to inquire into the state of the corporation; and the conduct of their managers; and give such relief to the petitioners as to the House should seem meet. The petition was graciously received, and a secret committee appointed to proceed on the inquiry. They soon discovered important fraud, which had been actuated by Robinson and Thompson, in concert with some of the directors, for embezzling the capital, and cheating the proprietors. Many persons of rank and quality were concerned in this infamous conspiracy: some of the first characters in the nation did not escape suspicion and censure. Sir Robert Sutton and Sir Archibald Grant were expelled the House of Commons, as having a considerable share in those fraudulent practices: a bill was brought into parliament for restraining them and altering the laws relating to the people, who was alienated from the kingdom, or altering their effects. In the mean time, the committee received a letter from Signior John Angelo Belkons, an eminent banker at Rome, giving them an account, that Thompson's successor, with all his papers, and confined to the castle of St. Angelo; and that the papers were transmitted to his cor- respondent at Paris, who would deliver them up, on certain conditions stipulated in favour of the prisoner. This letter was considered as an article to intimation a favourable opinion of the pretended, as if he had taken measures for securing Thompson, from his real for justice, and affectation for the common weal. On this occasion, the proposals of the House were concurred in an order that the letter should be burned at the Royal Exchange, by the hands of the common hangman. The lower House resolved that an act of justice should be and audacious libel, absurd and contradictory; that the whole transaction was a scandalous artifice, calculated to delude the unhappy, and to disguise and conceal the wicked practices of those that had enemies to his majesty's person, crown, and dignity.

§ XXXIII. No motion, during this session, produced such a warm contest as did that of Sir Robert Walpole, when, after a long preamble, he proposed that the duties on salt, which about two years before had been abolished, should now be revived, and granted to his majesty, his heirs and successors, for the term of three years. In order to sweeten this proposal, he declared that the land tax for the ensuing year should be reduced to one shilling in the pound. All the members of the country party were immediately in commotion. They expressed their surprise at the grossness of the imposition. They observed that two years since the land tax was increased, and that the power of the crown, of all the impositions to which the poor were subjected, and therefore it was taken off; but that no good reason could be produced for altering their opinions so suddenly, and resolving to grumble the face of the poor, in order to set himself up upon the wrong side of the question. It was affirmed, that the most general taxes are not always the least burdensome; that after a nation is obliged to extend their taxes further than the luxuries of their country, those taxes that can be raised with the least charge to the public are the most convenient and easiest to the people; but they ought carefully to avoid taxing those things which are necessary for the subsistence of the poor. The price of all necessaries being thus enhanced, the wages of the tradesman and manufacturer must be increased; and whereas these are high, the manufacturers will be undersold by those of cheaper countries. The trade must of consequence be ruined. They remember that a gentleman would choose to save a shilling in the pound from the land tax, by means of an expedient that would ruin the manufacturers of his country, and decrease the value of his own fortune. They alleged that the salt tax particular, which they denounced the worst, they would employ a great number of additional officers in the revenue, which extending upon the ministry, whose influence in elections they would proportionality increase. They even hinted, that this consideration was one powerful motive for proposing the revival of an odious tax, which was imposed in an act of public iniquity; and that the measure would be deemed a step towards a general excuse upon all sorts of provisions. Finally, they demonstrated that the salt tax introduced numberless frauds and perjuries in different parts of the kingdom, and that the duty revivified: yet, before the bill passed, diverse motions were made, and additional clauses proposed by the members in the opposition. New debates were raised on every new objection, and the courtiers were obliged to dispute their ground by inches.

§ XXXIV. The pension bill was revived, and for the third time was put in the House of Lords. For the encouragement of the sugar colonies passed through the lower House with great difficulty, but was lost among the Peers: another, for the better securing the freedom of Parliament, by further qualifying members to sit in the House of Commons, was the third time taken out upon the question. A committee had been appointed to inquire into a sale of the estates which had belonged to the late Earl of Derwentwater. It appeared by the report, which had been framed: a bill prepared to make it void: Dennis Bond, Esquire, and Serjeant Birch, commissioners for the sale of the forfeited estates, were declared guilty of notorious breach of trust, and expelled the House, of which they were members: George Robinson, Esquire, underwent the same sentence, on account of the part he acted in the charitable corporation, as he and Thompson had neglected to surrender themselves, according to the terms of a bill which had passed for that purpose. During this session five members of parliament were expelled for the most solemn acts of knavery: a sure sign of national degeneracy and dishonesty. All the supplies were granted, and among other articles, the King, by the act of the 21st of July, the 16th of the present year, received of the sum of twelve thousand six hundred and ninety-four pounds seven shillings and sixpence, for the aiso or difference of the subsidies payable to the crown of Denmark, in pursuance of the treaty subsisting between the two kingdoms: but that bill was altered and carried without a violent dispute. Mr. Pulteney, who bore a considerable share in all these debates, became in a little time so remarkable as to be thought worthy of a very particular mark of his majesty's displeasure: The King, on the first day of July, called for the council book, and with his own hand struck the name of William Pulteney, Esquire, out of the list of privy councillors: his majesty further ordered him to be put out of all the commissions of the peace. The severe and national resentment, from whom he had received deputations, were commanded to revoke them: and the lord chancellor and secretaries of state directed to give the necessary orders for that purpose.

§ XXXV. Nor did the House of Peers tamely and unanimously submit to the measures of the ministry. The pension bill being read, was again rejected, and a protest entered. A debate arose about the number of standing forces, and the Earl of Chatham argued for the amendment. The Earl of Oxford moved that they might be reduced to twelve thousand effective men. The Earl of Winchelsea observed, that a standing army rendered ministers of state more daring than otherwise they would be, in their measures; and they might involve the people: schemes that never could enter into the heads of any but those who were drunk with excess of power. The Marquis of Trewsdale, in reasoning against such a number as the ministry proposed, took occasion to observe that not one shilling of the forfeited estates was ever applied to the use of the public; he likewise took notice, that the eighteen thousand men, demanded as a standing force, were modelled in such a manner, that they might be speedily augmented to forty thousand men on any emergency. The Duke of Argyle endeavoured to demonstrate the danger of depending for the safety of the kingdom upon an army of this description, a fleet, or an army of auxiliaries. Then he represented the necessity of having recourse to a regular army in case of invasion; and after all, acknowledged, that the number proposed was no way sufficient for that purpose. All his arguments were answered and refuted in an excellent speech by Lord Carteret: nevertheless, victory declared for the minister. The parliament having granted every branch of the supply, towards the payment of which they borrowed a sum from the sinking-fund; and the Treasury, without the necessary encouragement of commerce and agriculture, the king, on the first day of June, gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session, after having informed both Houses that the States-General had accepted the peace of Vienna: that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his absence. He accordingly set out for Hanover in the beginning of June. By this time the pragmatic sanction was confirmed by the diet of the empire, though not without a formal protest by the Electors Palatine, Bavaria, and Saxony.

§ I. The most remarkable incident that distinguished this year in England was a very uncommon instance of suicide: an act of despair so frequent among the English, that in other countries it is objected to them; and sometimes it is observed, that it may be generally termed the effect of luxury proceeding from natural causes operating on the human body, in some few instances it seems to have been the result of cool deliberation. Richard South, a banker, and prisoner for debt within the liberties of the king's bench, persuaded his wife to follow his example in making away with herself, after they had murdered their little infant. This wretched pair were in the middle of April found hanged in a bed-chamber, at about a yard's distance from each other; and in a separate apartment the child lay dead in a cradle. They left two papers enclosed in a short letter to their landlord, whose name they had implored in favour of their dog and cat. They even left money, two or three hundred guineas, which they professed their belief and confidence in an Almighty God, the fountain of goodness and benevolence, who could not possibly take delight in the misery of his creatures; they, therefore, resigned up their lives to him without any terrible apprehensions; submitting themselves to those ways which, in his goodness, he should appoint after death. These unfortunate suicides had been always indisputable and frigidly, invincibly honest, and remarkable for conjugal affection.

§ II. Trustees having been appointed by charter to succeeded a new settlement in Georgia, situated to the southward of Carolina in America, Mr. Oglethorpe, as general, and governor of the province, embarked at Gravesend, with a number of poor families to plant that colony.

The King of Spain having equipped a very powerful armed fleet, sailed on the fourth day of June from the road of Alcantar, under the command of the Count de Montemar, and arrived on the coast of Barbary in the month of August, where a large and considerable body of troops was landed without much opposition. Next day, however, they were attacked by a numerous army of Moors, over whom they obtained a complete victory. The besiegers retired immediately with hisirezion and the Spaniards took possession of the place, from which they had been driven in the year one thousand seven and eighty. The strong fort of Mazaguar was likewise surrendered to the victors at the first summons; so that this expedition answered all the views with which it had been projected. Victor Amadeus, the abdicated King of Sardina, having, at the instigation of his wife, engaged in some intrigues, in order to re-ascend the throne, his son, the reigning king, ordered his person to be seized at Montcaler, and conveyed to Rivoli, under a strong escort. His wife, the Marchions of Spigno, was conducted to Serza. The old kings, confessors, his physicians, and eight-and-forty persons of distinction, were imprisoned. The citadel of Turin was secured with a strong garrison; and new instructions were given to the governors and officers of the colonies. The troops which had been stationed between the King of Prussia and the young Prince of Orange, touching the succession to the estates possessed by King William III, as head of the house of Orange, was at last accommodated by a formal treaty signed at Berne and Uxem. The Dutch were alarmed about this time with an apprehension of being overwhelmed by an inundation, occasioned by worms, which were said to have consumed the piles and timbers of their dykes. They prayed and fasted, with uncommon zeal, in terror of this calamity, which they did not know how to avert in any other manner. At length they were delivered from their fears by a hard frost, which effectually destroyed those destructive animals. About this time, Mr. Dieden, plenipotentiary from the Elector of Hanover, received, in the name of his master, the investiture of Brunswick and Verden from the hands of the king.

§ 111. The history of England at this period cannot be very interesting, as it chiefly consists in an annual revolution of debates in parliament. Debates, in which the same points are annually virtually argued in the same subterfuges on both wide and narrow topics. When the session was opened on the sixteenth day of January, the king declared, that the situation of affairs both at home and abroad, rendered it unnecessary for him to lay before the two houses any other reason for calling them together than the ordinary courses of the public business, and his desire of receiving their advice in such affairs as should require the care and consideration of parliament. The motion made in the House of Commons for an address of thanks implied, that they should express their satisfaction at the present situation of affairs both at home and abroad. The motion was carried, notwithstanding the opposition of those who observed, that the nation had little reason to be pleased with the present posture of affairs; that the French were employed in fortifying and restoring the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the faith of the most solemn treaties; that the British merchants had received no redress for the deprivations committed by the Spaniards; that the commerce of England daily decreased; that no sort of trade threw but the traffic of 'Change Alley, where the most abominable frauds were practised; and further, that the House, in the present session, had opened a new scene of villany and imposition.

§ 11V. The pension bill was once more revived, and lost again in the House of Peers. All the reasons formerly advanced against it were renewed, and a reduction of the number instanced upon with such warmth, that the ministerial party were obliged to have recourse to the old phantom of the pretender. Sir Archer Croft said a continuation of the same number of forces was the more necessary, because, to his knowledge, property was increasing very fast in the country; for, in one parish which he knew, there were seven poor priests; and that the danger from the pretender was the more to be feared, because they did not know but what he was then breeding his son a protestant. Sir Robert Walpole observed, that a reduction of the army was the chief thing wished for and desired by all the Jacobites in the kingdom: that no reduction had ever been made but what gave fresh hope to that party; and that such a measure would not only be against the interests of the country, but be highly dishonourable to the nation. His brother Hornick added, that the number of troops then proposed was absolutely necessary to support his majesty's government, and would be necessary as long as the nation entertained the hope of having a powerful and illustrious family on the throne. The futility, the self-contradiction, and the ridiculous absurdity of these suggestions were properly exposed; nevertheless, the army was voted without any reduction. Sir Wilfred Lawson having made a motion for an address to the king, to know what satisfaction had been made by Spain for the depredations committed on the British merchants, it was after a minute consideration of the matter parliamentially debated, and the king in answer to this remonstrance gave them to understand, that the meeting of the commissioners of the two crowns had been so long delayed by unforeseen accidents, that they were not able to settle the matter before the preceding February; and that as the courts of London and Madrid had agreed that the term of three years stipulated for finishing the commission should be computed from the present day, they expected a perfect account of their proceedings could not be given before the House of Commons. A bill had been long dependent for granting encouragement to the sugar colonies in the West Indies; but as it was founded upon a prohibition that would have operated harmfully to the trade of the British settlements in North America, it met with a very warm opposition from those who had the prosperity of those northern colonies at heart. But the bill being patronised and supported by the court of Versailles, all objections were overruled; and afterwards passed into a law. While the Commons deliberated upon the supply, Sir Robert Walpole moved, that five hundred thousand pounds should be voted out of the sinking fund for the support of the ensuing year. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, and Sir John Barrard, expatiated upon the iniquity of pillaging a sacred deposit, solemnly appropriated to the support of the arts and sciences. They shewed that the measure was nothing but a gigantic fraud; they shewed that the public business could not be conducted by the ordinary means of the ordinary course, because the proceeds of the House were crowded with multitudes of people; and the members in the opposition waited impatiently for a proposal in which they thought the liberties of their country so deeply interested. In a word, they represented it as nothing else than the House of Commons in the preceding day. The session was frequent and full, and both sides appeared ready and eager for the contest when Sir Robert Walpole broached his motion. It was now repeatedly repeated that the fear of prejudicing the people against his plan before it was known. He affirmed that the clamours occasioned by these prejudices had originally risen from smugglers and fraudulent dealers, who had enriched themselves by cheating the public; and that these had been strenuously sup-aided and supported by another set of men, fond of every opportunity to stir up the people of Great Britain to mutiny and sedition. He expatiated on the frauds that were committed in that branch of the revenue arising from the importation and sale of tobacco, and the American planters were subjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill usage they had met with from their factors and correspondents in England, who, from being their servants, were now become the associates of the American planters; the robbery and the loss sustained by the public with respect to the revenue. He asserted that the scheme he was about to propose would remove all these inconveniences, prevent much expense, and give great revenue; and the tobacco, being put at two or three hundred thousand pounds per annum to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practised by the knavish dealers in those commodities; he recited the several acts of parliament that related to the duties on wine and tobacco: he declared he had no intention to promote a general excise: he endeavoured to abate some objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He proposed to join the laws of excise to those of the customs: that the further subsidy of three farthings per pound charged upon imported tobacco should be still levied at the custom house, and payable to his majesty's civil list as heretofore: that the court of admiralty should be appointed for that purpose by the commissioners of the excise: that the keeper of each warehouse, appointed likewise by the commissioners, should have one lock and key: that the tobacco should be delivered at the warehouse, and the tobacco should be thus secured until the merchant should find rent for it, either by exportation or home consumption: that the part designed for exportation should be weighed at the custom house, discharged of the three farthings per pound which had been paid at its first importation, and then exported without further trouble: that the portion destined for home consumption should, in presence of the warehouse keeper, be delivered to the purchaser, upon his paying the inland duty of fourpence per pound to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the interest would be eased of the inconvenience of paying the duty upon importation, or of granting bonds and finding sureties for the payment; before he had found a market for the commodity: that all penalties and forfeitures, so far as they formerly belonged to the crown, should for the future be applied to the use of the public: that appeals in cases arising in other courts relative to the excise, should be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majesty: and in the country, by the judges of assize upon the next circuit, who should hear and determine such appeals in the most summary manner, without the formality of proceedings in courts of law or equity.

§ VI. Such was the substance of the famous excise scheme, in favour of which Sir Robert Walpole moved, that the duties and subsidies on tobacco should from and after the twenty-fourth day of June cease and determine. The debate which ensued was managed and maintained by all the able speakers on both sides of the question. Sir Robert Walpole was answered by Mr. Perry, member for the city of London. Sir Paul Methuen joined in the opposition. Sir John Barnard, another representative of London, distinguished himself in the same cause. He was supported in his speech by all the other speakers, and other patriots. The scheme was espoused by Sir Philip Yorke, appointed lord chief-justice of the king's bench, and emblazoned in the course of the ensuing year. Sir Joseph Jekyll approved of the project, which was likewise strenuously defended by Lord Hervey, Sir Thomas Robinson, Sir William Yonge, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Wintonning, which last excelled all his contemporaries of the ministry in talents and address. Those who argued against the scheme were supported by all the members who had represented the frauds, and made false calculations. With respect to the supposed hardships under which the planters were said to labour, they affirmed that no planter had ever dreamed of petitioning for the excise; and from the examination of the petitions, it appeared that those planters did not exceed forty thousand pounds per annum, and might in a great measure be abolished, by a due execution of the laws in being; consequently this scheme was unnecessary, would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, destructive to the liberty of the subject, and dangerous to the liberties of the subject, as it tended to promote a general excise, which was in all countries considered as a grievous oppression. They suggested that it would produce much misfortune from the destruction of the warehouses, and the great expense of clearing the warehouse keepers, appointed and paid by the treasury, so as to multiply the dependants on the crown, and enable it still further to influence the freedom of elections; that the planters would become slaves to excisemen and warehouse keepers, as they would be debared all access to their commodities, except at certain hours, when attended by those officers: that the merchant, for every quantity of tobacco he could sell, would be obliged to make a journey, or send a messenger to the office for permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expense, and delay: and that should a law be enacted in consequence of this motion, it would in all probability be sometime or other used as a precedent for introducing other excises on other branches of the revenue; in which case the liberty of Great Britain would be no more. In the course of this debate, Sir Robert Walpole took notice of the multitudes which had besieged the house, and represented that it would be an easy task for a designing sedition person to raise a tumult and disorder among them; that gentlemen might give them what name they should think fit, and affirm they were come as humble suppliants: but he knew whom the law called sturdy beggars: and those who brought them to that place could not be certain but that they might behave in the same manner. This insurrection was resisted by Sir John Barnard, who observed that merchants of character had a right to come down to the court of requests, and lobby of the House of Commons, in order to solicit their friends and acquaintance against any scheme or project which they might think prejudicial to their commerce; that when he came into the House, he saw none but such as desired the appellation of sturdy beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himself, or any gentleman whatever. After a warm debate, the motion was carried by a majority of sixty-one voices. Several resolutions were founded on the proposal: and to these the House agreed, though not without another violent contest. The resolutions produced a bill, against which petitions were preferred by the lord mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of London, the cities of Coventry and Nottingham. A motion was made that counsel should be heard for the city of London; but it was rejected by the majority, and the petitions were ordered to be read on the table. Had the minister encountered no opposition but that which appeared within-doors, his project would have certainly been carried into execution: but the whole nation was alarmed, and clamoured loudly against the excise bill. The populace still crowded against Westminster-hall, blocking up all the avenues to the House of Commons. They even insulted the persons of those members who had voted for the ministry on that occasion, and Sir Robert Walpole began to be in fear for his life. He, therefore, thought proper to drop the design by making that the second reading of the bill might be postponed till the twelfth day of June. Then, complaint being made of the insolvency of the populace, who had maltreated several members, the resolutions were taken against those tumultuous crowds, and their abettors: these resolutions were communicated to the lord mayor of London, the sheriffs of Middlesex, and the high bench of the metropolis. The violent scenes were apprehended in the court of requests, as having fomented the disturbances; but they were soon released. The miscarriage of the bill was celebrated with public festivities in London. The effigy of Sir Robert Walpole was burned in effigy by the populace. After the miscarriage of the excise scheme, the House unanimously resolved to inquire into the frauds and abuses in the customs; and a committee of twenty-one persons was chosen by ballot for this purpose.

§ VII. The subsequent debates of this session were occasioned by a bill to prevent the infamous practice of stock-jobbing, which with great difficulty made its way to the House of Lords, where it was amended, in consequence of which it was laid again, and succeeded by another bill establishing a lottery, to raise five hundred thousand pounds for the relief of those who had suffered by the charitable corporation. After having undergone several alterations in both Houses, and obtained the royal assent, the king, by a message to parliament, had signified his intention to give the princess royal in marriage to the Prince of Orange, promising himself their concurrence and assistance, that he might be enabled to bestow such a portion with his eldest daughter as should be suitable to the occasion. The Commons immediately resolved, that out of the monies arising from the sale of lands in the island of St. Christopher, his majesty should be empowered to apply four thousand pounds, as a marriage dower for his daughter; and a clause for this purpose was inserted in the bill, for enabling his majesty to apply five hundred thousand pounds out of the sinking fund, for the service of the current year.

§ VIII. The opposition in the House of Lords was still more animated, though ineffectual. The debates chiefly turned upon the pension bill, the number of land forces, and the sinking fund, made by Lord Bathurst, in account of the produce of the forfeited estates which had belonged to the directors of the South Sea company. The trustees for these estates had charged themselves with a great sum of money, and the Lords in the opposition thought they had a right to demand a share in this sum; the ministry had reason to stifle this inquiry; and, therefore, opposed it with all their vigour. Nevertheless, the motion was carried, after a warm dispute, and the directors of the South Sea company were ordered to pay to the crown their account before the returning of the House. From this it appeared that the large sums of money arising from the forfeited estates had been distributed among the proprietors by way of dividend, even before returns had been rendered for parliament for directions in what manner that produce should be applied: Lord Bathurst, therefore, moved for a resolution of the House, that the disposal of this money by way of dividend, without any order or direction of a general court for that purpose, and a violation of the act of parliament made for the disposal thereof, and a manifest injustice done to the proprietors of that stock. The Duke of Newcastle, in order to gain time and delay, moved that as the account was confused, and almost unintelligible, the committee for the sinking fund should be ordered to lay before the House a further and more distinct account of the manner in which the money had been disposed. A violent contest ensued, in the course of which the House divided, and the Lords by forty-six, and forty-sixers were such as enjoyed preferment in the church, commissions in the army, or civil employments under the government. At length Lord Bathurst wavered his motion for that time: then the House ordered that the present and former directors of the South Sea company, together with the late inspectors of their accounts, should attend and be examined. They were accordingly interrogated, and gave so little satisfaction, that Lord Bathurst moved for a committee of inquiry; but the question being put, was carried in the negative; yet a very strong protest was entered by the Lords in the opposition. The next object of altercation was the bill for misappropriating parts of the produce of the sinking fund. It was attacked with all the force of argument, wit, and declamation, by the Earl of Strafford, Lord Bathurst and Catteret, and particularly by the Earl of Chesterfield, who had the short time resigned his seat of lord steward of the household, and renounced all connexion with the ministry. Lord Bathurst moved for a resolution, importing that, in the opinion of the House, the sinking-fund ought for the future to be applied, in time of peace and public tranquillity, to the redemption of those taxes which were most prejudicial to the trade, most burthensome on the manufactures, and most oppressive on the poor of the nation. This motion was overruled, and the bill adopted by the majority. On the seventeenth day of June, the king gave the royal assent to the bills that were prepared, and closed the session with a speech, in which he took notice of the wicked endeavours that had lately been made to inflame the minds of the people, by the most unjust misrepresentations.

§ IX. Europe was now re-involved in fresh troubles by a vacuous and wanton war, the effects of which were visible on the Rhine and in the Silesian; the French entered Warsaw in the end of January, and the neighbouring powers were immediately in commotion. The Elector of Saxony, son to the late king, and Stanislaus, whose daughter was married to the French king, declared themselves candidates to the Polish throne. The emperor announced the ca'zarna, and the King of Prussia, espoused the interest of the Saxon: the King of France supported the pretensions of his father-in-law. The foreign ministers at Warsaw forthwith began to form intrigues among the diet, Marquis de Moni, ambassador from France, exerted himself so successfully that he soon gained over the prince, and a majority of the cadiote dietes, to the interests of Stanislaus; while the imperial and Russian troops hovered on the frontiers of Poland. The French king no sooner understood that a body of the emperor's forces was encamped at Silesia, than he ordered the Duke of Berwick to assemble a force on the Rhine, and take measures to enter Germany, in case the imperialists should march into Poland. A French fleet set sail for Dantzic, while Stanislaus travelled through Germany in disguise to Poland, and the frontier was watched by the French ambassador at Warsaw. As the day of election approached, the imperial, Russian, and Prussian ministers delivered in their several declarations, by way of protest against the contingent election of Stanislaus, as a person proscribed, and a especial candidate, and invited France, the states of Silesia, those of Saxony, and the principal states of Italy, to associate themselves. The Russian general Lasczi entered Poland at the head of fifty thousand men: the diet of the election was opened with the usual solemnity, and by the choice of the representatives of the Viscovas, chief of the Saxon interest, the crown of Poland was renounced to the prince of Stolak, with three thousand men, including some of the nobility who adhered to that party. Nevertheless, the prince proceeded to the elections. Stanislaus was unanimously chosen king; and appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with loud acclamations. The opposite party soon increased to ten thousand men; protested against the election; and joined the Russian army, which advanced by speedy marches. King Stanislaus finding himself unable to cope with such adversaries, retired with the primate and French ambassador to Dantzic, leaving the Palatine of Kiow at Warsaw. This great general, in a short time, entered Warsaw, and occupied the palaces belonging to the grandees who had declared for Augustus, as well as the hotel of the Russian minister, and the Palatine of Kiow, and both houses of the Muscovites, finding it impracticable to pass the Vistula before the expiration of the time fixed for the session of the diet, erected a kelo at Cracow, where the Elector of Saxon was chosen and proclaimed, by the bishop of Cracow, King of Poland, under the name of Augustus III. on the sixth day of October. They afterwards passed the river, and the Palatine of Kiow retiring towards Cracow, they took possession of Warsaw, where in their turn they plundered the palaces and houses belonging to the opposite party.

§ X. During these transactions, the French king concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, by which those powers agreed to declare war against the emperor. Manifestos were published reciprocally by all the contracting powers. The Duke of Berwick passed the Rhine in October, and undertook the siege of Fort Kofi, which in a few days was surrendered to the Prussians. When he passed the river, and returned to Versailles. The King of Sardinia having declared war against the emperor, joined a body of French forces commanded by Mareschal de Villars, and entered into service, and gave him large forces; the imperial majesty, dreadings the effects of such a powerful confedery against him, offered to compromise all differences with the crown of Spain, under the mediation of the King of Great Britain; and Mr. Keen, the British mini-ter at Madrid, proposed an accommodation. Philip expressed his acknowledgments to the King of England, declaring however that the armament was too late; and that his own resolutions were already taken. Nevertheless, he sent orders to the Count de Montijo, his ambassador at London, to communicate to his Britannic majesty the motives which had induced him to take this resolution. At the same time he detached a powerful armament to Italy, where they invested the imperial fortress of Aula, the garrison of which was obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war. The republic of Venice, having no occasion to doubt the resolve of the powers of Europe to subdue the empire of Austria, declared war to the utmost extent with the Dutch and Spanish provinces of Italy: the States-general signed a neutrality with the French king for the Austrian Netherlands, without consulting the emperor or the King of Great Britain; and the king of England began to stir up the people in the provinces to make war. This action taxed the resources of the crown with the utmost severity; and for the recovery of its strength, Henry the fourth, the young Duchess of Marlborough, dying about this time, the title devolved to her sister's son, the Earl of Sunderland. Lord King resigning his office of chancellor, it was conferred upon Mr. Talbot, solicitor-general, together with the title of baron; a promotion that reflected honour upon those by whom it was advised. He possessed the spirit of a Roman senator, the elegance of an Atticus, and the manner of a statesman. In the last week of January, the king told them, in his speech, that though he was no way engaged in the war which had begun to rage in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the neutrals; and that he was convinced of the present events, or be unconcerned for the consequences of a war undertaken and supported by such a powerful alliance. He said, he had thought proper to take this occasion of examining them in reference to the want of the council's of those powers that were more immediately interested in the consequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, much more particularly with the Senate of the United Provinces, such measures as should be thought most advisable for their common safety, and for restoring the peace of Europe. In the meantime, he expressed his hope that they would make such provisions as should ensure his kingdom, rights, and possessions from all danger and insults, and maintain the respect due to the British nation. He said, that whatever part it might in the end be most reasonable for him to act, it would in all respects be for the advantage of the kingdom, if they put his kingdom in a posture of defence. The motion for an address of thanks produced, as usual, a debate in both Houses, which, it must be owned, appears to have been conducted with decorum, discretion, and temper, rather than from any reasonable cause of objection.

§ XI. The House of Commons resolved to address his majesty for a copy of the treaty of Vienna. Sir John Holwell moved for another, desiring that the letters and instructions relating to the execution of the treaty of Seville, should be submitted to the inspection of the Commons; but, after a hard struggle, it was overruled. The next motion was made by Mr. Sandys, a gentleman who had for some time appeared strenuous in the opposition, and wrangled with great perseverance. He proposed that the House should examine the instructions which had been given to the British minister in Poland, some years before the death of the last Duke of Ancaster, that they might be the better able to judge of the causes which produced this new rupture among the powers of Europe. The motion being opposed by all the court members, a contest ensued, in which Mr. Pulteney compared the ministry to an empire, and the constitution of England to his patient. "This pretender in physic (said he) being consulted, tells the distempered person, there were been bad symptoms. When Mr. Pulteney asked him if he was afraid that none of them would succeed. A vomit might throw them into convulsions that would occasion immediate death; a purge might bring on a diarrhea that would carry him off in a short time; and he had been already bled so much, and so often, that he could bear it no longer. The unfortunate patient, shocked at this declaration, replies, Sir, you have always pretended to be a regular doctor, but now I find you are an arrant quack. I had an excellent constitution when I first fell into your hands, but you have quite destroyed it; and now I find I have no other chance for saving my life, but by calling for the help of some regular physician." In the debate, the members on both sides seemed to wander from the question, and indulge themselves with ludicrous personalities. Mr. H. Walpole took occasion to say, that the opposition treated the ministry as he himself was to treat the British nation; "If I am in plain clothes, (said he,) then they call me a slovenly, dirty fellow; and if by chance I wear a laced suit, they cry, What, shall such an awkward fellow wear fine clothes? He continued to sport in this habit of men to the merriment of the house. He compared the present administration to a ship at sea. As long as the wind was fair, and proper for carrying us to our destined port, the word was, "Steady! steady!" but when the wind began to shift and change, the word was necessarily altered to, "Thus, thus, and no nearer." The motion was overpowered by the majority; and this was the fate of several other proposals made by the members in the opposition. Sir John Hammond presented a petition from the druggists, and other dealers in tea, complaining of the insults and oppression to which they were subjected by the excise laws, and impairing relief. Sir John and Mr. Perry, another on the thirty men of the garrison, which those traders sustained, and moved that the petition might be referred to the consideration of the whole House. They were opposed by Mr. Wintington, Sir W. Yonge, and other partisans of the ministry; but the engagement of the two parties, in which every weapon of satire, argument, reason, and truth, was wielded against that odious, arbitrary, and oppressive method of collecting the public revenue, was not without effect. Nevertheless, the motion in favour of the sufferers was rejected.

§ XIII. When the Commons deliberated upon the supply, Mr. Andrews, deputy-paymaster of the army, moved for an addition of two millions for the support of land forces which had been continued since the preceding year. The members in the opposition disputed this small augmentation with too much heat and eagerness. It must be acknowledged, that they were by this time turned into such personal animosity against the minister, that they resolved to oppose all his measures, whether they might or might not be necessary for the safety and advantage of the kingdom. Nor indeed were they altogether blameless for acting on this occasion. They drew up their protests from the confidence and councils of their sovereign, a man whose conduct they thought prejudicial to the interest and liberties of their country. They could not, however, prevent the augmentation being passed; but it is clear, that it could not wholly stop the career of the ministry, to throw in such a number of rubs as should at least retard their progress. The Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham had been de-prived of the regiments they commanded, because they refused to concur in every project of the administration. It was in consequence of their submission, that Lord Morpeth moved for a bill to prevent any commission officer, not above the rank of a colonel, from being removed, unless by a court-martial, or by address of either House of parliament. Such an attack on the prerogative might have succeeded in the latter part of the reign of the first Charles; but at this juncture of time, it carried; yet it was moved with great vigour and address. When the proposal was set aside by the majority, Mr. Sandys moved for an address to the king, desiring to know who advised his majesty to remove the Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham from their respectively commands. He was seconded by Mr. Pulteney and Sir William Wyndham: but the ministry foreseeing another tedious dispute, called for the question, and the motion was carried by the next vote. The next motion was a bill for securing the freedom of parliament, by limiting the number of officers in the House of Commons. It was read a first and second time: but when a motion was made for its being committed, it met with a powerful opposition, and produced a warm debate that issued in a question, which, like the former, passed in the negative. A clergyman having insinuated in conversation that the minister himself, having for forty years received a pension from the ministry, the House took cognizance of this report: the clergyman acknowledged at the bar that he ought have dropped such a hint from hearsay. These and many of the prevarications to which the Honour, that he never did, or ever would, receive place, pension, gratuity, or reward from the court, either directly or indirectly, for voting in parliament, or upon any other account whatever. The accusers false and malicious, and the accused taken into custody: but in a few days he was discharged upon his humble petition, and his begging pardon of the member whom he had calumniated. The duty upon salt was prolonged for eight years; and a bill passed for stock-jobbing.

§ XIV. But the subject which of all others employed the eloquence and abilities on both sides to the most vigorous exertion, was a motion made by Mr. Bromley, who proposed that a bill should be brought in to repealing the septennial act, and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments. The arguments for and against septennial parliaments have already been stated. The ministry now insisted upon the increase of papists and Jacobites, which rendered it dangerous to weaken the hands of the government: they challenged the opposition to produce one instance in which the least encroachment had been made on the liberties of the people since the septimeenial act, and they declared it was the most injurious malice to prove that his present majesty had ever endeavour to extend any branch of the prerogative beyond its legal bounds. Sir John Hinde Cotton affirmed, that in many parts of England the papists had already begun to use all their influence in favour of those candidates who were recommended by the ministers as members in the ensuing parliament. With respect to his majesty's conduct, he said he would not answer one word: but as to the grievances introduced since the law was enacted for septennial parliaments, he thought himself more at liberty to declare his sentiments. He asserted, that the septennial law itself was an infringement on the rights of the people; a law passed by a parliament that made itself septennial. He observed, that the laws of treason with regard to trials were altered since that period; that in former times a man was tried by a jury of his neighbours, within the county where the crimes alleged against him were said to be committed; but by an act of a septennial parliament he might be removed and tried in any place where the crown, or rather the ministry, could find a jury prepared. He observed, when the minister attempted to bring any witness in his justification, without an expense which perhaps his circumstances would not bear. He asked, if the riot act was not an encroachment on the rights of the people? An act by which the peace, the meanest and vilest tool a minister can use, who perhaps subsists by his being in the commission, and may be deprived of that subsistence at the pleasure of his patron, had it in his power to put twenty or thirty of the best subjects in England to immediate death, without any trial or form but that of reading a proclamation.

Was not the fatal South Sea scheme (said he) established by the act of a septennial parliament? And can any man ask, whether that law was attended with any convenience? To the glorious catalogue I might have added the late excise bill, if it had passed into a law: but, thank Heaven, the septennial parliament was near expiring before that famous measure was introduced.

§ XV. Sir William Wyndham concluded an excellent speech, that spoke him the unrivalled orator, the uncorrected Briton, and the unshaken patriot, in words to this effect: Let us suppose a man abandoned to all notions of virtue and honour, no great family, and with a great fortune, raised to be chief minister of state, by the concurrence of many whimsical events: afraid, or unwilling, to trust any but creatures of his own making; lost to all sense of shame and reputation, possessed of his country's interest, true interest; pursuing no aim but that of aggrandizing himself and his favourites: in foreign affairs trusting none but those, who from the nature of their education, cannot possibly be qualified for the service of their country, or give weight and credit to their negotiations. Let us suppose the true interest of the nation, by such means, neglected. The country, to the prejudice of the public, rising in importance lost, her trade insulted, her merchants plundered, and her sailors murdered: and all these circumstances overlooked, lest his administration should be chargeable, in the next session of parliament, with the plunder of the nation, with a parliament chiefly composed of members whose seats are purchased, and whose votes are bought at the expense of the public; is not the party who would be made to inquire into his conduct, or to relieve the nation from the distress which has been entailed upon it by his administration. Suppose him screened by a corrupt majority of his creatures, whom he retains in daily pay, or favours in his particular interest by distributing among them those posts and places which ought never to be bestowed upon any but for the good of the public. Let him plume himself upon his scandalous victory, because he has obtained a parliament like a packed jury, ready to acquit him at all adventures. Let us suppose him domineering with insolence over all the men of ancient families, over all the men of sense, figure, or fortune in the nation; as he has no virtue of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavouring to destroy or corrupt it in all. With such a minister, and such a parliament, let us suppose a case which I hope will never happen: a prince upon the throne, unformed, ignorant, and unacquainted with the independency of nations and states, transported with unbounded ambition, and possessed with instable avarice. I hope such a case will never occur; but as it possibly may, could any greater curse happen to a nation, than such a prince on the throne, advised, protected, and solely advised, by such a minister, and that minister supported by such a parliament. The nature of mankind cannot be altered by human laws: the existence of such a prince or such a minister cannot be prevented by the laws of parliament; but the existence of such a parliament I think we may prevent: as it is much more likely to exist, and may do more mischief while the septennial law remains in force, than such an event could happen, or be to the nation's injury for its being repealed. Notwithstanding the most warm, the most nervous, the most pathetic remonstrances in favour of the motion, the question was put, and it was suppressed by mere dint of number.

§ XVI. The triumph of the ministry was still more complete in the success of a message delivered from the crown in the latter end of the session, when a great many members of the other party had made their retirement: Sir Robert Walpole delivered this commission to the House, importing that his majesty might be enabled to augment his forces, if occasion should require such an augmentation; the times were stormy, and the election of another. Such an important point, that was said to strike at the foundation of our liberties, was not tamely yielded; but, on the contrary, contested with uncommon ardour. The motion for taking the message into consideration was carried in the affirmative; and an address presented to the king, signifying their compliance with his desire. In consequence of a subsequent message, they prepared and passed a bill, enabling his majesty to settle an army of five thousand men in the service of the princess royal, as a mark of his parental favour and affection. solder lost his commission. Such a great majority of the Scottish representatives had always voted for the ministry, since the accession of the late king, and so many of these enjoyed places and pensions to which they were entitled, that several attempts were made by the Lords in the opposition to prevent the future the ministerial influence from extending itself to the elections of North Britain.
Accordingly, a committee was appointed to write to the Earl of Marchmont and the Duke of Bedford; and sustained by the Earls of Chesterfield, Wintlesfield, and Stair, Lords Willoughby de Broke, Bathurst, and Carteret.
The whole body of the peers met in council, and Argyle, the Earl of Cholmodley, Earl Paulet, Lord Hervey, now called up by writ to the House of Peers, and Lord Talbot. The question being put on both, they were of course defeated; and the Earl of Stair was deprived of his command of the fleet, after having performed the most signal services to the royal family, and exhausted his fortune in supporting the interest and dignity of the crown.
Strenuous protests were entered against the decision of the majority concerning the king's message, demanding a power to augment his forces during the recess of parliament; as also against a bill for enabling his majesty to apply the sum of one million two hundred thousand pounds towards the expenses of the war that began about the year. The business of the session being despatched, the king repaired to the House of Lords on the sixteenth day of April, and having-passed all the bills that were ready for his royal assent, took leave of this parliament, with the warmest acknowledgments for the support given to his reign.

It was at first prorogued, then dissolved, and another convened by the same proclamation. On the fourteenth day of March, the news of the Prince of Orange and the prince royal's landing on the Dutch coast came to Europe.
And the same day, King William and Saxon auxiliaries, invested the city of Dantzic, in hopes of securing the possession of King Stanislaus. The town was strong, the garrison numerous, and, animated by the examples of the French and Spaniards, men a very которомish and fearless.
For some time they were supplied by sea with recruits, arms, and ammunition.
On the eleventh day of May a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men was landed from two French ships of war and some transports, under Rear Admiral, which acted with great magnificence; and this match was attended with addresses of congratula-tion to his majesty from different parts of the kingdom.

with a concert and diligence, which was amply demonstrated through the whole strength of the empire; and were garrisoned in different parts of Italy.

fifteenth of February, he forced the river Seccaia, and surprised the quarters of Marschal de Brocho, who escaped with great difficulty. The French, struck with that precipitancy, that they left all their baggage behind, and above two thousand were taken prisoners. They posted themselves under Guastalla, where, on the morrow of the month, they were vigorously attacked by the imperialists, and a general engagement ensued. Königsegg made several desperate efforts to break the French cavalry, upon which, however, he could make no impression. The infantry on both sides fought with extraordinary ardour, for six hours, and the field was covered with carriages. At length, the imperial general retreated to Lazzara, after having lost above five thousand men, including the Prince of Wurttemberg, the Generals Valperez and Colmenero, with many other officers of distinction: nor was the damage sustained by the French greatly inferior to that of the Germans, who repulsed the Po, and took post on the banks of the Oglio. The allies crossed the same river, and the Marquis de Mailbois was sent with a detachment to attack Mirandola, but the imperialists marching to the relief of the place, compelled him to abandon the enterprise; then he rejoined his army, which retired under the walls of Cremona, to wait for succours, which were not yet arrived. So little did the French court pay to the British nation at this juncture, that in the month of November, an edict was published at Paris, commanding all the British subjects in France, who were not engaged in the army, to leave the country and go to Flanders, or to quit the kingdom in fifteen days, or enlist in some of the Irish regiments, on pain of being treated as vagabonds, and sent to the galleys. This edict was executed with the utmost rigour. The prizes of France were crowded with the subjects of Great Britain, who were surprised and cut off from all communication with their friends, and must have perished by cold and hunger, had not they been relieved by the active charity of the Jansenists. The Earl of Winterton, who then resided at Paris, as ambassador from the King of Great Britain, made such vigorous remonstrances to the French ministry upon this unheard-of outrage against a nation with which they had been so long in alliance, that they thought proper to set the prisoners at liberty, and publish another edict, by which the meaning of the former was explained away.

§ XXI. While these transactions occurred on the continent, the King of Great Britain augmented his land-forces, and warm contests were maintained throughout the whole united kingdom in electing representatives for the new parliament. But in all these struggles the ministerial power predominated; and the new members appeared with the character of the ministry. The two Houses assembled on the fourteenth day of January, and Mr. Onslow was re-elected speaker. The leaders of both parties in all debates were the self-same persons who had conducted those of the preceding year; and the same contending parties were pursued in the same manner. The king, in his speech at the opening of the session, gave them to understand, that he had concerted with the States-general of the United Provinces such measures as were thought most advisable for their common safety, and for restoring the peace of Europe; that they had considered on one side the pressing applications made by the imperial court both in England and Holland for obtaining succours against the powers at war with the house of Austria; and, on the other side, the repeated professions made by the allies of their sincere disposition to put an end to the present troubles upon honourable and solid terms; that he and the States-general had concurred in a resolution to employ their joint and earnest instances to bring matters to a speedy and happy accommodation; that their good offices were at length accepted; and in a short time a plan would be offered to the consideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a basis for a general negotiation for peace. They had told them, and had used the power vested in him by the last parliament with great moderation; and concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark of great importance in the present conjuncture. It was observed, that whilst several powers of Europe were actually engaged in a war, Great Britain must be more or less affected with the consequences; and as the best concerted measures are liable to uncertainty, the nation ought to be prepared against all events. He, therefore, expressed his hope, that his good subjects would be enabled to enjoy all the blessings of peace and universal tranquillity, or of putting him in a condition to act that part which it might be necessary and incumbent upon him to take. The debate having its free course, the question ended with an acquiescence in the motion. The House, in a grand committee on the supply, resolved, that thirty thousand scudi should be employed for the service of the ensuing year; and that the land forces should be augmented to the number of two thousand five hundred and forty-four effective men. But these resolutions were not taken without dispute and division. The minister's opponents not only reproached all the reasons which had been formerly advanced against a standing army, but they opposed this augmentation with extraordinary ardour, as a huge stride towards the establishment of arbitrary power. They refuted those fears of external broils on which the ministry pretended to ground the necessity of such an augmentation; and they exposed the weak conduct of the administration in having contributed to destroy the balance of power, by assisting Spain against the emperor in Italy, so as to aggravate the house of Bourbon. § XXII. The minister did not estimate the navy for the ensuing year might be referred to a select committee. He expressed his surprise, that notwithstanding the vast sums which had been yearly expended in that branch of the service, and which had not been quite delivered of any one tax incurred in the preceding war. He said, he could not comprehend how it was possible to find pretences for exposing the nation to such exorbitant charges; and he took notice of some inconceivable articles in the account of the navy-debt that lay upon the table. He was seconded by Mr. Sundys, and supported by Sir Joseph Jekyll and Mr. Pulteney: but after some debate, the motion was carried in the negative. In the address relating to Denmark, a representation of that of a grand committee, Mr. W. Walpole moved, that the sum of fifty-six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds should be granted to his majesty, as a subsidy to the Danes, pursuant to the said treaty, for the service of the ensuing year. The demand did not meet with immediate compliance. All the leaders in the opposition exclaimed against the subsidy as unnecessary and unreasonable. They observed, that as the English had no particular interest of their own for inducing them to engage in the present war, but only the danger to which the balance of power might be exposed by that event; and as all the powers of Europe were as much, if not more, interested than the English, in seeing the existence of a mixed monarchism, the French being the most likely to be really endangered, they would certainly engage in its defence, without receiving any valuable consideration from Great Britain; but should the English be always the first to act, they might take the measure of premiums to all the princes in Europe, the whole charge of preserving that balance would fall upon Great Britain: every state would expect a gratification from her, for doing that which it would otherwise be obliged to do for its own preservation; even the Dutch might at last refuse to assist in trimming this balance, unless Britain should submit to make the grand pensionary of Holland a pensionary of England, and take a number of their forces into English pay. The debate having had its free course, the question was put, and the motion approved by the majority. The ministry allowed a bill to be brought in for limiting the number of officers in the House of Commons: but at the second reading it was rejected upon a division, after a learned debate, in which it appeared that the opposition had gained a valuable auxiliary in the person of Lord Polwarth, son to the Earl of Marchmont, a nobleman of elegant parts, keen penetration, and uncommon purity, who argued with all the fluency and fervour of eloquence.

§ XXIV. The minority in the House of Lords were less vigilant and resolute in detecting and opposing every measure which they thought would redound to the prejudice or interest of their country. It might be observed, that the attention that employed their attention during this session was a very extraordinary petition, subscribed by the Dukes of Hamilton, Queensberry, and Montrose, the Earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair, representing that undue influence had been used for carrying on the election of the sixteen peers for Scotland. The Duke of Bedford, who delivered their petition to the House, proposed a day for taking it into consideration; and to the next day it was afterwards moved, that the consideration of it should be adjourned to a short day, before which the petitioners should be ordered to declare whether they intended to contest the scotch peers' seats in the House, or to incite others of any, and which of them. This affair was of such an unprecedented nature, that the House seemed to be divided in opinion about the manner in which they ought to proceed. The parliam. of the ministry was not carried against the sitting of the sitting; but the petitioners were so strenuously supported in their claim to some notice, by the Earls of Chesterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, the Lords Bathurst and Carteret, that they could not dismiss it at once with any regard to decorum. The order of the House, according to the motion explained above, being communicated by the lord chancellor to the petitioner, they waited on him with a declaration, importing that they did not intend to interfere with the election or return of the sixteen peers for Scotland; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordships the evidence of such facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous and pernicious, and that the elections equally affect the right of the present sixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not prevented by a proper remedy. This declaration being repeated to the House, the Duke of Devonshire made a motion, that the petitioners might be ordered to lay their petition before the House; to instances of such undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and the names of the persons they suspected to be culpable. He was warmly opposed by the country party; and a long debate ensued; after which the question was carried in favour of the motion, and the order signified to the petitioners. Next day their answer was read to the House to this effect: That as they had been commanded to lay their petition before the House, they confessed they could not take upon them to name particular persons who might have been concerned in those illegal practices; but who they would undoubtedly appear to their lordships upon a proper examination: nevertheless, they.did humbly acquaint their lordships, that the petition was laid before them upon information, that the list of the sixteen peers of Scotland had been framed previous to the election, by persons in high trust under the crown; that the election being about, they had in a list approved by the electors, and was called the king's list, from which there was to be no variation, unless to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition they should concur to confirm: that particular persons had solicited a majority, of making any alteration: that endeavours were used to engage peers to vote for this list by promise of pensions, and offices civil and military to themselves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that sums were given for this purpose: that pensions, offices, and releases of debts owing to the crown, were actually granted to peers who concurred in voting for this list, and to their relations: that on the day of election a battalion of his majesty's troops were drawn up in the Abbey-court of Edinburgh, contrary to custom, and without any apparent cause but that of overawing the electors. This answer gave rise to another violent dispute; but the majority voted it unsatisfactory, and the petition was rejected. The question was, however, the resolution was cloaked with a vigorous protest.

A.D. 1739. § XXV. Notwithstanding this discouragement, the Earl of Abingdon moved, that although the petition was dismissed, an inquiry might be set on foot touching an affair of such consequence to the liberties of the kingdom. The Earl of Huy declaring his belief that no such illegal methods had been practised, the other side was finally pressed, and at last a large number of noble lords, entered by them at the last election of peers for Scotland. Exceptions being taken to a pamphlet, as an object unworthy of their notice, Lord Bathurst exhibited an authentic copy of those protests, extracted from the courts of Hanover, by the king, Sir John Greville, principal clerk, and witnessed by two gentlemen then attending in the lobby. These were accordingly read, and plainly demonstrated the truth of the allegations contained in the petition. Nothing could be more scandalous, arrogant, and shamefully flagrant than the conduct and deportment of those who acted the part of underdrappers to the ministry on this occasion. But all this demonstration, adored and enforced by the charms and energy of eloquence, was like preaching in a desert. A motion was made for adjourning, and carried in the affirmative: a protest was entered on which affair was contested in olition. Divers other motions were made successively by the lords in the opposition, and rejected by the invincible power of a majority. The uninterrupted success of the ministry did not, however, prevent them struggling as often as an opportunity offered. They disputed the continuation of the salt tax, and the bill for enabling the king to apply the sum of one million out of the sinking fund for the service of the current year, though success did not attend their endeavours. They supported with all their might a bill sent up from the Commons, explaining and amending an act of the Scotch parliament, for preventing wrong imprisonment, and against undue delays in trials. This was all the natures of Scotland had in lieu of the habes corpus act; thought it did not screen them from oppression. Yet the Earl of Huy undertook to prove they were on a footing with their neighbours of England, and the bill was carried by the House of Lords, after division. The session was closed on the fifteenth of May, when the king in his speech to both Houses declared, that the plan of pacification concertd between him and the States-general by the Dutch was produced by the Earl of Bathurst. He thanked the Commons for the supplies they had granted, with such cheerfulness and dispatch. He signified his intention to visit his German dominions; and told them he should constitute the queen regent of the realm in his absence. Immediately after the prorogation his majesty embarked for Holland, in his way to Hanover. § XXVI. By this time the good understanding between the courts of Madrid and Lisbon was restored by a remarkable incident. The Portuguese ambassador in London having allowed his servants to receive a criminal from the officers of justice, all the servants concerned in that rescue were dragged from his house to prison by the Spanish king's order, with circumstances of vigour and severity. The Portuguese majesty being informed of this outrage, ordered reprisals to be made upon the servants of the Spanish ambassador at Lisbon. The two ministers withdrew abruptly to their respective courts. The two monarchs were eluded to the treaty, by the substitution of Spain assimilated a body of troops on the frontiers of Portugal; and his Portuguese majesty had recourse to the assistance of King George. Don Marcos Antonio d'Albizeda was despatched to London to treat the liberties of the envoy extraordinary; and succeeded in his commission according to his wish. In a little time after the king's departure from England, Sir John Noris sailed from Spithed with a powerful squadron, in order to protect the Portuguese against the Spaniards; and on the ninth day of June arrived at Lisbon, where he was welcomed as a deliverer. Mr. Keene, the British envoy at the court of Spain, had communicated to his catholic majesty the resolution of his master to send a powerful squadron to Lisbon, with orders to guard that coast from insults, and secure the Brazil fleet, in which the merchants of Great Britain were deeply interested. Don Joseph Patiuho, minister of his catholic majesty's pleasure, represented that such an expedition would affect the commerce of Spain, by intimidating foreign merchants from embarking their merchandise in the fleet. But, in all probability, it prevented a rupture between the two crowns, and disposed the King of Spain to listen to terms of amicability. § XXVI. The powers in alliance against the House of Austria, having been signed by the king of France and the king of England, were ratified and confirmed by the King of Great Britain and the States-general, Mr. Walpole, ambassador at the Hague, presented a memorial to their high mightinesses, desiring they would, without loss of time, put themselves in a posture of defence by an augmentation of their forces at sea and land. To which he might take such vigorous steps in concert with Great Britain, as the future conjuncture of affairs might require.
But before they would subject themselves to such expense, they resolved to make further trial of their influence with the powers in alliance against the emperor; and conferences were renewed with the ministers of those allies. The affairs of Poland became more and more unfavourable to the interest of Stanislaus; for though a great number of the Polish nobility engaged in a confederacy to support his claim, and made repeated efforts in his behalf, the Palatine of Kow submitted to Augustus; and even his brother the prince of Lorraine submitted a long imprisonment, and many extraordinary hardships, was obliged to acknowledge that prince his sovereign. In Italy the arms of the allies still continued to prosper. Don Carlos had again reduced the Tuscan, without opposition; while the imperialists were forced to abandon all the territories they possessed in Italy, except the Mantuœ. The emperor being equally unable to cope with the French armies on the Rhine, implored sucours of the Garman, who sent thirty thousand men to his assistance. This vigorous interposition, and the success of Augustus in Poland, disposed the court of Versailles to a pacification. A secret negotiation was begun between France and the House of Austria; and the preliminaries were signed without the concurrence or knowledge of Spain, Sardinia, and the maritime powers. In these articles it was stipulated, that France should restore all the ceded territories in Germany; that the inheritance of the dukedom of Tuscany should be vested in the Duke of Lorraine; that Lorraine should be allotted to King Stanislaus; and after his death be united to the crown of France; that the Savoy should receive the Neuchâtel, the Savoia, and Parmœ; that the King of Sardinia should enjoy Vignovo and Novara; so that Don Carlos should be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily, and retain the island of Elba, with all the Spanish territories on the coast of Tuscany; and that France should guarantee the pacific sanction.

§ XXVII. The King of Great Britain returned from Hanover to England in the month of November; and on the fifteenth day of January opened the session of parliament. On this occasion he congratulated them on the near prospect of a general peace in Europe, in consequence of the preliminary articles in which the emperor and the King of France had agreed; and of which he had expressed his approbation, as they did not differ in any essential point from the plan of pacification which he and the States-general had offered to the belligerent powers. He told them that he had already ordered a considerable reduction to be made in his forces both by sea and land; but at the same time observed it would be necessary to continue some extraordinary expense, until a more perfect reconciliation should be concluded among the several powers of Europe. An address of thanks was accordingly presented, and graciously received. After the House had received several petitions from different counties and gentlemen, complaining of undue influence in elections for members of parliament, it proceeded to consider of the supply, and Sir Charles Wager moving that fifteen thousand seamen should be employed for the service of the ensuing year, the proposal was approved without opposition. But this was not the case with a motion made by Mr. Pulteney, "That the ordinary estimate of the navy should be referred to a select committee." The ministry discouraged all such prying measures: a debate was produced, the House divided, and the question was negatived. There was the first motion for raising the supplies within the year, made by Mr. Sands, and supported by Sir John Barnard, Mr. Willmot, and other patriots, who demonstrated, that this was the only method of ascertaining the expense for discharging the national debt, lowering the interest of money, reducing the price of labour, and encouraging a spirit of commerce.

§ XXIX. The bill for limiting the number of officers in the House of Commons was again revived. The king was engaged to consider it; but the House, by a vote of sixty-nine to forty, threw out the bill, which had been introduced by the committee appointed for that purpose, that those spirits were pernicious to the health and morals of the people. To this resolution was added another, which amounted to a total prohibition, namely, that fifty pounds should be yearly paid to his majesty for a licence to be annually taken out by every person who should vend, barter, or utter any such spirituous liquors. Mr. Walter had the care of the business, and moved the report of some clauses in the test act: these he represented as a species of persecution, in which protestant dissenters were confounded with the Roman catholics and enemies to the establishment. He was supported by Lord Polworth and Mr. Heathcote; but Sir Robert Walpole was joined by Mr. Shippen against the motion as dangerous to the established church: and the question being put, it was carried without division in the House, and was laid before the Lords. A bill founded on the resolutions they had taken against spirituous liquors, Sir Robert Walpole acquainted them, by his majesty's command, that as the alterations proposed to be made by that bill in the duties charged upon all spirituous liquors might, in a great degree, affect some part of the civil-list revenues, his majesty, for the sake of redeeming so great an evil as was intended by that bill to be prevented, did humbly consent to accept any other revenue of equal value, to be settled and appropriated in lieu of his interest in the said duties. The bill was read a second time, and consigned to a committee of the whole House; but that for limiting the trade in distilleries, and throwing the duties upon them, was thrown out at the second reading. Petitions against the bill touching the retail of spirituous liquors, were presented by the traders to the British sugar colonies, by the merchants of Tuscany, by the distillers of Tuscany, by the press, and by many other petitions, to which they would be exposed by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and spirits distilled from molasses. In consequence of these remonstrances, a mitigating clause was inserted in favour of the consumers. But the whole scheme of the bill, respecting the duties on spirituous liquors, was not thrown out. After a tedious debate, and several alterations proposed in the bill, which, after long and repeated debates surmounted all opposition, and was sent to the Lords.

§ XXX. In the month of February the king had sent two members of the privy council to the Prince of Wales, with a message, proposing a marriage between his royal highness and the Princess of Saxegotha. The proposal being agreeable to the prince, the marriage was celebrated on the twenty-seventh day of April. Upon this occasion Mr. Pulteney moved for an address of congratulation to his majesty, and was supported by Mr. George Lyttleton and Mr. William Pitt, who seized this opportunity of proposing the union of the two kingdoms, and making the Prince of Wales the amiable consort. These two young men soon distinguished themselves in the House by their eloquence and superior talents. The attention of the House was afterwards called to the bill for excluding .dissenters from the benefit of the civil-list; and Mr. Fox explained the act for the more effectual preventing bribery and corruption in the election of members to serve in parliament. Both made their way through the lower House, and were carried up to the Lords. The number of land forces voted for the service of the current year was reduced to seventeen thousand seven hundred and four effective men. The supplies were raised by the malt tax and land tax at two shillings and six pence per hogshead; the excise had support; the committee appointed for that purpose, that those spirits were pernicious to the health and morals of the thousand pounds from the sinking fund. In this session the parliament repealed the old statutes of England and Scotland against conjuration, witchcraft, and dealing with evil spirits. The Commons likewise prepared a bill to restrain the disposition of lands in mortmain, whereby they became unalienable. Against this measure petitions were presented by the two universities, the colleges of Edinburgh and St. Andrew's, in their turn, and remonstrances that subsisted by charitable donations. In favour of the universities and colleges a particular exempting clause was inserted. Several other amendments were made in the bill. The Commons, however, persist in their course, and it passed to the royal assent. Among the acts passed in this session, was one for naturalizing her royal highness the Princess of Wales; and another for building a bridge across the Thames from New Palace-yard, in the city of Westminster, to the opposite shore in the county of Surrey. The points chiefly debated in the House of Lords, were the address of thanks for his majesty's speech, the mortmain bill, the quakers' bill, which was thrown out, and that for the prevention of smuggling, which did not pass without division and protest. On the twentieth day of May the king closed the session with a speech, in which he told both Houses, that a further convention, touching the execution of all demands, and the establishment of peace, had been made and communicated to him by the emperor and most christian king: and that negotiations were carrying on by the several powers engaged in the late war, in order to settle a general pacification, on the foundation of the same principles, and the same guarantees of the rights of nations, that had been used and subscribed to in the treaty of London. He observed, that the seed of dissatisfaction sowed among some people: he protested it was his desire, and should be his care, to preserve the present constitution in church and state, as by law established: he recommended harmony and mutual affection among all nations: and concluded his speech with the assurance, that the act of the day was the act of the nation, and he believed the nation would still adhere to its own decisions.

§ XXXI. Such a degree of licentiousness prevailed over the whole nation, that the kingdom was filled with tumults, and riots; the eight counties were paraded by proper regulations of the civil government in the due execution of the laws. The most remarkable of these disturbances happened at Edinburgh, on the seventh day of September. John Porteous, who commanded the guard paid by that city, a man of brutal disposition and abandoned morals, had, at the execution of a smuggler, been provoked by some insults from the populace to order his men to fire without using the lawful form of addressing the crowd: by which premature order several innocent persons lost their lives. Porteous was tried for murder, convicted, and received sentence of death: but the queen, as guardian of the realm, thought proper to commute it to剥夺ism, and the public indignation of the people of Edinburgh resented this lenity shown to a criminal, who was the object of their detestation. They remembered that pardons had been granted to divers military delinquents in that country, who had been condemned by legal trial. They seemed to think those were encouragements to oppression; they were fired by a national jealousy; they were stimulated by the relations and friends of those who had been murdered; and they were resolved to wreak their vengeance on the author of that tragedy, by depriving him of life on the very day which the judges had fixed for his execution. This determined they assembled in the streets of the night. They blocked up the gates of the city, to prevent the advancement of the troops that were quartered in the suburbs. They surprised and disarmed the town guard; they broke open the prison doors; dragged Porteous from thence to the place of execution; and, leaving him hanging by the neck on a dyer's pole, quietly dispersed to their several habitations. This exploit was performed with such conduct and deliberation as seemed to be the result of a plan formed in the society of the night; it, therefore, became the object of a very severe inquiry.

§ XXXII. During this summer a rupture happened between the Turks and the Russians, which last reduced the city of Asoph on the Black sea, and overran the great east part of Crim Tartary. The czarina declared war against the Ottoman Porte, because her Tartars of the Crimea had made incursions upon her frontiers; and when she complained of these disorders to the vizir, she received no satisfaction; besides, a large body of Tartars had, by order of that minister, marched through the Russian provinces in desecration of the empress, and committed terrible ravages. The emperor was obliged to engage as a party in this war, by a treaty offensive and defensive, which he had many years before concluded with the czarina. Yet, before he declared himself, he joined the maritime powers in a declaration to that effect. His declaration was very well disposed to peace; but the czarina insisted upon her returning Asoph, which her forces had reduced; and this preliminary article being rejected, as dishonourable to the Ottoman empire, the court of Vienna began to make preparations for war. By this time all the belligerent powers in Italy had agreed to the preliminaries of peace concluded between the emperor and France. The Duke of Lorraine had espoused the emperor's eldest daughter, the Archduchess Maria Theresa, and ceded Lorraine to France, even before he succeeded to Tuscany. Don Carlos was crowned King of Sicily; Stanislaus abdicated the crown of Poland; and Augustus was universally acknowledged to be the.legitimate sovereign of that kingdom. The preliminaries were approved and accepted by the diet of the empire; the King of Spain sent orders for his troops to evacuate Tuscany; and the provinces in Italy yielded to the house of Austria. The emperor had marched these troops from his dominions on this occasion, did not live to see the happy fruits of his negotiation. He died at Vienna in April, at the age of seventy-three, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero and consummate politician. He was not long survived by Count Schwarzenberg, the man whom he had chosen as his successor, and who ranked next to the prince in military reputation. About the same time Great Britain sustained a national loss in the death of Lord Chancellor Talbot, who, by his worth, popularity, and the misconduct of the general, who dignified the great office to which he had been raised. He died universally lamented, in the month of February, at the age of fifty-two, and was succeeded on the bench by Lord Hardwicke.

§ XXXIII. The king being indisposed, in consequence of having been fatigued by a very tempestuous passage from Holland, the parliament was prorogued from the twenty-first day of January, to the first of February, and then the session was opened by commission. The lord chancellor, as one of the peers authorized by this commission, made a speech in his majesty's name to both Houses. With respect to foreign affairs, he told them, that the respective acts of Congress, and the treaty for the evacuation and possession of the several countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and disposition of the preliminary articles, the most important work of the generals, had been carried so far advanced, that, however, common prudence called upon them to be very attentive to the final conclusion of the new settlement. He said, his majesty could not without surprise and concern observe the many contrivances and attempts carried on, in various shapes and in different parts of the nation, tumultuously to resist and obstruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom. He observed, that the consideration of the height to which these audacious practices might rise, if not timely suppressed, afforded a melancholy prospect, and required particular attention, lest they should affect private property in the same manner as public property, as well as the general peace and good order of the whole. After the Commons had agreed to an address, and heard counsel on some controverted elections, they proceeded to take the supply into consideration. They voted ten thousand men for the sea-service. This continued for the land-service the same number they had maintained in times of tranquility, amounting to seventeen thousand seven hundred and four; but this measure was not adopted without opposition; the money voted by the land-service was in-forevered with one million granted out of the sinking fund.

§ XXXIV. The chief subject of contention that presented itself in the course of this session, was a motion which Mr. Pulteney made for an address to his majesty, that he would be pleased to settle one hundred thousand pounds a-year upon the Prince of Wales. He represented that such provision was conformable to the practice of ancient time; that the Prince had been heretofore entitled to majesty in the life-time of his father; and that a settlement of this nature was reasonable and necessary to ascertain the independence of the apparent heir to the crown. The motion was vigorously opposed by Sir Robert Walpole, as an encroachment on the prerogative; as an officious intermediation in the king’s family affairs; and as an effort to set his majesty and the prince at variance. But a misunderstanding, it seems, had already happened in the royal family. The prince, who was ushered in the evening by the House, by his majesty’s command, that on the preceding day the king had sent a message to the prince by several holdeens of the first quality, informing him that his majesty had given orders for settling a jointure upon the Princess of Wales, suitable to her high rank and dignity, which he would in a proper time lay before parliament, in order to be rendered more certain and effectual; that although his royal highness had not thought fit, by any application to his majesty, to desire that his allowance of fifty thousand pounds might be rendered less precarious, the king, to prevent the bad consequences which he apprehended might follow from the unprofitable measures which his royal highness intended to pursue, would grant to his royal highness for his majesty’s life, the said fifty thousand pounds per annum, to be issued out of the civil-list revenues, over and above the prince’s revenue from the duchy of Cornwall, which his majesty thought a very competent allowance, considering his own numerous issue, and the great expense which did and must necessarily attend an honourable provision for the whole royal family; that the prince, by a verbal answer, desired their lordships to lay him with all humility at his majesty’s feet: to assure him that he did, and ever should, retain the utmost duty for his royal person: that he was very thankful for any instance of his majesty’s goodness; and the sentinel of his majesty’s gracious intention of settling a jointure upon his royal highness; and that, as to the message, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore, he could give no answer to it; that his royal highness afterwards used many dutiful expressions towards his majesty; adding, “Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands, and I am sorry for it,” or words to that effect. Sir Robert Walpole then endeavoured to demonstrate, that the annual sum of fifty thousand pounds was as much as the king could afford to allow for the prince’s maintenance; and he expatiated upon the bad consequences that might ensue, if the son should be rendered altogether independent of the father.

The motion was laid over, and Sir Robert Walpole had asserted, that the parliament had no right in interfere in the creation or maintenance of a Prince of Wales; and that in the case of Richard II., upon the death of his father the Black Prince, was created Prince of Wales, in consequence of an address or petition from parliament, that measure was in all probability directed by the king himself. In answer to this assertion it was observed, that probably the king would not have been so forward in creating his grandson Prince of Wales, if he had not been forced into this step by his parliament; for Edward in his old age fell into a sort of love doteage, and gave himself entirely up to the management of his mistress, Alice Percivall, and his second son, the Duke of Lancaster: a circumstance that raised a most reasonable jealousy in the Black Prince, at that time on his death-bed, who could not but be anxious about the safety and right of his only son, whom he found he was soon to leave a child in the hands of a dotage grandfather, and an ambitious, aspiring uncle. The supporters of the motion observed, that the allowance of fifty thousand pounds was not sufficient to defray the expenses of the youth, shaving for acts of charity and munificence; and that the several deductions for land taxes and fees reduced it to forty-three thousand pounds. They affirmed, that his whole income, including the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, the duchy of Rothesay, and the other two thousand pounds by his majesty’s own regulation, the expense of the prince’s household amounted to sixty-three thousand. They proved that the produce of the civil list exceeded nine hundred thousand pounds, a sum above one hundred thousand pounds a-year more than was enjoyed by his late majesty; and those revenues were made to consist of the expense of his household and civil government did not much exceed four hundred and fifty thousand pounds a-year. They observed, that the parliament added one hundred and forty thousand pounds annually for acts of charity and bounty, together with the article of secret-service money; and allowed one hundred thousand pounds for the maintenance of the Prince of Wales: that the article of secret-service money had prodigiously increased in the late reign: by an account that was shrewdly calculated. It appeared, that vast sums of money had been given for purposes which nobody understood, and to persons whom nobody knew. In the beginning of the following session several members proposed that this extraordinary account should be taken into consideration; but the inquiry was warded off by the other party, who declared that the parliament could not examine any account which had been presented to a former session. The debate was fierce and long; and ended in a division, by which the motion was rejected. A motion of the same nature was made by Lord Carteret in the House of Peers, and gave rise to a very keen dispute, maintained by the same arguments, and issue.

§ XXXVI. The next remarkable contest was occasioned by a motion of Sir R. Walpole, who proposed the sum of one million should be granted to his majesty, towards redeeming the South Sea stock: a company, commonly called South Sea annuities. Several members argued for the expediency of applying this sum to the payment of the debt due to the bank, as a part of that encumbrance was saddled with an interest of six per cent, whereas the interest paid for the other sums that constituted the public debt did not exceed four per cent. Many plausible arguments were offered on both sides of the question; and at length the motion was carried in the House of Commons; and the Parliament, early in the next session, made a motion, to be called into a committee to consider of the national debt, Sir John Barnard made a motion, for enabling his majesty to raise money either by the sale of annuities, or by borrowing at an interest not exceeding three per cent, to be applied towards redeeming the South Sea annuities; and that such of the said annuities as should be inclined to subscribe their respective annuities, should be preferred to all others. He said, that even those public securities which bore an interest of three per cent only were sold at a premium in Change Alley; he was, therefore, persuaded, that those who were willing to give a premium for a three per cent. security would gladly lend their money to the government at the sum he proposed, and that it should rather be for his majesty’s service. It was resolved, that that part of the principal should be paid off for fourteen years. He expatuated upon the national advantages that would accrue from a reduction of interest. From easy and obvious calculations he inferred, that in a very little time the interest upon all the South Sea annuities would be reduced from four to three per cent, without any danger to public credit, or breach of public faith; that then the produce of the sinking fund would amount to fourteen hundred thousand pounds per annum, to be applied only towards redeeming the capital of the several trading companies; he proved that this measure would bring every one of them within the period within which the government would be glad to accept of three per cent. interest on any reasonable terms: in which case the sinking fund would rise to one million six hundred thousand pounds per annum. Then the parliament might venture to annul one half of it, by freeing the people from the taxes upon coals, candles, soap, leather, and such other impositions as lay heavy upon the poor labourers and manufacturers; then the remaining millions might be allotted in proportions towards the discharge of those annuities and public debts which bore an interest of three per cent, only, and afterwards towards diminishing the capitals of the several trading companies till the term of fourteen years should be expired; and in the meantime, by the annual addition of a million yearly, which would be sufficient for paying them off, and freeing the nation entirely from all its encumbrances. This salutary scheme was violently opposed by Alderman Heathcote, and other partisans of the ministry: yet all their objections were refuted; and, in order to defeat the project, they were obliged to have recourse to artifice. Mr. Winnington moved, that all the public creditors, as well as the South Sea annuitants, should be called to the house. Sir John Barbon declared, that it might be easy for the government to borrow money at three per cent. sufficient for paying off such of the proprietors of four-and-twenty millions as were not willing to accept of that interest, but it would be extremely difficult to have the public chiefly favored; the proprietors of four-and-forty millions, who might choose to have their principal rather than such an interest. Nevertheless, resolutions were founded on this and other alterations of the original scheme; and a bill was accordingly prepared.

It produced many other debates, and was at last postponed by dint of ministerial influence. The same venerable patriot, who projected this scheme, moved that as soon as the interest of all the national redeemable debt should be reduced to three per cent, the House would take off some of the heavy taxes which oppressed the poor and the manufacturers: but this motion was rejected by the majority.

A. D. 1737.

The last disputes of this session were excited by a bill sent down from the Lords for punishing the magistrates and city of Edinburgh, on account of the murder of John Porteous. In the beginning of the session, the magistrates of Edinburgh had been in great tumult and commotion, arising from the several tumults and riots which had lately happened in different parts of the kingdom. He particularly insisted upon the atrocious murder of Captain Porteous, as a flagrant insult to the king's person, and as an affront to public peace, so much the more dangerous, as it seemed to have been concerted and executed with deliberation and dexterity. He suspected that some citizens of Edinburgh, and persons interested in them, had been engaged in this circumstance, but likewise because, notwithstanding the reward of two hundred pounds, which had been offered by proclamation for the discovery of any person who acted in this tragedy, not one individual had as yet been detected. He seemed to think that the magistrates had encouraged the riot, and that the city had forfeited its charter; and he proposed a minute inquiry into the particulars of the affair. He was seconded by the Duke of Newcastle and the Earl of Illy; though this last nobleman differed in opinion from him with respect to the charter of the city, which, he said, could not be justly forfeited by the fault of the magistracy. The Lords resolved that every man engaged in the tumults and riots might obtain the necessary information concerning this riot should be ordered to attend; and, That an address should be presented to his majesty desiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the proceedings of Captain Porteous might be submitted to the perusal of the House. These documents being accordingly examined, and all the witnesses arrived, including three Scottish judges, a debate arose about the manner in which these last should be interrogated, whether at the bar, at the table, or on the woolsacks. Some Scottish lords asserted that they had a right to be seated next to the judges of England: but after a long debate this claim was rejected, and the judges of Scotland appeared at the bar in the robes. A bill was brought in to disable Alexander Wilson, Esquire, Lord Provost of Edinburgh, from empowering any office or place of magistracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Great Britain, for impeaching the said Alexander Wilson; for abolishing the guard of that city; and for taking away the gates of the Nether-Bow port, so as to open a communication between the city and suburbs, in which the king's troops are quartered. The Duke of Argyle, in arguing against this bill, said he could not think of a proceeding more harsh or unprecedented than the present, as he believed there was no instance of the writ being imposed upon a gentleman, and he called it called a proceeding by a bill ex post facto, falling upon any single person, far less upon any community, for crimes that were within the reach of the inferior courts of justice; for this reason he observed, that if the lord provost and citizens of Edinburgh should suffer in the terms of the present bill, they would suffer by a cruel, unjust, and fantastical proceeding; a proceeding of which the worst use might be made, if ever the nation should have the misfortune to fall under a partial, self-interested administration. He told them he sat in the parliament of Scotland when that part of the treaty of union relating to the privileges of the royal burghs was settled on the footing as religion, that is, they were made unalterable by any subsequent parliament of Great Britain. Notwithstanding the eloquence and warmth of his remonstrance, the bill was sent down to the House of Commons, where it produced a very different effect. The Scotch members were animated by a severe scrutiny into the particular circumstances that preceded and attended the murder of Porteous: from the examination of the witnesses, it appeared that no freeman or citizen of Edinburgh was concerned in the riot, which was chiefly composed of country people, excited by the relations of some unhappy persons whom Porteous and his men had slain at the execution of the smuggler; and these were assisted by prestee boys, and the lowest class of vagabonds that happened to be at Edinburgh; that the lord provost had taken all the precautions to prevent mischief that his reflection suggested; that he even exposed his person to the rage of the multitude, in his endeavour to disperse them; and that if he had done amiss he erred from want of judgment, rather than from want of inclination to protect the unhappy Porteous. It likewise appeared that Mr. Lindsay, member for the city of Edinburgh, had gone over to North Britain, informed him of the riot, implored his immediate assistance, and promised to conduct his troops into the city; and that his suit was rejected, because he could not protect the order of the city, without which he nether could have obtained in such confusion, nor ventured to carry about his person through the midst of an enraged populace. The Scottish members exerted themselves with great spirit and resolution in the capital. They were joined by Sir John Barnard, Lord

Cornbury, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Oglesborpe. Lord Pol-warth declared, that if any gentleman would show where on account of the charge against the lord provost, and the city of Edinburgh had been proved, he would that instant give his vote for the commitment of the bill. He said, if gentlemen would lay their hands upon their hearts, and ask themselves whether they would, in such a manner have the case of Edinburgh been that of the city of Hirsted, York, or Norwich, he was persuaded they would have required that every title of the charge against them should have been fully and undeniably proved. He thought the evidence against Mr. Lindsay was in some respects more conclusive. When the bill, it passed the House, was sent back to the Lords, who agreed to the alterations, and then received the royal assent.

The next effort of the minister was obliquely levelled at the liberty of the press, which it was much for his interest to abridge. The errors of his conduct, the mystery of that corruption which he had so successfully reduced to a system, and all the blaspheems of his administration, had been exposed and ridiculed, not only in political periodical writings produced by the most eminent hands, but likewise in a succession of theatrical pieces, which met with uncommon success among the people. He either wanted judgment to distinguish men of genius, or could find none that would engage in his service; he, therefore, employed a set of wrecked authors, void of understanding and integrity. They undertook the defence of his ministry, and answered the attacks of his antagonists. The match was so extrememly unequal, that, instead of justifying his conduct, they exposed it to additional ridicule and contempt: and he saw himself in danger of being despised by the whole nation. He resolved to seize the first opportunity to choke those canals through which the torrent of censure had flowed upon his character. The manager of a playhouse commissioned to him by Sir John Barbon for producing the piece called The Pillar of Rump, which was fraught with treason and abuse upon the government, and had been presented to the stage for exhibition. This performance was produced in the House of Commons. The minister descended upon the insulation, the malice, the immorality, and the seditious calumny, which had been of late propagated in theatrical pieces. A bill was brought in to limit the number of playhouses; to subject all dramatic writers to the inspection of the lord chamberlain, and to compel them to take out a license for every production before it could appear on the stage. Notwithstanding a vigorous opposition, this bill passed through both Houses with extraordinary dispatch, and was carried into a law. The poet and debater of Chesterfield distinguished himself by an excellent speech, that will ever endear his character to all the friends of genius and literature, to all those who are warmed with zeal for the liberties of their country. "Our stage (said he) ought to be kept within due bounds; but for this purpose, our laws as they stand at present are sufficient. If our stage-players at any time exceed those bounds, they ought to be prosecuted; they may be punished. We have precedents, we have examples of persons punished for things less criminal than some pieces which have been lately represented: a new law must, therefore, be unnecessary; and in the present case it cannot be unnecessary without being dangerous. Every unnecessary restraint is a fetter upon the legs, a shackles upon the hands, of liberty. One of the greatest blessings we enjoy, one of the greatest blessings a people can enjoy, is liberty. But every good in this life has its alloy of evil. Licentiousness is the alloy of liberty. It is an illusion, it is an illusion; it is a speck upon the eye of the political body, which I can never touch but with a gentle, with a trembling hand; lest I destroy the body, lest I injure the eye with which I am about to appear. For at any time licentious, if a play appears to be a libel upon the government, or upon any particular man, the king's courts are open: the law is sufficient to punish the offender. He is no new law to be made to let them be restrained as other subjects are, by the known laws of their country: if they offend, let them be tried as every Englishman ought to be, by God and their country. Do not let us subject them to the arbitrary will and pleasure of a court; a political body. A political body is no more a man to judge and determine without limitation, control, or appeal, is a sort of power unknown to our laws, inconsistent with our constitution. It is a higher, a more absolute power than we trust even to the king himself; and, therefore, I must think we ought not to vest such power in his majesty's lord chamberlain." His arguments had no effect, though the House admired his eloquence; and the playhouse bill passed into a law. On the twenty-first day of June the king made a short speech to both Houses, and the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament.

A.D. 1737.

§ 1. A congress was opened at Madrid in the year 1737. It was to treat of the differences between the czarina and the grand signor; but this proving ineffectual, the emperor declared war against the Turks, and demanded assistance from the diet of the empire. He concerted the operations of the campaign with the Empress of Muscovy. It was agreed that the Turks should hold a congress at Constantinople, should attack Widin in Servia, while the Russians, commanded by Count de Munich, should penetrate to the Ukraine, and besiege Oczakov, on the Bosphorus. They were thus advanced against this place, which was garrisoned by some thousand men; and the Bosphorians defended by eighteen gallies. The Muscovites carried on their approaches with such impetuosity and perseverance, that the Turks were terrified at their valour, and in effect abandoned their works. They disarmed by unknown marks of prowess in these attacks, was General Keth, now field-marshal in the Russian service, who was dangerously wounded on this occasion. Meanwhile Count Sceckendorf, finding it impossible to reduce Widin without a squadron of ships on the Danube, turned his arms against Nissa, which was surrendered to him on the eight-and-twentieth day of July; but this was the first verge of his good fortune. The Turks attacked the post which the imperialists occupied along the Danube. They took the fort of Padidil, burned the town of Ilas in Wallachia, and plundered the neighbouring villages. The Prince of Saxe-Hildburghausen, who had for the present abandoned Burgomart, was obliged to repass the Sava. Count Sceckendorf was recalled to Vienna, and the command of the army devolved upon Count Phillipp. Count Kevenhuller was obliged to retire from the stage because of the expedition in the Musumlen. The conferences at Neimerow were broken off; and the Turkish plenipotentiaries returned to Constantinople.

§ 11. The kingdom of Poland now enjoyed the most perfect repose under the dominion of Augustus. Ferdinund, the old Duke of Courland, dying without issue, the succession was disputed by the Teutonic order and the kingdom of Poland, while the States of Courland declared that the last of the twenty-four emperors of the Teutonic order had ceased to be. The Order of the Teutonic was again reformed; and the Teutonic army immediately entered that country; and the States elected the Count de Biron, high-chamberlain to the Empress of Muscovy. The Elector of Cologne, as grand-master of the Teutonic order, protested against this election; but the king of Poland agreed to it, on certain conditions settled at Danzig with the commissaries of the Teutonic duke and those of the czarina. In the month of July, John Casimir de Medici, Great Elector of Saxony, arrived at Florence; and the Prince de Cren took possession of his territories, in the name of the Duke of Lorraine, to whom the emperor had already granted the eventual investiture of the dukedom.

§ 111. In England, the attention of the public was attracted by an open breach in the royal family. The Princess of Wales had advanced to the very last month of her pregnancy before the king and queen were informed of her being with child. She was twice conveyed from Hampton-court to the palace of St. James's, when her labour pains were supposed to be approaching; and at length was delivered of a princess in about two hours after her arrival. The king being apprised of this event, sent a message by the Earl of Essex to the prince, expressing his displeasure at the conduct of his royal highness, as an indignity offered to himself and the queen. The prince deprecating the anger of the queen, and the Essex distinctly implored the queen's mediation. The princess joined her entreaties to those of his royal highness: but all their benignity and supplication proved ineffectual. The king in another message sent by the Duke of Grafton, observed, that the prince had removed the princess twice in the week immediately preceding the day of her delivery, from the place of his majesty's residence, in expectation of her labour: and both times, on his return, indolently concealed the knowledge of this circumstance relating to this important affair: that at last, without giving any notice to their majesties, he had precipitately hurried the princess from Hampton-court, in a condition not to be named; that this imprudent conduct, for a considerable time, had been so entirely void of all real duty to the king, that his majesty had reason to be highly offended with him. He gave him to understand, that until he should withdraw his regard and confidence from those by whose instruction and advice he was directed, his Majesty and the queen, and return to his duty, he should not reside in the palace: he, therefore, signified his pleasure that he should leave St. James's, with all his family, when it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the present. In obedience to this very pressing request, he retired to Kew, and made other efforts to be re-admitted into his Majesty's favour, which, however, he could not retrieve. Whatever might have been his design in contesting so important a point, his failure in it was the more serious, in consequence of his former agreeable conduct, and afterwards hurrying her from place to place in such a condition, to the manifest hazard of her life, his Majesty had certainly cause to be offended at this part of his conduct; though the punishment seems to have been severe, if not rigorous; for he was not even admitted into the presence of the queen his mother, to express his duty to her, in her last moments, to implore her forgiveness, and receive her last blessing. She died of a mortification of her bowels, on the twentieth day of November, in the fifty-fifth year of her age, regarded as a princess of uncommon singularity, and as a pattern of conjugal virtue.

§ IV. The king opened the session of parliament on the twenty-third of November, by recommending the despatch of the public business with prudence and unanimity. Each House presented a warm address of condolence on the queen's death, with which he seemed to be extremely affected. Through the House unanimously sympathized with the king in his affliction, the minister still met with contradiction in some of his favourite measures. One would imagine that all the arguments for and against a standing army in time of peace had been already exhausted; but, when it was moved that the same number of land-forces which they had voted in the preceding year should be continued in pay for the ensuing year, the debate was renewed with surprising vivacity. It was contended on both sides that the present number of forces was absolutely necessary to maintain the peace of the kingdom, which was filled with clamour and discontent, as well as to support the whig interest; and that they would vote for keeping up four times the number, should it be found expedient for the purposes of the nation. In the opposition replied, that this declaration was a severe satire on the ministry, whose conduct had given birth to such a spirit of discontent. They said it was in effect a tacit acknowledgment, that the power of the crown had not been so extensive as an inconsiderable party, which had engrossed the administration by indirect methods; which acted contrary to the sense of the nation; and depended for support upon a military power, which the people in every part were opposed to, and consequently enslaved. They affirmed, that the discontent of the ministry complained of was in a great measure owing to that very standing army, which perpetuated their taxes, and hung over their heads as the instruments of arbitrary power and oppression. Lord Bolivar explained the nature of the whig principles, and demonstrated that the party which distinguished itself by this appellation, no longer retained the maxims by which they were originally characterized. Sir John Illynde Coton, who spoke with the courage and freedom of an old English baron, declared he never knew a member of that House, who acted on true whig principles, vote for a standing army in time of peace. "I have heard of whigs (said he) who opposed all unlimited votes of credit: I have heard of whigs who looked upon corruption as the greatest curse that could fall upon any nation: I have heard of whigs who esteemed the liberty,, of the upper, middle, and lower classes of free people, and triennial parliaments as the greatest bulwark of their liberties; and I have heard of a whig administration which has resisted injuries done to the trade of the nation, and refused to purchase the honour of the flag." The ministry triumphed as usual, and the same number of forces was continued.

§ V. Ever since the treaty of Seville, the Spaniards in America had almost incessantly insulted and distressed the commerce of Great Britain. They disputed the right, to land and dock vessels on the coast of New Spain, and gather salt on the island of Tortuga; though that right was acknowledged by implication in all the treaties which had been lately concluded between the two nations. The captains of their armed vessels, known by the name of guarda-coasts, by means of armed ships, plundering British ships, on pretence of searching for contraband commodities, on which occasions they had behaved with the utmost insolence, cruelty, and rapine. Some of their ships of war had actually attacked and plundered merchant ships at the island of Tortuga, as if they had been at open enmity with England. They had seized and detained a great number of British vessels, imprisoned their crews, and confiscated their cargoes, in violation of treaties, in defiance of common justice and humanities. Repeated memorials were presented to the court of Spain, by the British ambassador at Madrid. He was amused with evasive answers, vague promises of inquiry, and cedulas of instructions sent to the Spanish governors in America, to which they paid no sort of regard. Not but that the Spaniards had reason to complain, in their turn, of the illicit commerce which the English traders from Jamaica and New York sustained with the inhabitants of the continent of South America: though this could not justify the depredations and cruelties which the commanders of the guarda-coasts had committed, without provocation or pretence.

§ VI. The merchants of England loudly complained of these outrages; the nation was fired with resentment, and cried for vengeance; but the minister appeared cold, phlegmatic, and timorous. He knew that a war would involve him in such difficulties as must of necessity endanger his administration. The treasure which he now employed for domestic purposes must in that case be expended in military armaments: the wheels of that machine on which his credit and influence were supported would roll on longer more: the opposition would of consequence gain ground, and the imposition of fresh taxes, necessary for the maintenance of the war, would fill up the measure of popular resentment against his person and ministry. Moved by these considerations, he indifferently endeavoured to avoid a rupture, and to obtain some sort of satisfaction by dint of memorials and negotiations, in which he betrayed his own fears to such a degree, as animated the Spaniards to persist in their depredations, and encouraged the court of Madrid to disregard the remonstrances of the British ambassador. But this apprehension of war did not proceed from Spain only: the two branches of the House of Commons were now at loggerheads, as well as by connivance; and he did not doubt that in case of a rupture with Spain, they would join their forces against Great Britain. Petitions were delivered to the House by merchants from different parts of the kingdom, explaining the repeated violations to which they had been exposed, and imploring relief of the parliament. These were referred to a committee of the whole House; and an order was made to admit the petitioners, if they should think fit, to be heard by themselves or by counsel. Sir John Barnard moved for an address to the king, that all the memorials and papers relating to the Spanish depredations should be laid before the House; and this, with some alteration proposed, by the members of the committee, was presented. In compliance with the request, an enormous multitude of letters and memorials was produced.

§ VII. The House, in a grand committee, proceeded to hear counsel for the crown, and examined evidence: by which it appeared that amazing acts of wanton cruelty and injustice had been perpetrated by Spaniards on the subjects of Great Britain. Mr. Pulteney expatiated upon these circumstances of barbarity. He demonstrated, from treaties, the right of the British nation to the trade of the West Indies, to the shore of Cape Washington, and to the salt of Tortuga; he exposed the parricidalın of the minister, and the futility of his negotiations; he moved for such resolutions as would enrage the resentment of an injured nation, and the bands of British parliament. These were warmly combated by Sir Robert Walpole, who affirmed, they would enump the ministers in their endeavours to compromise these differences: that they would frustrate their negotiations, introducing a more round and strong measure to precipitate this situation into an unnecessary and expensive war. Answers produced replies, and a general debate ensued. A resolution was proposed; but the question being put for recommitting it, was carried in the negative. The House, however, agreed to an address, beseeching his majesty to use his endeavours to obtain effectual relief for his injured subjects, to convince the court of Spain that his majesty could no longer suffer such constant and repeated insults and injuries to be offered upon the defense of his crown and to the ruin of his trading subjects; and assuring him, that in case his royal and friendly instances with the catholic king should miscarry, the House would effectually support his majesty in taking such measures as honour and justice should make it necessary for him to pursue. To this address the king made a favourable answer.

A. D. 1722.

§ VIII. The most important subject on which both sides exercised their talents, was a bill prepared and brought in by Mr. Pulteney, for the more effectual securing the trade of his majesty's subjects in America. This was no other than the revival of part of two acts passed in the reign of Queen Anne, by which all predisposed to trade to America were required to be inscribed in the shipping rolls. This bill was carried through the House of Commons in the present session, and enjoying the same as their own property and estate for ever. The ministry endeavoured to evince the discussion of this bill, by amusing the House with other business, until an end should be put to the session. A mean artifice was practised with this view; and some severe altercation passed between Sir Robert Walpole and Mr. Pulteney. At length the bill was read, and gave rise to a very long and warm contest, in which the greatest orators of both sides found opportunities to display their eloquence and satire. Mr. Pulteney defended the bill with all the ardour of paternal affection; but, notwithstanding his warmest endeavours, it was rejected upon a division.

§ IX. When the mutiny bill was sent up to the House of Lords, a long debate arose upon the number of troops voted for the ensuing year. Lord Carteret explained the situation of affairs in almost every nation of Europe with great conciseness and precision. He demonstrated the improbability of a rupture between Great Britain and any power against which a land army could be of any service. He examined the domestic circumstances of the nation; and proved, that whatever discounts there might be in the present, the increase of the army was little or no advantage, and no seeming design to overturn or disturb the government. In answer to an argument, that such a number of regular forces was necessary for preventing or quelling tumults, and curbing the ruffians, Mr. Pulteney, when they were commanded by that gentleman, to be taken from his country, he expressed his hope that he should never see the nation reduced to such unfortunate circumstances: he said, a law which the civil power was unable to execute, must either be in itself oppressive, or such a one as afforded a handle for oppression. In arguing for a reduction of the forces, he took notice of the great increase of the national expense. He observed, that before the revolution, the people of England did not raise above two millions for the whole of the public charge; but now what was called the current expense, for which the parliament annually provided, exceeded that sum; besides the civil list, the interest due to the public creditors, and the sinking fund, which, added together, composed a burden of six millions yearly. The Earl of Chesterfield, on the same subject, affirmed, that slavery and arbitrary power were the certain consequences of keeping up a standing army for any number of years. It is the machine by which the chains of slavery are put upon a free people; the instrument secretly prepared by corruption; but, unless a standing army protected those that forged them, the people would break them asunder, and chop off the polluted hands by which they were prepared. By daring a people must be accustomed to be governed by an army; by degrees that army must be made strong enough to hold them in subjection. England lead for many years been accustomed to a standing army, under pretence of its being necessary to assist the civil power; and by degrees the number and strength increased. At length the number of the late king it did not exceed six thousand: it soon amounted to double that number, which has been since augmented under various pretences. He therefore concluded, that slavery, under the disguise of an army for protecting the liberties of the people, was creeping in upon them by degrees; if no reduction should be made, he declared he should expect in a few years to hear some minister, or favourite of a minister, terrifying the House with instances of dangers arising to the security of the liberties of Europe in search of possible dangers, to show the necessity of keeping up a mercenary standing army, three times as numerous as the present. In spite of these suggestions, the standing army maintained its ground. The same noblemen, assisted by Lord Bathurst, distinguished themselves in a debate upon the Spanish depredations, which comprehended the same arguments that were used in the House of Commons. They met with the same success in both. Resolutions equivalent to those of the lower House were taken; an address was presented; and his majesty assured them he would repeat, in the most pressing manner, his instances at the court of Spain in order to procure effectual relief for his trading subjects. This assurance was renewed in his speech at the close of the session, on the twentieth of May, when the parliament was prorogued.

§ X. Lord Carteret was sent for holding the sword of Wales was delivered of a son, who was baptized by the name of George, now King of Great Britain. His birth was celebrated with uncommon rejoicings; addresses of congratulation were presented to the king by the two universities, and by almost all the cities and communities of the kingdom. But the Prince of Wales still laboured under the displeasure of his majesty, who had ordered the lord chamberlain to signify in the Gazette, that no person who visited the prince should be admitted to speak with him. His royal highness was divested of all the external marks of royalty, and lived like a private gentleman, cultivating the virtues of a social life, and enjoying the best fruits of conjugal felicity. In the latter end of this month, Rear-Admiral Haddock set sail with a strong squadron for the Mediterranean, which it was hoped would give weight to the negotiation of the British minister at the court of Madrid. The act to discourage the retail of spirituous liquors had incensed the populace to such a degree as occasioned numberless tumults in the cities of London and Westminster. They were so addicted to the appellation of gin or genua, that they ran all risks rather than lose the profit of its procreation, and no measure, by which it was prohibited, that in less than two years twelve thousand persons within the bills of mortality were convicted of having sold it illegally. Nearly one half of the taxes, which it was said, went to the sixty thousand pounds and three thousand persons paid ten pence each, for an exemption from the disgrace of being committed to the house of correction.

§ XI. The war maintained by the emperor and the czarina against the Ottoman Porte, had not yet produced any decisive event. Count Beckendorff was disgraced and confined on account of his ill success of the last campaign. General Dowitz was tried by a council of war at Belgrade, and condemned to death for having surrendered, to the enemy the town of Nissa, in which he commanded. The diet of the empire granted a subsidy of fifty Roman mithras to the emperor, who began to make vigorous preparations for the ensuing campaign: but in the meantime, Ragozski, Vairoud of Transylvania, revolted against the house of Austria, and brought a considerable army into the field, under the protection of the grand signor. He was immediately proclaimed a rebel, and a price set upon his head. They ran away to a field early, reduced the fort of Usitz and Medias, and undertook the siege of Orsova, which, however, they abandoned at the approach of the imperial army, commanded by the Grand Duke of Russia, a free people; also Count Konigseger. The Turks, being reinforced, marched back, and attacked the imperialists, by whom they were repulsed after an obstinate engagement. The Germans, now inarching that advantage, repassed the Danube; and then the Turchs made numerous marches on Europe, where they found a fine train of artillery, designed for the siege of Wiidin. By the conquest of this place, the Turks led the Danube open to their galleys and vessels; and the Germans engaged in the campaign of Hungary. In the Ukraine, the Russians under General Count Koutchobay obtained the advantage over the Turks in two engagements; and General Lacy routed the Tartars of the Crimea; but they returned in greater numbers, and harassed the Muscovy in such a manner, by intercepting the commerce and destroying the country, that they were obliged to abandon the lines of Precops.

§ XII. In the month of October, an affair of very small importance occurred, which, however, was worth some observation. He said, that some members of the Scanian courts should be referred to the perusal of the House; but some members in the opposition were not content with this resolution. Then Mr. Sandy, who moved, said, that the House might inspect all letters written, and instructions given by the secretaries of state, or commissioners of the admiralty, to any of the British governors in America, or any commander-in-chief, or captains of his majesty's ships of war, or his majesty's ministers at the court of Spain, any of his majesty's consuls in the ports of Spain, since the treaty of Seville, relating to the losses which the British subjects had sustained by means of depredations committed by the subjects of Spain in Europe and America. This was an unusual form of petition, urged by the spirit of the times; and factum, Mr. H. Walpole, had justly observed, that a compliance with such an address might lay open the most private transactions of the cabinet, and discover secrets that ought, for the good of the kingdom, to be concealed. It would discover to the public that Spain's ultimatum of the king's demands and concessions, and the nation thereby be deprived of many advantages which it might reap, were no such discovery to be made. He said that the House might best judge of the matter. if the two courts should arrive at such a crisis, and not before, the consuls were instructed to give notice to the merchants, that they might retire in time with their effects; but should such an instruction convey the knowledge of the Spaniards, it would be a kind of watch-word to put them on their guard, and unavoidably occasion the ruin of many thousands of British subjects. Certain it is, no government could act either in external or domestic affairs with proper influence, dignity, and despatch, if every writer and instructor relating to an unfinished negotiation should be exposed to the view of so many numerous assemblies, composed of individuals actuated by motives in themselves diametrically opposite. This and the like reasoning, the majority, the same gentleman moved again for an address, that his majesty would give directions for laying before the House copies of such memorials or representations as had been made, either to the King of Spain or to his ministers, since the treaty of Seville, relating to the depredations committed in Europe or America. A debate ensued; and, upon a division, the question passed in the negative.

§ XV. The House, in a committee of supply, voted twenty thousand pounds for the service of the embassy, and the standing army was continued without reduction, though powerfully attacked by the whole strength of the opposition. The Commons likewise ordered an address to his majesty, for the copies of several memorials since the treaty of Seville, touching the rights of Great Britain, or any infraction of treaties which had not been laid before them. There were accordingly submitted to the inspection of the House. By this time the convention itself was not only presented to the Commons, but also published for the information of the people. Divers merchants, planters, and others trading to America, the cities of London and Bristol, the merchants of Liverpool, and owners of sundry ships, which had been seized by the British, petitions against the convention, by which the subjects of Spain were so far from giving up their groundless and unjustifiable practice of visiting and searching British ships sailing to and from America, as they had both the full powers to give up the rights of the nation; for they might do it if they durst. Sir Robert Walpole, in answer to these suggestions, affirmed, that the ministry had on this occasion obtained more than ever on like occasions was known to be obtained: that they had reconciled the peace of their country with her true interest: that this peace was attended with all the advantages that the most successful arms could have procured: that future ages would consider this as the most glorious period of our history, and do justice to the councils that produced the happy event, which every gentleman divested of passion and prejudice was ready to do; and which, he believed, the present age, when rightly informed, would not refuse. In a word, he extolled his own convention with the most extravagant eucorums.

§ XV. The House resolved to address the king, that copies of all the memorials, representations, letters, and petitions which had been presented to the ministry relating to depredations, should be submitted to the perusal of the House: but some members in the opposition were not content with this resolution. Then Mr. Sandy, who moved, said, that the House might inspect all letters written, and instructions given by the secretaries of state, or commissioners of the admiralty, to any of the British governors in America, or any commander-in-chief, or captains of in dispute, while the settlers remained in the most precarious and dangerous situation. It was moved, that the merchants should be heard by their counsel: but the proposal was opposed by the ministry, and rejected upon a division.

§ XVI. This famous convention concluded at the Pardo on the fourteenth day of January, imported, That within six weeks, to be reckoned from the day at which the ratifications should be exchanged, two numeri pleni potentiarius should meet at Madrid, to confer, and finally regulate the respective pretensions of the two crowns, with relation to the trade and navigation in America and Europe, and to the limits of Florida and Carolina, as well as concerning other points which remained likewise to be adjusted, according to the former treaties subsisting between the two nations: That the pleni potentiarius should finish their conferences within the space of eight months: That in the meantime no progress should be made in the fortifications of Florida and Carolina: That his catholic majesty should pay to the King of Great Britain the sum of ninety-five thousand pounds, for a balance due to the crown and subjects of Great Britain, after deduction made of the demands of the crown and subjects of Spain: That this sum should be employed for the satisfaction, discharge, and payment of the demands of the British subjects upon the crown and subjects of Spain: That the crown, however, should not extend or relapse to the accounts and differences which subsisted and were to be settled between the crown of Spain and the Asiento company, nor to any payment or satisfaction come to that manner between either of the two crowns, or their ministers, with the subjects of the other; or between the subjects and subjects of each nation respectively: That his catholic majesty should cause the sum of ninety-five thousand pounds to be paid at London within four months, to be reckoned from the day on which the ratifications were exchanged. Such was the substance of that convention, which alarmed and provoked the merchants and traders of Great Britain, excited the whole nation in the immediate expectation of the honour of their country, and raised a general cry against the minister who stood at the helm of administration.

§ XVII. The eyes of the whole kingdom were now turned upon the House of Commons. The two contending parties summoned their whole force for the approaching dispute: on the day appointed for considering the convention, four hundred members had taken their seats by eight in the morning. In a committee of the whole House, certain West Indian merchants and planters were heard against the convention: so that this and the following day were employed in reading papers, and obtaining information. On the eighth day of March, Mr. H. Walpole having launched out on the government, it seemed for an address to the nation; but agreement was at length arrived at, of approbation to his majesty. He was seconded by Mr. Campbell, of Pembroke; and the debate began with extraordinary ardour. He who first distinguished himself in the debate was mentioned in the plenary convention: his character was admired, Sir Thomas Sanderson, at that time treasurer to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Earl of Scarborough. All the officers and adherents of his royal highness had joined the opposition; and he himself on this occasion sat in the gallery, to hear the debate on such an important transaction. Sir Thomas Sanderson observed, that the Spaniards by the convention, instead of giving us reparation, had obliged us to give them a general release. They had not allowed the word satisfaction to be so much as mentioned in the plenary convention. He cited an instance which had cut off the ear of Captain Jenkins, and used the most insulting expression towards the person of the king—an expression which no British subject should decently repeat—an expression which no man that had a regard for his sovereign could ever forgive—ever this fellow lived to enjoy the fruits of his rapine, and remained a living testimony of the cowardly tameness and mean submission of Great Britain; of the triumphant haughtiness and stubborn pride of Spain. Lord Gage, one of the most keen, spirited, and sanguine orators in the House, stated in this manner the account of this convention and the satisfaction obtained by the convention: the losses sustained by the Spanish deprivations amounted to three hundred and forty thousand pounds; the commissary, by a stroke of his pen, reduced this sum to two hundred and sixty thousand: but forty-five thousand were struck off for prompt payment: he next allotted sixty thousand pounds as the remuneration part of a debt pretended to be due to Spain, for the destruction of her fleet by Sir George Byng, though it happened by the instructions on the table that said sum had been already amply satisfied on that head: these deductions reduced the balance to ninety-five thousand pounds; but the King of Spain insisted upon the South Sea Company's paying immediately the sum of sixty-eight thousand pounds, as a debt due to him on one head of accounts, though in other articles, his catholic majesty was indebted to the company a million and above the demand; the remainder to be paid by Spain during the term of six hundred and twenty thousand pounds, from which she insisted upon deducting whatever she might have already given in satisfaction for any of the British ships that had been taken; and on being allowed the value of the St. Theresa, a Spanish ship, which they had ever held in disallowance, which W. Pitt, with an energy of argument and diction peculiar to himself, declaimed against the convention, as insecure, unsatisfactory, and dishonourable to Great Britain. He said that the convention was no satisfaction, that the ships, was not admitted, indeed, in the preamble; but stood there as the reproach of the whole, as the strongest evidence of the fatal submission that followed; on the part of Spain, an unnecessary, an inhuman treaty claimed and exercised over the American seas; on the part of England, an undoubted right by treaties, and from God and nature, declared and asserted in the revolutions of parliament; were now referred to the discussion of pleni potentiarius, upon which they had the regard for the honour of their country, which was to be discussed and recollected; and if to rate to be prescriptive rules, as in all construction it is, that right was, by the express words of the convention, to be given up and sacrificed; for it must cease to be any thing from the moment it is submitted to limitation. Mr. Lyttelton, with equal force and fluency, answered the speech of Mr. H. Walpole. After he had used many arguments to persuade us to peace, (said he,) to any peace, good or bad, by pointing out the dangers of a war, shewn by no means to allow to such as he represents them, he crowned all those terrors with the name of the pretender. It would be the curse of the pretender. The pretender would be strongly supported by the people of England. There language imports. The people of England complain of the greatest wrongs and indignities: they complain of the interruption, the destruction of their trade; they think the ocean has left them in a worse condition than before; and in answer to all these complaints, what are they told? Why, that their continuing to suffer all this, is the price they must pay to keep the king and his family on the throne of these realms. If this were true, it ought not to be owned; but it is far from truth; the reverse is true. Nothing can weaken the family; nothing shake the establishment, but such measures as these, and such language as this. He affirmed that if the ministers had proceeded to the same extremity as the Spanish prelacy, it would have been ruinous; and would either have acted with vigour, or have obtained a real security in an express acknowledgement of our right not to be searched as a preliminary, seu qua non, to our treating at all. Instead of this, they had referred it to pleni potentiarius. "Would you, Sir, (said he,) submit to a reference, whether you may travel unmolested from your house in town to your house in the country? Your right himself in the lands of such barbarians?" I recommended my soul to God," said he, "and my cause in my country." The behaviour of his lordship occasioned a sensation: the king himself rose, and read the declaration of his right, which had been presented to the nation and senate of Spain, accompanied with a letter of the pretender and his enemies, supposing them to be the voice of the nation, which had been offered to the nation and senate of Spain, the Great Parliament, and the Great Assembly of Virginia, afterwards employed in the service of the East India company; he appeared to have been written by the king himself, or by the same minister, who had been already employed in the augmentation of the island of Angria, during which he behaved with extraordinary courage and prudence; and saved his own ship, with three others that were under his convoy. is clear and undeniable, why would you have it discussed? but much less would you refer it, if two of your judges belonged to a gang which has often stopped and robbed you in your way thither before."—The ministers, in vindication of the benefit and satisfaction granted by Spain was adequate to the injury received: that it was only the preliminary of a treaty which would remove all causes of complaint: that war was always expensive and detestable; and, besides, as well as unforeseen in its events: that France and Spain would certainly join their forces in case of a rupture with Great Britain: that there was not one power in Europe upon which the English could depend for effectual assistance: and that the French and Spanish ministers, considering the state of a poor pretender. The House upon a division, agreed in the address; but when a motion was made for its being recommitted, the two parties renewed the engagement with redoubled eagerness and impetuosity. Sir William Wyndham and Mr. Pulitzer poured all the thunder of their eloquence against the insolence of Spain, and the concessions of the British ministry. Sir Robert Walpole, exerting all his fortune and dignity in defence of himself and his measures, and the question being put, the resolutions for the address were carried by a small majority.

§ XVIII. Then Sir William Wyndham, standing up, made a pathetic remonstrance upon this determination. "The people of Great Britain," he said, "never made a treaty with the Spaniards, to our advantage; and that the treaty under our consideration is a reasonable and an honourable treaty. But if a majority of twenty-eight in such a full House should fail of that success; if the people in general, instead of considering their present measure, settle the terms of this House, what will be the consequence? Will not the parliament lose its authority? Will it not be thought, that even in the parliament we are governed by a faction? and what the consequence of this may be, I leave to those gentlemen to consider, who are now to give their vote for this address: for my own part, I will trouble you with no more, but with these my last words, I sincerely pray Almighty God, who has so far wonderfully protected these kingdoms, that he will graciously continue his protection over them, by preserving us from that impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewise from that impending danger which threatens our constitution from within." The minister was on this occasion deserted by his usual temper, and even provoked into personal abuse. He declared, that the gentleman who now the mouth of his opponents had been looked upon as the head of those traitors, who twenty-five years before conspired the destruction of their country and of the royal family, in order to set a popish pretender upon the throne; that he was seized by the vigilance of the then government, and pardoned by its clemency; but all the use of this clemency was, he said, to qualify himself according to law, that he and his party might some time or other have an opportunity to overthrow all law. He branded them all as traitors, and expressed his hope that their behaviour would unite all the true friends of the present happy establishment. To such a degree of mutual animosity were both sides inflamed, that the most eminent members of the minority actually retired from parliament; and were by the nation in general revered as masters to the liberty of the people.

§ XIX. The dispute occasioned by the convention in the House of Lords, was maintained with equal warmth, and perhaps with more abilities. After this famous treaty had been considered, Lord Carteret suggested that possibly one of the contracting powers had presented a protest or declaration, importing that she accused to such or such a measure, only upon condition that the terms of that protest or declaration should be made good. He said, that until his mind should be free from the most distant suspicion that such a paper might exist to the present case, he could not form a just opinion of the transaction himself. Whatever might be necessary for that purpose. The adherents to the ministry endeavoured to evade his curiosity in this particular, by general assertions; but he insisted on his suspicion with such perseverance, that at length the ministry declared that he must know whether it was possible or not, that the King of Spain before he ratified the convention, signifying that his catholic majesty reserved to himself, in its full force, the right of being able to suspend the articles of oregno, in case the company should not pay within a short time the sum of sixty-eight thousand pounds sterling, owing to Spain on the due of that year; or on the other hand, to pay the sum of six thousand pounds, being the fine to be paid to Queen Caroline; that under the validity and force of this protest, the signing of the said convention might be proceeded on, in no other manner. In the debate that ensued, Lord Carteret displayed a surprising degree of prudence, recommended by all the graces of eloquence, chaste, pure, dignified, and delicate. Lord Bathurst argued against the articles of convention with his usual spirit, integrity, and good sense, particularly animated by an honest and unreserved declaration of his own personal sentiments. The Earl of Chesterfield attacked this ingenious measure with all the weight of argument, and all the pompagny of state. The Duke of Argyile, no longer a partisan of the ministry, inveighed against it as infamous, treacherous, and destructive, with all the fire, impetuousity, and enthusiasm of declamation. It was defended with unequal arms by the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Cholmdeley, Lord Hervey, the lord chancellor, the Bishop of Salisbury, and in particular by the Earl of Illy, a nobleman of extensive capacity and uncommon erudition; remarkable for his knowledge of the civil law, and seemingly formed by nature for a politician; cool, discerning, plausible, self-sufficient, and always ready to meet with an unalterably true to his own interest. The dispute was learned, long, and obstinate: but ended as usual in the discomfiture of those who had stigmatized the treaty. The House agreed to the address, in which they declared, "that the majesty for his gracious condensation in laying before them the convention. They acknowledged his great prudence in bringing the demands of his subjects for their past losses, which had been so long depending, to a final adjustment; in procuring an express stipulation for a speedy payment; and in laying a foundation for accomplishing the great and desirable ends of obtaining future security; and preserving the peace between the two nations. They declared their confidence in his royal wisdom, that in the treaty to be concluded, in pursuance of the convention, proper provisions would be made for the redress of the grievances of which the nation had so Justly complained: they assured his majesty, that in case his just expectations should not be answered, the House would heartily and zealously coeur all such measures as should be necessary to vindicate his majesty's honour, and to preserve to his subjects the full enjoyment of all those rights to which they were entitled by treaty and the law of nations. This was a hard-won victory. At the head of those who voted against the address we find the Prince of Wales. His example was followed by twenty-two peers, five bishops, twenty-two earls, four viscounts, eighteen barons, four bishops; and their party was reinforced by sixteen peers. A spirited protest was entered and subscribed by nine-and-thirty peers, comprehending all the noblemen of the kingdom who were most eminent for their talents, integrity, and virtue.

§ XX. A message having been delivered to the House from his majesty, importing, that he had settled nine-and-thirty thousand pounds per annum on the younger children of the royal family; and desiring their lordsships would bring in a bill to enable his majesty to make that provision good, out of the hereditary revenues of the crown, some lords in the opposition observed, that the next heir to the crown might consider this settlement as a precedent for the prodigality of his revenue, which a parliament had no power to make: that formerly co daughter of the royal family was ever provided for by parliament, except the eldest, and that never was by way of annuity, but an express provision of a determinate sum of money paid by way of dowry. These objections were overruled; and the House complied with his majesty's request. Then the Duke of Newcastle produced a subsidy treaty, by which it was stipulated, that in time of war Denmark seventy thousand pounds per annum, on condition of the Danes furnishing to his Britannic majesty a body of six thousand men when demanded. At the same time, his grace delivered a message from his majesty, expressing that the House would enable him to fulfil his engagement: and also to raise that money and troops the exigency of affairs, during the approaching recess, might require. Another venerable dispute arose from this proposal. With respect to the Spanish war, it was resolved, that no use could be made of the Danish troops in any expedition undertaken against Spain, because it was stipulated in the treaty, that they should not be used either in Italy, or on board of the fleet, or be transported in whole or in part beyond the seas, after they should have marched out of the terriitories of Denmark, except for the defence of the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland: nay, should France join against the English, the Danes could not act against that power, unless as part of the army of Germany or Flanders.
This body of Danes may be said, therefore, to have been retained for the defence and protection of Hanover: or if the interest of Britain was at all consulted in the treaty, it must have been in preventing the Danes from joining their fleets to those of France and Spain. Then he argued against the second part of the message with great vivacity. He said nothing could be more dangerous to the constitution than an unlimited and unelected vote of credit. Such a demand our ancestors would have heard with amazement, and rejected with scorn. He affirmed that the practice was but of modern date in England: that it was never heard of before the revolution had been made. It had gone on until the nation was blessed with the present wise administration. He said, if ever a general vote of credit and confidence should become a customary compliment from the parliament to the ministry, every sense of its members, as long as such a minister might think fit to desire it, parliament would grow despicable in the eyes of the people; then a proclamation might be easily substituted in its stead, and happy would it be for the nation if that should be sufficient; for when a parliament ceases to be a check upon ministers, it becomes a useless and unnecessary burthen on the people. The representatives must always be paid some way or other: if their wages are not paid openly and sumptuously by their respective constituents, as they were inten-merly, a majority of them may in future times be always ready to accept of wages from the administration, and these must come out of the pockets of the people. The Duke of Argyll and the Earl of Chesterfield enlarged upon the same topics. Nevertheless, the House complied with the message: and presented an address in which they not only approved of the treaty with Denmark, but likewise assured his majesty that they would concur with his measures, and support him in fulfilling his engagements, as well as in making such further augmentation of his forces by sea and land, as he should think necessary for the honour, interest, and safety of these kingdoms.

§ XXI. The message being communicated to the Commons, they voted seventy thousand five hundred and eighty-three pounds, for the subsidy to Denmark, and five hundred thousand pounds for augmenting the forces on and in Great Britain. The convention to pay the crown of Spain the sum of sixty thousand pounds in consideration of the ships taken and destroyed by Sir George Byng, which sum was to be applied to the relief of the British merchants who had suffered by the Spanish depredations, the Commons inserted in a bill a clause, providing for this sum to be paid by the parliament. When the bill was read in the House of Lords a motion was made by Lord Bathurst for an address to kings, whether Spain had paid the money stipulated by the convention, as the time limited for the payment of it was now expired. The Duke of Newcastle, by his majesty's permission, acquainted the House that it was not paid; and that Spain had as yet given no reason for the non-payment. Then a day was appointed to consider the state of the nation, when Lord Carteret moved for a resolution, that the failure of Spain in this particular was a breach of the convention, a high indignity to his majesty, and an in-justifiable act on his part, and, after a warm debate, this motion was overruled by the majority. The minister, in order to a Among the laws enacted in the course of this session was an act against gaming, which had become universal through all ranks of people, and likely to prove destructive of all morals, industry, and sentiment. An other bill passed, for granting a reward to Joanna Stevens, on her discovery of a plot, and another, for the purpose of procuring an affiliated with the stone; a medicine which has by no means answered the expectations held out for it.

b In the House of Lords complaint was made by Lord delaware of a su-stone in some measure for the unpopular step he had taken in the convention, allowed a salutary law to pass for the encouragement of manufactures. The Hanover fleet, and two on behalf of the sugar colonies, one permitting them for a limited time to export their produce directly to foreign parts, under proper restrictions; and the other making more effectual provisions for pressing the duties of navigation; the last agitation of foreign sugars, rum, and molasses into Great Britain, and his majesty's plantations in America. The supplies being voted, the funds established, and the crown gratified in every particular, the king closed the session with a speech on the constitution of June, when the affording his majesty's name procured the parliament.

§ XXII. Letters of marque and reprisal were granted against the Spaniards: a promotion was made of general officers; the troops were augmented; a great fleet was assembled at Spithead; a reinforcement sent out to Admiral Haddock; and an embargo laid on all merchant ships ouward bound. Notwithstanding these preparations of war, Mr. Irwin, the British minister at Madrid, declared to the court of Spain, that his master, although he had permitted the subjects to make reprisals, would not be understood to have broken the peace; and that this permission would be recalled as soon as his catholic majesty should be satisfied that the British would no longer have been so justly demanded. He was given to understand, that the King of Spain looked upon those reprisals as acts of hostility; and that he hoped, with the assistance of Heaven, to justify them, and answer to the charge against his adversaries. He published a manifesto in justification of his own conduct, complaining that Admiral Haddock had received orders to cruise with his squadron between the caps of St. Vincent and St. Mary, in order to surprise the Assenque ships; that letters of repre-sal had been published at London in an indecent style, and even carried into execution in different parts of the world. He excused his non-payment of the ninety-five thousand pounds stipulated in the convention, on the ground that the British court had first contravened the articles of that treaty, by the orders sent to Haddock; by continuing to fortify Georgia; by reinforcing the squadron at Jamaica; and by eluding the payment of the sixty-eight thousand pounds due to Spain from the South Sea company, on the assiento for negroes. The French ambassador at the Hague declared that the king his master was obliged by treaties to assist his catholic majesty by sea and land, in case he should be attacked; he dismissed the States-general from exposing the quarrel of Great Britain; and they assured him they would observe a strict neutrality, though they could not avoid furnishing his Britannic majesty with arms; and gave him notice that they would not sucour as he had expected. He was of the opinion that the treaties subsisting between the two powers.
The people of England were inspired with uncommon alacrity at the near prospect of war, for which they had so long clamored. The calmer and more pacific mind, seeing it unavoidable, began to be earnest and effectual in their preparations.

§ XXIII. The events of war were still unfavourable to the emperor. He had bestowed the command of his army upon Velt-Marechal Count Wallis, who assembled his forces in the neighborhood of Belgrade; and advanced towards Crutska, where he was attacked by the Turks with such impetuousity and perverstacy, that he was obliged to give ground, after a long and obstinate engagement, in which he lost above six thousand men. The Earl of Crawford, who served as a volunteer in the imperial army, signalized his courage in an extraordinary manner on this occasion, and received a dangerous wound, of which he was never perfectly recovered. The Turks were afterwards wounded at Jabouka; nevertheless, their grand army invented Belgrade on the side of Servia, and carried on the operations of the siege with extraordinary vigour. The emperor, dreading the loss of this place, seeing his finances evaporating, and his credit diminish, was sent to a negotiation for peace, which was transacted under the mediation of the French ambassador at the Ottoman Porte. The Count de Neuperg, as imperial plenipotentiary, signed the preliminaries on the first day of September. They were ratified by the emperor, though he refrained as much as possible from expressing any appro ation of this step, and declared that his minister had exceeded his powers. By this treaty the house of Austria ceded to the grand signor Brindisi, Salutate, Servia, Austrian Wallachia, the isle and fortress of Ormoza, with all the district of St. Nicholas, and the contracting powers agreed that the Danube and the Saave should serve as boundaries to the two empires. The emperor published a circular letter, addressed to his ministers at home, in which he expressed the wish that the success of the last campaign, and disowning the negotiations of Count Neuperg; nay, these two officers were actually disgraced, and confined in different castles. This, however, was no other than a sacrifice to the resentment of the czarina, who loudly complained, that the emperor had concluded a separate peace, contrary to his engagements with the Russian empire. Her general, Count Munch, had obtained a victory over the Turks at Choczcm, in Moldavia, and made himself master of that place, in which he found two hundred pieces of artillery; but the country was so ruined by the incursions of the Tartars, that the Muscovites could not subsist in it during the winter, and even the emperor, and unable to cope with the whole power of the Ottoman empire, took the first opportunity of putting an end to the war on honourable terms. After a short negociation, the conferences ended in a treaty, by which she was left in possession of the great conquests she had made, and the fortifications should be demolished: and the ancient limits were re-established between the two empires.

§ XXIV. A rupture between Great Britain and Spain was now become inevitable. The English squadron in the Mediterranean had already made prize of two rich Caracca ships. The king had issued orders for augmenting his land forces, and raising a body of marines: and a general motion, by a number of the House of Commons, Admiral Vernon had been sent to the West Indies, to assume the command of the squadron in those seas; and arrest the trade and settlements of the Spaniards. This gentleman had rendered himself considerable in the House of Commons, by loudly condemning all the measures of the ministry, and bluntly speaking his sentiments, whatever they were, without respect of persons, and sometimes without any regard to decorum. He was counted a good orator, and had contrived to get himself admitted an orator. He had once commanded a squadron in Jamaica, where he was perfectly well acquainted with those seas; and in a debate on the Spanish depredations, he chance d to affirm, that Porto Bello, on the Spanish main, might be easily taken. This was an observation of some weight, and should be of no his party, if made, would not be under the groan of those gentlemen; and, if they were returned only to oppose and perplex, he should not be at all sorry to see them succeed again.

A majority of the House of Commons being to former preparation for the encouragement of seamen.
After a long dispute, and eager opposition by the ministry, it passed both Houses, and obtained the royal assent. Mr.
Sandys having observed that there could be no immediate use for a great number of forces in the kingdom; and explained how little service could be expected from raw and illiterate seamen; proposed an address to the king, desiring that the body of marines should be composed of members of the House of Commons, and that those who should not be appointed to the service of the ministry, whose aim was to increase the number of their dependants, and extend their parliamentary interest, by granting a great number of commissions. The proposal was, therefore, after a long debate, rejected by the majority. Motions were made for an inquiry into the conduct of those who concluded the convention, but they were overruled. The pension bill was revived, and so powermously supported by the eloquence of Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, and Mr. Littleton, that it made its way through the Commons to the upper House, where it was again lost upon a division, after a very long debate.
As the seamen of the kingdom expressed unqualifying approbation to the service of the government, and the fleet could not be manned without great difficulty, the ministry prepared a bill, which was brought in by Sir Charles Wager, for registering all seamen, watermen, fisher, and lightermen, throughout his majesty's dominions; and the bill passed into a law, a British sailor would have been reduced to the most abject degree of slavery: but he had removed from a certain district allotted for the place of his abode, in case of desertion, he would not be punished accordingly; he must have appeared, when sum-omed, at all hazards, whatever might have been the circumstances of his family, or the state of his private affairs: but he had been encumbered with debt, he must either have secured the peace of the law, or lain at the mercy of his creditors: had he acquired by industry, or received by n this speech, affectionate addresses were presented by both Houses, without any considerable opposition.

§ XXV. The seceding members had again resumed their seats in the House of Commons; and Mr. Pulteney had made an unexpected discovery of the various acts which they had taken. They thought that step was necessary, as affairs then stood, for clearing their characters of the imputation of sitting in an assembly, where a determined majority had passed upon a measure opposed to what they had taken. He was, thought that step was necessary, as affairs then stood, for clearing their characters
upon a measure opposed to what they had taken. He was, thought that step was necessary, as affairs then stood, for clearing their characters
inheritance, an ample fortune, he would have been liable to be torn from his possessions, and subjected to hardships which no man would endure but from the sense of fear or terror. But there was a lingering purpose in the heart of John Barnard and others, as a flagrant encroachment on the liberties of the people, that the House rejected it on the second reading.

§ XXVI. The king having by message communicated to the House his intention of disposing the Princess Mary in marriage to Prince Frederick of Hesse; and expressing his hope, that the Commons would enable him to give a suitable portion to his daughter, they unanimously resolved, that a draft was accordingly prepared for that purpose, and presented an address of thanks to his majesty, for having communicated to the House this intended marriage. On the thirteenth day of March a ship arrived from the West Indies, despatched by Admiral Vernon with an account of his having taken Porto Bello, on the isthmus of Darien, with six ships only, and demolished all the fortifications of the place. The Spaniards acted with such promptitude on this occasion, that their forts were taken almost without bloodshed. The two Houses of parliament joined in an address of congratulation upon this success of his majesty's arms; and the nation in general was wonderfully elated by an exploit which was magnified much above its real extent by the Commons granted every thought proper to demand. They provided for eight-and-twenty thousand land forces, besides six thousand marines. They enabled his majesty to equip a very powerful navy: they transported to the island of Jamaica, and provided for, empowered their sovereign to defray certain extraordinary expenses not specified in the estimates. To answer these uncommon grants, they imposed a land tax of four shillings in the pound; and enabled his majesty to destitute twelve hundred thousand pounds from the sinking fund; in a word, the expense of the war, during the course of the ensuing year, amounted to about four millions. The session was closed on the twenty-ninth day of April, when the king laid before them that which was to be done with the supplies they had so liberally granted, and recommended union and moderation to both Houses. A.D. 1759. During the greatest part of this winter, the poor had been grievously afflicted in consequence of a severe frost, which began at Christmas, and continued till the latter end of February. The river Thames was covered with such a crust of ice that a multitude of people dwelt upon it in tents, and a great number of boats were erected for the entertainment of the populace. The navigation was entirely stopped: the watermen and fishermen were disabled from earning a livelihood: the fruits of the earth were destroyed by the cold; and the most extreme that many were liable to death; and this calamity was the more deeply felt, as the poor could not afford to supply themselves with coals and fuel, which were advanced in price, in proportion to the severity and continuance of the frost. The lower class of labourers, who worked in the open air, were now deprived of all means of subsistence: many kinds of manufacture were laid aside, because it was found impracticable to carry them on. The price of all sorts of provisions rose almost to a dearness; even water was sold in the streets of London. In this season of distress, many wretched families must have perished by cold and hunger, had not those of opulent fortunes been inspired with a remarkable spirit of benevolence and humanity. No measure could more redound to the honour of the English nation, than did those instances of benevolence and well-conducted charity which were then exhibited. The liberal hand was not only opened to the professed beggar, and the poor that owned their distress; but uncommon pangs were taken to find out and relieve those more unhappy objects, who from motives of false pride, or ignominious shame, endeavoured to conceal their want, and to bear their miseries with a stoical philosophy. The solitary habitations of the widow, the fatherless, and the unfortunate, were visited by the beneficent, who felt for the woes of their fellow-creatures; and, to such as refused to receive a portion of the public charity, the benevolent attempted to correct their misanthropy, as much by persuasion as by compulsion, in order to shock the delicacy of their dispositions.

§ XXIX. In the beginning of May the King of Great Britain set out for Hanover, after having appointed a regency, and concerted vigorous measures for distressing the enemy. In a few days after his departure, the espousals of the Princess Caroline of Saxe-Gotha and the Prince of Cumberland representing the Prince of Hesse; and in June the princess embarked for the continent. About the same time, a sloop arrived in England with despatches from Admiral Vernon, who, since his adventure at Porto Bello, had bombarded Carthagena, and taken the fort of San Lorenzo, on the river of Chagre, in the neighbourhood of his former conquest. This month was likewise marked by the death of his Prussian majesty, a prince by no means remarkable. Moreover, the election of the successor on the throne by Frederick his eldest son, the late kog of that realm, who has so eminently distinguished himself as a warrior and legislator. In August, the King of Great Britain concluded a treaty with the Landgrave of Hesse, who engaged to furnish him with a body of six thousand men for four years, in consideration of an annual subsidy of two hundred and fifty thousand crowns. § XXX. Meanwhile, preparations of war were vigorously carried on by the ministry in England. They had wisely resolved to annoy the Spaniards in their American possessions. Three ships of war, cruising in the bay of Biscay, fell in with a large Spanish ship of the line strongly manned, and were enabled by the opening the escove ships arrived, with the treasure, in Spain, notwithstanding the vigilance of the English commanders, who were stationed in a certain latitude to intercept that prize. The following summer, six thousand marines lately levied were encamped on the Isle of Wight, in order to be embarked for the West Indies. Intelligence being received, that a strong squadron of Spanish ships of war waited at Ferrol for orders to sail to their American settlement, Sir John Norris sailed with a powerful fleet from Spithead, to dispute their voyage; and the Duke of Cumberland served in person as a volunteer in this expedition; but, after divers fruitless efforts, he was enabled to capture some, but not all, of the Spanish ships, the greatest part of the summer in Torbay: and, upon advice that the French and Spanish squadrons had sailed to the West Indies in conjunction, the design against Ferrol was wholly laid aside. In September, a small squadron of ships commanded by Commodore Anson, set sail for the South Sea, in order to act against the enemy on the coast of China and Peru, and co-operate occasionally with Admiral Vernon across the isthmus of Darien. The scheme was well laid, but ruined by unnecessary delays, and unforeseen accidents. But the hopes of the nation centred chiefly in a formidable armament designed for the northern coast of New Spain, and his catholic majesty's other settlements in the West Indies. This expedition has been issued for raising a regiment of four battalions in the English colonies of North America, that they might be transported to Jamaica, and join the forces from England. These, consisting of the marines, and detachments from some old regiments, were embarked in October at the Isle of Wight, under the command of Lord Cathcart, a nobleman of approved honour, and great experience in the art of war; and they sailed under convoy of Sir Chalmers Oyle, with a fleet of seven-and-twenty ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, and tenders. They were likewise furnished with hospital ships, and store ships, laden with provision, ammunition, all sorts of warlike implements, and every kind of apparatus for an armament more completely equipped; and never had the nation more reason to hope for extraordinary success. § XXXI. On the twentieth day of October, Charles VI. Emperor of Germany, the last prince of the house of Austria, died in Vienna, and was succeeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldest daughter, the Archduchess Maria Theresa, married to the grand Duke of Tuscany. Though this calamity was neither expected nor desired, yet the event of such a nature as to occasion a universal desire to relieve the nation from the same had been long ago the subject of the prudential sanction guaranteed by all the powers in Europe, her succession produced such contest as kindled a cruel war in the empire. The young King of Prussia was no sooner informed of the emperor's death, than he was seized with a scheme to deprive the house of Hesse; seized certain fiefs to which his family laid claim; and published a manifesto, declaring that he had no intestion to contravene the pragmatic sanction. The Elector of Bavaria refused to acknowledge the archduchess as Queen of Hungary and Bohemia; alleging, that he himself pretended to those countries, as the descendant of the House of Wittelsbach. L. Willughby, head of the Gerneral branch of the house of Austria. Charles VI. was survived but a few days by his all, the Carina Anne Iwanowna, who died in the forty-fifth year of her age, after having bequeathed her crown to Iwan, or John, the infant son of her late husband, the Elector, and who had been married to Anthony Ulrick, Duke of Brunswick-Luneburg-Bevern. She appointed the Duke of Courland regent of the empire, and even guardian of the young crat; though her own were alive; but this disposition was not long maintained.

§ XXVI. The King of Great Britain having returned to England from his German dominions, the session of parliament was opened in November. His majesty assumed them, on this occasion, that he was determined to prosecute the war vigorously, even though France should espouse the cause of Spain, as her late conduct seemed to favor this supposition. He took notice of the emperor's death, as an event in which all likelihood would open a new scene of affairs in Europe: he therefore recommended to their consideration the necessary supplies for putting the nation in such a posture that it should have nothing to fear. As it related to the recent war, he thought it proper to consider of some proper regulations for preventing the exportation of corn, and for more effectual methods to man the fleet at this juncture. The Commons, after having voted in answer to the remonstrance of the House of Commons, the king's accumulator. That he would consider the exportation of corn and provisions, for a limited time, out of Great Britain, Ireland, and the American plantations. This was a measure calculated to distress the enemy, who were supposed to be in want of these provisions. The French had contracted for a very large quantity of beef and pork in Ireland for the use of their own and of the Spanish navy; and an embargo had been laid upon the ships of that kingdom. The bill met with a successful opposition. The Duke of Newcastle, who had proposed it, laid himself open to the charge of neglecting his majesty should be addressed to lay an immediate embargo upon all ships laden with corn, grain, starch, rice, beef, pork, and other provisions, to be exported to foreign parts. They likewise resolved, that the thanks of the House should be given to Vice-Admiral Vernon, for the services he had done to his king and country in the West Indies. One William Cooley was examined at the bar of the House, and committed to prison, after having owned himself to be the author of a pamphlet. "Considerations on the Embargo on Provision of Victory." The performance contained many shrewd and severe animadversions upon the government, for having taken a step which, without answering the object of a embargo, had given rise to grievous discouragement to trade, and ruin all the graziers of Ireland. Notwithstanding the arguments used in this remonstrance, and several petitions that were presented against the corn bill, it passed by mere dint of ministerial influence. The other party endeavoured by various motions, to set on foot an inquiry into the orders, letters, and instructions, which had been sent to Admiral Vernon and Admiral Haddock; but all such investigations were carefully avoided.

§ XXXIII. A very hot contest arose from a bill which the ministry brought in under the specious title of, A bill for the encouragement and increase of senators, and for the better and speedier manner of keeping his majesty's fleet. This was a revival of the opprobrious measure which had been rejected in the former session; a scheme by which the justices of the peace were empowered to issue warrants to constables and headborough, to search by day or night for such seafaring men as should conceal themselves within their respective jurisdictions. Those搜索ers were vested with authority to force open doors, in case of resistance; and encouraged to violence. The minister of the navy declared, that they should discovery; while the unhappy wretches so discovered were dragged into the service, and their names entered in a register to be kept at the navy or the admiralty office. Such a plan of tyranny did not pass uncensured. Every exceptionable clause produced a warm debate, in which Sir John Barnard, Mr. Pitt Penney, Mr. Sands, Lord Gage, Mr. Pitt, and Mr. Luttenston, signalized themselves nobly for the liberties of their fellow subjects. Mr. Pitt having expressed a laudable indignation at such a large stride towards despotic power, in justification of which nothing could be urged but the plea of necessity, Mr. H. Walpole thought proper to attack him with some personal reasons. He refuted his arguments with great spirit; and observed that the discovery of truth was very little promoted by pompous diction and theatrical emotion. These impositions exposed him to a severe reply. Mr. Pitt, standing up against the charge, said. "He would not undertake to determine whether youth could be justly imputed to any as a reproach; but he affirmed, that the writer, who after having seen the consequences of repeated errors, continues still to blunder, and whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity, is surely the object of other abhorrence or contempt, and deserves not that his grey head should secure him from insults; much more is he to be abhorred, who, as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue and becomes more wicked with less temptation; who prostitutes himself for money which he cannot enjoy; and spends the remains of his life in the ruin of his country."—Petitions were presented from the city of London, and the county of Gloucester, against the bill. The king's answer was, that the trade and navigation of the kingdom, by discouraging rather than encouraging sailors, and destructive to the liberties of the subject; they were both rejected as improper. The important discussions and debates, maintained on both sides with extraordinary ardour and emotion, the severe clauses were dropped, and the bill passed with amendments.

§ XXXIV. But the most remarkable incident of this session, was an open and personal attack upon the minister, who was become extremely unpopular all over the kingdom. The people were now more than ever sensible of the grievous taxes under which they groaned; and saw their pursuers daily increasing. No effectual attempt had as yet been made to annoy the navy. Expensive squadrons had been equipped, had made excursions, and returned without striking a blow. The Spanish fleet had sailed first from Cadiz, and then from Ferrol, without any interruption from Admiral Haddock, who served the British squadron in the Mediterranean, and who was supposed to be restricted by the instructions he had received from the ministry, though in fact his want of success could not be imputed to neglect. Admiral Vernon had written from the West Indies to his private friends, that he was neglected, and in danger of being sacrificed. Notwithstanding the numerous navy which the nation maintained, the Spanish privateers made immense depredations, and many of the graziers of Ireland. In violation of treaties, and in contempt of that intimate connexion which had been so long cultivated between the French and English ministry, the King of France had ordered the harbour and fortifications of Dunkirk to be repaired: his fleet had sailed to the West Indies, in conjunction with that of Spain; and the merchants of England began to tremble for Jamaica: finally, commerce was in a manner suspended, by the practice of pressing sailors into the service, and by the embargo which had been laid upon ships, in all the ports of Great Britain and Ireland. These causes of popular discontent, added to other complaints which had been laid against the minister, excited great indignation. The king, with unwearyed industry, at length rendered him so universally odious, that his name was seldom or never mentioned with decency, except by his own dependents. § XXXV. The country party in parliament were now seized with an opportunity of vengeance. Mr. Sands went up to Sir Robert Walpole in the House, and told him, that on Friday next he should bring a charge against him in the House, as he was to be removed from office. He expected intimation; but, after a short pause, thanked him politely for this previous notice, and said he desired no favour, but fair play. Mr. Sands, at the time which he had appointed for this accusation, stood up, and in a studied speech entered into a long deduction of the minister's misconduct. He insisted upon the discontent of the people, that was the consequence of the measures which had been for many years pursued at home and abroad. He professed his belief that there was not a gentleman in the House who did not know that one single person in the administration was the chief, if not the sole, adviser and promoter of such measures. "This (added he) is known without doors, as well as within; therefore, the deserts, the reproaches, and even the curses of the people, are all directed against that single person. They cannot be delivered of present measure; they are suffered by those measures: they expect no redress; they expect no alteration or amendment, whilst he has a share in directing or advising our future administration. These, Sir, are the sentiments of the people in regard to that minister: these sentiments we are in honour and duty bound to represent to his majesty; and the proper method for doing this, as established by our constitution, is to address his majesty to remove him from his councils." He then proceeded to explain the particularity of the minister's misconduct in the whole series of his negotiations abroad. He charged him with having endeavoured to support his own interest, and to erect a kind of despotic government, by the practice of constant intrigue, and the betrayal of the interests and honour of Great Britain in the late convention; with having neglected to prosecute the war against Spain: and he concluded with a motion for an address to the king, that he would remove Sir Robert Walpole from his presence and councils for ever. He was answered by Mr. Pelham, who undertook to defend or excuse all the measures which the other had condemned; and acquiesced himself as a warm friend and unshaken adherent. Against this champion Sir John Barnard entered the lists, and was sustained by Mr. Pulbeney, who, with equal spirit and precision, pointed out and exposed all the material errors and mal-practices of the administration. Sir Robert Walpole, this time, was not sustained by himself. With respect to the article of bribery and corruption, he said, if any one instance had been mentioned; if it had been shown that he ever offered a reward to any member of either House, or even threatened to deprive any member of his office or employment, in order to influence his voting in parliament, there might have been some ground for this charge; but when it was so generally laid, he did not know what he could say to it, unless to deny it as generally and as positively as it had been asserted.—Such a declaration as this, in the hearing of so many persons, who not only knew, but subsisted by his wages of corruption, was a strong proof of the minister's base and rotten nature of such an office as he himself bore. The debate was protracted by the court members till three o'clock in the morning, when about sixty of the opposite party having retired, the motion was rejected by a considerable majority.

§ XXXVI. A bill was brought in for prohibiting the practice of inuring ships belonging to the enemies of the nation: but it was vigorously opposed by Sir John Barnard and Mr. Willmot, who demonstrated that this kind of traffic was advantageous to the kingdom; and the scheme was dropped. Another warm contest arose upon a clause of the mutiny bill, relating to the quartering of soldiers upon innkeepers and publishers, who complained of their being distressed in furnishing those guests with provisions and necessaries at the rates prescribed by law or custom. There were not wanting advocates to expostulate upon the nature of this grievance, which, however, was not redressed. A new trade was at this time opened with Persia, through the dominions of the czar, and vested with an exclusive privilege in the Russian company, by an act of parliament. The Commons voted forty thousand pounds for the encouragement of the company, and the quartering of the thousand men for the establishment of land forces. They provided for the subsidies granted to the King of Denmark, and the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel; and took every step for which they were invested for the ease and the convenience of the government.

§ XXXVII. The parties in the House of Lords were influenced by the same motives which actuated the Commons. The Duke of Argyll, who had by this time resigned all his places, declared open war against the ministry. In the beginning of the session, the king's speech in which the address to the convention was added, was at the same time received with general approbation. But the pretension of this nobleman stood up, and moved that a general address of thanks should be presented to his majesty, instead of a recapitulation of every paragraph of the king's speech, recollected from the parliament to the throne; with expressions of blank censure upon all the measures of the minister. He spoke on this subject with an astonishing impetuosity of eloquence, that rolled like a river which had overflowed its banks and flooded whole nations with its waters. The motion was supported by Lord Bathurst, Lord Carteret, the Earl of Chesterfield, and Lord Gower, who, though they displayed all the talents of oratory, were outvoted by the opposite party, headed by the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Cholmondeley, Lord Harvey, and the lord chancellor. The motion was rejected, and the address composed in the usual strain. The same motions for an inquiry into orders and instructions which had miscarried in the lower House, were here repeated with the same bad success; in the debates which ensued, the young Earls of Hallifax and Sandwich acquired a considerable share of reputation, for the strength of argument and eloquence with which they moved the House into consideration: the state of the army, the Duke of Argyll, having harangued with equal skill and energy on military affairs, proposed that the forces should be divided into those held in companies, without increasing the number of officers; as such an augmentation served only to debase the dignity of the service, by raising the lowest of mankind to the rank of gentleman; and to extend the influence of the minister, by multiplying his dependants. He, therefore, moved for a resolution, that the augmenting the army by raising regiments, as it is the most unnecessary and most expensive method of augmentation, was also the most dangerous, and a practicable means of evading the Constitution was likewise overruled, after a short though warm contention. This was the fate of all the other motions made by the Lords in the opposition, though the victory of the courtiers was always clogged with a nervous and spirited protest. Two days were expended in the debate produced by Lord Carteret's motion for an address, beseeching his majesty to remove Sir Robert Walpole from his presence and councils for ever. The speech that induced this memorable motion would not have disgraced a Caesar. It contained a retrospect of all the public measures which had been pursued since the revolution. It explained the nature of every treaty, whether right or wrong, which had been entered into, and rejected to prevent it. The debates, succinctly described the political connexions subsisting between the different powers in Europe. It exposed the weakness, the misconduct, and the impiety of the minister, both in his foreign and domestic transactions. It was embellished with all the ornaments of rhetoric, and warmed with a noble spirit of patriotic indignation. The Duke of Argyll, Lord Bathurst, and his other colleagues, seemed to be animated with uncommon fervour, and even inspired by the subject. A man of imagination, in reading their speeches, will think himself transported into the Roman senate, before the min of that republic. Northeless, the minister still triumphed by dint of his perseverance through his own opposition. Thirty peers entered a vigorous protest: and Walpole's character sustained such a rude shock from this opposition, that his authority seemed to be drawing near a period. Immediately after this contest was decided, the Duke of Marlborough moved for a resolution, that any attempt to inflict any kind of punishment on any person without allowing him an opportunity to make his defence, or without an impartial trial, and without this being by him, is contrary to natural justice, the fundamental laws of the realm, and the ancient established usage of parliament; and is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject. This motion was seconded by Lord Stanhope and Lord Lovel; and opposed by Lord Gower, as an intended censure on the proceedings of the day. This sentiment was so warmly espoused by Lord Talbot, who had distinguished himself in the former debate, that he seemed to be transported beyond the bounds of moderation. He was interrupted by the Earl of Cholmondeley, who charged him with having violated the order and decorum which ought to be observed in such assemblages. His passion was inflamed by this rebuke: he declared himself an independent lord; a character which he would not forfeit for the smiles of a court, the profit of an employment, or the revenue of a seat in Parliament. When he had expressed the sole of truth, he would trample on the insolence that should command him to suppress his sentiments.—On a division, however, the motion was carried.

§ XVIII. In the beginning of April, the king resolved to raise a fresh stand of men, and it was necessary for him to incur extraordinary expenses for maintaining the pragmatic sanction, at a time when he could not possibly have recourse to the advice and assistance of his parliament. He, therefore, demanded of the Commons such a supply as might be requisite to raise and manage it with all possible frugality. The lower House, in their address, approved of all his measures; declared they would effectually support him against all insults and attempts at his person, and that he should be protected, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that they would enable him to contribute, in the most effectual manner, to the support of the Queen of Hungary. Sir Robert Walpole moved that an aid of two hundred thousand pounds should be granted to that princess. Mr. Shapen protested against any interposition in the affairs of Germany. He expressed his dislike of the promise which had been made to defend his majesty's foreign dominions; a promise, in his opinion, inconsistent with the important and inviolable act, the act of settlement; a promise which, could it have been foreseen, would perhaps have for ever precluded from the succession that illustrious family to which the nation owed so many numberless blessings, such continued felicity. The motion however passed, though not without further opposition; and the House resolved, that three hundred thousand pounds should be granted to his majesty, to enable him effectually to support the Queen of Hungary. Towards the expense of this year, a million was deducted from the sinking fund; and the land tax continued at four shillings in the pound. The preparations for this war had already cost five million and a half; and on the 5th day of April, when the king took his leave of this parliament, with warm expressions of tenderness and satisfaction. Henry Bromley, Stephen Fox, and John Howe, three members of the lower House, who had signified themselves in defence of the minister, were now snubbed, and created Barons of Montford, Richmond, and Cheekworth. A camp was formed near Colchester; and the king having appointed a regency, set out in May for his German dominions. 5

CHAP. VII.

§ 1. The British armament had by this time proceeded to action in the West Indies. Sir Chaloner Ogle, who sailed from Spithead, had been overtaken by a tempest in the bay of Bucay, by which the fleet, consisting of about one hundred and seventy sail, were scattered and dispersed. Nevertheless, it had not been prosecuted with less vigour, and was not designed to provide wood and water, in the neutral island of Dornica, where the intended expedition sustained a terrible shock in the death of the gallant Lord Cathcart, who was engaged upon the hazardous enterprise, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that he would enable him to contribute, in the most effectual manner, to the support of the Queen of Hungary. Sir Robert Walpole moved that an aid of two hundred thousand pounds should be granted to that princess. Mr. Shapen protested against any interposition in the affairs of Germany. Chaloner Ogle at Spithead without any visible cause, until the season for action was almost exhausted; for, on the continent of New Spain, the periodical rains begin about the end of April; and this change in the atmosphere is attended with heat, which renders the climate extremely unhealthy; besides, the rain is so excessive, that for the space of two months no army can keep the field.

§ III. Sir Chaloner Ogle arrived at Jamaica on the ninth day of June; and Admiral Vernon did not sail on his intended expedition till towards the end of the month. Instead of directing his course to the Hannan's, which lay to leeward, and might have been reached in less than three days, he resolved to hunt against the wind up to Hispaniola, in order to observe the motion of the French squadron commanded by the Marquis d'Autin. The fifteenth day of February had elapsed before he received certain information that the French admiral had sailed for Europe, in great distress, for want of men and provisions, which he could not procure in the West Indies. Admiral Vernon, thus disappointed, called a council of war, in which it was determined to proceed for Carthagena. The fleet being supplied with water at Hispaniola, set sail for the continent of New Spain, and on the fourth of March anchored in Plata Grande, to the windward of Carthagena. Admiral de Torres had already sailed to the Havannah for provisions; but hearing his enemy was already before him, and that his garrison reinforced by the crews of a small squadron of large ships, commanded by Don Blas de Leon, an officer of experience and reputation. Here the English admiral lay for about six weeks; when the French were landed on the island of Tierra Bomba, near the mouth of the harbour, known by the name of Bocachica, or Little-mouth, which was surprizing fortified with castles, batteries, &c., and provisions, of great extent. The British forces erected a battery on shore, with which they made a breach in the principal fort, while the admiral sent in a number of ships to divide the fire of the enemy, and co-operate with the commanders of the army. Lord Anvers Boscawen, a gallant officer, who commanded one of these ships, was slain on this occasion. The breach being deemed practicable, the forces advanced to the attack: but the forts and batteries were abandoned: the Spanish ships that lay adrift the harbour's mouth were destroyed or taken; the passage was opened, and the fleet entered without further opposition. Then the forces were re-embarked with the artillery, and landed within a mile of Carthagena, where they were opposed by about seven hundred Spaniards, whom they obliged to retire. The admiral and general had contracted a heavy contempt for each other, and took all opportunities of expressing their mutual dislike: far from acting vigorously in concert, for the advantage of the commanders, in this measure, they sustained a mutiny in the cables; and each proved more eager for the disgrace of the rival, than zeal for the honour of the nation.

§ IV. The general complained that the fleet lay idle while his troops were harassed and diminished by hard duty and distemper. The admiral affirmed, that his ships could not lie near enough to batter the town of Carthagena: he branded the general with inactivity and want of resolution to attack the fort of St. Lucy, which commanded the town, and might be taken by scale. Wentworth, stimulated by these reproaches, resolved to try the experiment. His forces marched up to the attack; but the guides being slain, they mistook their route, and advanced to the strongest part of the fortification, where they were monover exposed to the fire of the town. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadiers, was mortally wounded; the scaling-ladders were found too short: the officers were perplexed for want of orders and direction; yet the soldiers sustained a severe fire for several hours with surprising intrepidity, and at length retreated, leaving about six hundred killed or wounded on the spot. Their mutiny was not much redressed by the general's order to maintain their footing on shore; besides, the rainy season had begun with such violence, as rendered it impossible for them to live in camp. They were, therefore, re-embarked; but the hope of further success immediately vanished. The admiral, however, acted with great spirit to demonstrate the impracticability of taking the place by sea, sent in the Galicia, one of the Spanish ships which had been taken at Bocachica, to cannonade the town, with sixteen guns mounted on one side, like a floating battery. This vessel, manned by detachments of volunteers from different ships, with stretcher-bearers, and composed of sick, wounded, and corpses which rendered the climate extremely unhealthy; besides, the rain is so excessive, that for the space of two months no army can keep the field.

§ V. After the re-embarkation of the troops, the distemper peculiar to the climate and season began to rage with considerable violence; the sick becameHO many so desperately sick, that the vengeance of the enemy was pursued by a more painful and inglorious fate. Nothing was heard but complaints and executions: the grooms of the dying, and the service of the bodies, excited the most lively indignation; and it was proved, that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour sufficient to admit large ships near enough to batter the town with any prospect of success. This, indeed, was the case in that part of the harbour to which the Galicia was conducted; but a little further to the left, she might have stationed four or five of her largest ships abreast, within pistol-shot of the walls; and if this step had been taken, when the land forces marched to the attack of St. Lucy, in all probability the town would have been surrendered.

At the re-embarkation of the troops, the distemper peculiar to the climate and season began to rage with considerable violence; the sick became so many so desperately sick, that the vengeance of the enemy was pursued by a more painful and inglorious fate. Nothing was heard but complaints and executions: the grooms of the dying, and the service of the bodies, excited the most lively indignation; and it was proved, that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour sufficient to admit large ships near enough to batter the town with any prospect of success. This, indeed, was the case in that part of the harbour to which the Galicia was conducted; but a little further to the left, she might have stationed four or five of her largest ships abreast, within pistol-shot of the walls; and if this step had been taken, when the land forces marched to the attack of St. Lucy, in all probability the town would have been surrendered.

§ VII. The Queen of Hungary had solicited the maritime powers for assistance, but found them fearful and backward. After the departure of the French fleet, and the more vigorous heur, she ordered Count Neipperg to assemble a body of forces, and endeavour to stop the progress of the Prussians in Silesia. The two armies encountered each other near the neighbourhood of Molwitz, and, after an obstinate dispute, the Austrians were obliged to retire, with the loss of four thousand men, killed, wounded, or taken. The advantage was dearly paid, for it should be granted that Frederick Margarete of Brandenburg, and Lieutenant-General Schuylenberg, were killed in the engagement, together with a great number of general officers, and about two thousand soldiers. After this action, Brog was surrendered to the Prussians, and he forced the important pass of Freiwolde, which was defended by four thousand Austrian husars. The English and Dutch ministers, who accompanied him in his progress, spared no pains to effect an accommodation; but the two sovereigns were too much irritated against each other to acquiesce in any terms that could be proposed. The Queen of Hungary was incensed to find herself attacked, in the day of her distress, by a prince to whom she had given no sort of provocation; and her Prussian majesty charged the court of Vienna with a design either to assassinate, or carry him off by treachery: a design which was dissolved with expressions of indignation and disdain. Count Neipperg being obliged to retire, the court of Vienna sent two detachments to Silesia, to which the King of Prussia sent a detachment to join the elector, under the command of Count Deshau, who, in his route, reduced Glatz and Neuss, almost without opposition; then his master received the homage of the Silesian States at Breslau, and returned to Berlin. In December, the Prussian army was distributed in winter-quarters in Moravia, after having taken Olmutz, the capital of that province. This army formed a camp of observation in the neighbourhood of Magdeburg.

§ VIII. The Elector of Hanover was alarmed at the success of the King of Prussia, in apprehension that he would become too formidable a neighbour. A scheme was said to have been proposed to the court of Vienna, for attacking that prince's electoral dominions, and divesting the conquest: but it never was put in execution. Nevertheless, the Prussians crossed the Upper Rhine, and seized some places on that river; while the auxiliary Danes and Hessians in the pay of Great Britain were ordered to be in readiness to march; and a good number of British forces encamped and prepared for embarkation. His majesty's council of war having been granted by parliament, was remitted to the Queen of Hungary; and every thing seemed to presage the vigorous interposition of his Britannic majesty. But in a little time after his arrival at Hanover, that sort of sentence seemed to flag even while her Hungarian majesty tottered on the verge of ruin. France resolved to seize this opportunity of crushing the House of Austria. In order to intimidate the Elector of Hanover, Marschal Mallebon was sent with a numerous army into Westphalia; and this expedient proved effectual. A treaty of neutrality was concluded; and the King of Great Britain engaged to vote for the Elector of Bavaria at the ensuing election of the Electors. The design of the French court was to raise this prince to the imperial throne, and furnish him with such succours as should enable him to deprive the Queen of Hungary of her hereditary dominions.

§ IX. While the Elector of Hanover was engaged in this undertakings, the French court endeavoured to amuse the queen with the strongest assurances of his master's friendship, a body of five-and-thirty thousand men began their march for Germany, in order to join the Elector of Bavaria; another French army was assembled upon the Rhine; and the Count de Belleisle, being provided with large sums of money, was sent to negociate with different electors. Having thus secured a majority of voices, he proceeded to Munich, where he presented the design to the Elector, that, in case of his making the generalissimo of the French troops marching to his assistance: and now the treaty of Nymphenburg was concluded. The French king engaged to assist the elector with his whole power, towards raising him to the imperial throne: the elector promised, that after his elevation he would never attempt to recover any of the towns or provinces which his master possessed. But if he would in his imperial capacity, renounce the barrier treaty; and agree that France should unequivocally retain whatever places she should subsist in the Austrian Netherlands. The next step of Belleisle was to negotiate another treaty between France and Prussia, importing, that the Elector of Bavaria should possess Bohemia, Upper Austria, and the Tyrolese: that the King of Poland should be gratified with Miolin and part of Galicia; and that his Prussian majesty should retain Lower Silesia, with the town of Noss and the county of Glatz. These precautions being taken, the Count de Belleisle repaired to Frankfort in quality of ambassador and plenipotentiary from France, at the imperial diet of election. It was in this city that the French king published a declaration, signifying, that as the King of Great Britain had assembled an army to influence the approaching election of an emperor, his most Christian majesty, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, had ordered some troops to advance towards the Rhine, with a view to maintain the tranquillity of the German body, and secure the freedom of the imperial election.

§ X. In July, the Elector of Bavaria being joined by the French forces under Marschal Broglie, surprised the imperial city of Passau, upon the Danube; and entering Upper Austria, took possession of seventy thousand pounds of Lants, where he received the homage of the states of that country. Understanding that the march of Vienna was very numerous, and that Count Palth had assembled thirty thousand Hungarians in the neighbourhood of this capital, he made no further progress in Austria, but marched into Bohemia, where he was reinforced by a considerable body of Saxons, under the command of Count Rutowski, natural son to the late King of Poland. By this time his Polish majesty had acceded to the treaty of Nymphenburg, and declared war against the Queen of Hungary, on the most frivolous pretences. The Elector of Bavaria advanced to Prague, which was taken in the night by surprise: and achievement in which Murran Count of Saxe, another natural son of the King of Poland, distinguished himself at the head of the French forces. In December the Elector of Bavaria made his public entry into his capital, where he was proclaimed King of Bohemia, and inaugurated with the usual solemnities. But he set out for Frankfort, to be present at the diet of election.

§ XI. At this period the Queen of Hungary saw herself abandoned by all her allies, and seemingly devoted to her enemies. She was not, however, without courage, nor destitute of good officers, and an able minister. She retired to Presburg, and in a pathetic Latin speech to the States, expressed her confidence in the loyalty and valour of her Hungarian subjects. The cœllebility of that kingdom, touched with her presence and distress, assured her, unanimously, that they would sacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. The ban being raised, that brave people crowded to her standard; and the diet expressed their sentiments against her enemy by a public edict, excluding for ever the electoral house of Bavaria from the succession to the crown of Hungary: yet, without the subsidy she received from Great Britain, her forces and their courage and resolute conduct, and vigorous and vigorous interposition of his Britannic majesty. But in a little time after his arrival at Hanover, that sort of sentence seemed to flag even while her Hungarian majesty tottered on the verge of ruin. France resolved to seize this opportunity of crushing the House of Austria. In order to intimidate the Elector of Hanover, Marschal Mallebon was sent with a numerous army into Westphalia; and this expedient proved effectual. A treaty of neutrality was concluded; and the King of Great Britain engaged to vote for the Elector of Bavaria at the ensuing election of the Electors. § XII. As the exarma expressed an inclination to assist this unfortunate princess, the French court resolved to find her employment in another quarter. They had already gained over to their interest Count Gyllenburgh, prime minister of the crown of Sweden, who, by the dispute happening between him and Mr. Burnaby, the British resident at Stockholm, some warm altercation passed: Mr. Burnaby was for the court, and published a memorial in his own vindication; on the other hand, the King of Sweden justified his clerk unto M. d’Argenson, to all the foreign ministers. The King of Great Britain had proposed a subsidy-treaty to Sweden, which, from the influence of French councils, was rejected. The Swedes had no longer numbers to assemble; and they equipped a large squadron of ships, declared war against Russia, upon the most trifling pretences; and the fleet putting to sea, commenced hostilities by blocking up the Russian ports in Livonia. A body of eleven thousand Swedes commanded by General Wrangle, having advanced to Willenwand, were, in August, attacked and defeated by General Lasce, at the head of thirty thousand Russians. Count Lewenau, who commanded the main army of the Swedes, resolved to take vengeance for this disgrace, after the Russian troops had retired into winter-quarters. In December he marched towards Wbourg: but receiving letters from the Prince of Hesse-Hombourg and the Marquis of Tassis, indicating that the French court at Petersburgh, informing him of the surprising revolution which had just happened in Russia, and proposing a suspension of hostilities; he retreated with his army, in order to wait for the concurrence of the courts of Vienna and London, and the Russian armies. At the end of March, the States agreed to a cessation of arms for three months.

§ XIII. The Russians had been for some time discontented with their government. The late exarma was influenced chiefly by German councils, and employed a great number of foreigners in her service. These causes of discontent produced factions and conspiracies; and when they were discovered, the empress treated the authors of them with such severity as increased the general dissatisfaction. Bessarion, who were displeased at the manner in which she had settled the succession. The Prince of Brunswick-Lunenburgh-Bevern, father to the young czar, was not at all agreeable to the Russian nobility, and his consort, the Princess Anne of Mecklenburgh, having assumed the reins of government during her son’s minority, seemed to follow the maxims of her aunt the late exarma. The Russian grandees and generals, therefore, turned their eyes upon the Princess Elizabeth, who was daughter of Peter I., and reigning in the stead of her father. That the French ambassador gladly concurred in a project for deposing a princess who was well affected to the House of Austria. General Lasce approved of the design, which was concerted by the Prince of Brunswick and others, who, in the reign of the Empress Catherine and Peter II., had been generalissimos of the Russian army. The goodwill and concurrence of the troops being secured, two regiments of guards took possession of all the avenues of the imperial palace at Petersburg. The Princess Elizabeth, putting herself at the head of one thousand men, on the fifth day of December entered the winter palace, where the Princess of Mecklenburgh and the infant czar resided. She advanced into the chamber where the princess and her consort lay, and desired them to rise and quit the palace, adding that their persons were safe; and that they could not possibly blame her for asserting her right. At the same time, the Counts Osterman, Greifskirkin, Mengidoff, and Munich, were arrested; their papers and effects were seized, and their persons conveyed to Schlisselbourg, a fortress on the Neva. Early in the morning the senate assembling, declared all that had passed since the reign of Peter II. to be usurpation; and that the imperial dignity belonged of right to the Princess Elizabeth; she was immediately proclaimed Empress of all the Russians, and recognised by the army in Finland. She forthwith published a general act of indemnity; she created the Prince of Hesse-Hombourg, generalissimo of her armies; she restored the Dolgorucky family to their honours and estates; she recalled and rewarded all those who had been banished for her safety and favour. The Duke of Courland, by indulging him with a maintenance more suitable to his rank; she released General Wrangle, Count Wassburgh, and the other Swedish officers, who had been taken at the battle of Willenwand: and the Prince of Orange, who had joined with her consort and children, were sent under a strong guard to Riga, the capital of Livonia.

§ XIV. Amidst these tempests of war and revolution, the States-General of the United Provinces and Finland, regarded their own tranquillity. It was, without, their interest to avoid the dangers and expenses of a war, and to profit by that stagnation of commerce which would necessarily happen among their neighbours that were at open enmity with each other: besides, they were overawed by the declarations of the French monarch on one side; by the power, activity, and pretensions of his Prussian majesty on the other; and they dreaded the prospect of a stadtholder at the head of the army. These and many other sentiments of many Dutch patriots, enforced by others that acted under French influence. But the Prince of Orange numbered among his partisans and adherents many persons of the greatest dignity and stations, who were influenced by the populace, who loudly exclaimed against their governors, and clamoured for a war without ceasing. This national spirit, joined to the remonstrances and requisitions made by the French ambassadors at the courts of Vienna and London, the States to issue orders for an augmentation of their forces; but these were executed so slowly, that neither France nor Prussia had much cause to take umbrage at their preparations. In Italy the King of Sardinia declared for the house of Austria: the republic of Genoa was deeply engaged in the French interest: the Pope, the Venetians, and the dukedom of Tuscany were neutral: the King of Naples resolved to support the claim of his family to the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in Italy, and began to make preparations accordingly. His mother, the Queen of Spain, had formed a plan for erecting these dominions into a monarchy for her second son Don Philip; and a body of fifteen thousand men being embarked at Barcelona, were transported to Oristello, under the convoy of the united squadrons of France and Spain. While Admiral Haddock, with twelve ships of the line, lay at anchor in the bay of Gibraltar, the Spanish fleet passed the straits in the night, and was in the sea of Cadiz in the morning. The British admiral sailing from Gibraltar, fell in with them in a few days, and found both squadrons drawn up in line of battle. As he bore down upon the Spanish fleet, the French fleet began to separate; the French and Spaniards were engaged in a joint expedition, he should be obliged to act in concert with his master’s allies. This interposition prevented an engagement. The combined fleets amounting to double the number of the English squadron, Admiral Haddock was obliged to desist; and proceeded to Port Mahon, leaving the enemy to pursue their voyage without molestation. The people of England were incensed at this transaction, and did not scruple to affirm, that the hands of the British admirals were tied up by the neutrality of Hanover.

§ XV. The court of Madrid seemed to have shaken off that indolence and phlegm which had formerly disgraced the councils of Spain. They no sooner learned the destination of Commodore Anson, who had sailed from Spithead in the course of the preceding year, than they sent Don Pizarro, with a more powerful squadron, upon the same voyage, to defeat his design. He sailed from Spithead at the same time, and actually fell in with one or two ships of the British armament, near the straits of Magellan; but he could not weather a long and furious tempest through which Mr. Anson proceeded into the South sea.
One of the Spanish ships perished at sea: another was wrecked on the coast of Brazil; and Pizzaro bore away for the Rio de la Plata, where he arrived with the three remaining ships, in a shattered condition, after having lost twothirds of his crew by the inhuman exactions of the Spaniards. In consequence of this, the English admirals exerted the same vigilance and activity in Europe.

They were not industrious and successful, that in the beginning of this year they had taken, since the commence ment of the war, four hundred vessels, or about eleven million dollars. They consisted of about one hundred ships of war, manned by fifty-four thousand sailors.

§ XVI. The general discontent of the people had a ma nifest tendency to subvert the constituted powers of the new parliament, which produced one of the most violent contests between the two parties, which had happened since the revolution. All the adherents of the Prince of Wales continued to be the people, who endeavoured to support the minister; and the Duke of Argyile exerted himself successfully among the shires and boroughs of Scotland, that the partisans of the ministry could not secure six members out of the whole number returned from North Britain. They were, however, much more fortunate in the election of the sixteen peers, who were chosen literally according to the list transmitted from court. Instructions were delivered by the constitutents to a great number of members returned for cities and counties, exhorting and requiring them to oppose a standing army in time of peace; to vote for the mitigation of excise laws, for the repeal of septennial parliaments; and for the limitation of placemen in the House of Commons. They, likewise, insisted upon their examining into the particulars of the public expense, and endeavouring to redress the grievances of the nation.

Obstinate struggles were maintained in all parts of the united kingdom with uncommon ardour and perseverance; and the ideas of a coalition prevailed that, notwithstanding the whole weight of ministerial influence, the country interest seemed to preponderate in the new parliament.

§ XVII. The king returned to England in the middle of October; and on the first day of December the session was opened. Mr. Onslow being re-elected speaker was approved of by his majesty, who spoke in the usual style to both Houses. He observed, that the former parliament had formed the strongest resolution in favour of the Queen of Hungary, for the maintenance of the pragmatic sanction; for the preservation of the balance of power, and the peace and liberties of Europe; and that if the other powers which were under the like engagements with him had answered the just expectations so solemnly given, the support of the common cause would have been attended with less difficulty. He said, he had endeavoured, by the most proper and early applications, to induce other powers which were united with him by the ties of common interest to concert such measures as so important and critical a conjuncture required: that where an accommodation seemed necessary, he had laboured to reconcile princes whose unions would have been the most effectual means to prevent the mischief which had happened, and the best security for the interest and safety of the whole. He owned his endeavours had not hitherto produced the desired effect; though when necessity should require it, he could expect the British nation would give a more favourable turn to the councils of other nations. He represented the necessity of putting the kingdom in such a posture of defence, as would enable him to repel the high and grievous importunities of the Courts of Europe, and defeat any attempts that should be made against him and his dominions; and he recommended unanimity, vigour, and despatch. The House of Commons having appointed several committees, the speaker reported the king's speech; and Mr. Herbert moved for an address, concluding an approach to the council of ministers by which the war had been prosecuted. The motion being seconded by Mr. Trevor, Lord Noel Sumner stood up and moved, that the House would in their address desire his majesty not to engage those kingdoms in a war for the preservation of his dominions, and that, as expected by that incorruptible patriot, Mr. Shippen, who declared he was neither ashamed nor afraid to affirm, that thirty years had made no change in any of his political opinions. He added, that in the House of Lords at the time he had verified the predictions he had formerly uttered; and that he had seen his conjectures ripened into knowledge.

"If my country (said he) has been so unfortunate as once more to commit her interest to men who propose to themselves no advantage from their trust but that of selling it, I may, perhaps, fall once more under censure for declaring my opinion, and be once more treated as a criminal, for asserting what they who punish me cannot deny; for maintaining that Hanoverian maxims are inconsistent with the happiness of this nation; and for preserving the caution so strongly inculcated by those patriots who framed the act of settlement, and conferred upon the present royal family the title of successors to the crown of England.

He particularly observed that the ministry had acted in diametrical opposition to that necessary constitution: and he insisted on the necessity of taking some step to remove the apprehensions of the people, who had been compelled to think the ministry in danger of being sacrificed to the security of foreign dominions. Mr. Gibbon, who spoke on the same side of the question, expatiated upon the absurdity of returning thanks for the prosecution of a war which had been egregiously mismanaged. "What I (said he) are our thanks to be solemnly returned for defeats, disgrace, and losses, the ruin of our merchants, the imprisonment of our sailors, idle shows of armaments, and useless expenses?

Sir Robert Walpole having made a short speech in defence of the first motion for an address, was answered by Mr. Pulteney, who seemed to be animated with a double proportion of patriotism: he asserted, that from a review of that minister's conduct since the beginning of the dispute with Spain, it would appear that he had been guilty not only of single errors, but of deliberate treachery: that he had always cooperated with the enemies of his country, and sacrificed to his private interest the happiness and honour of the country, and the interest of the British nation. He particularly adverted to the minister's conduct against which he had so often declared; and being transported by an over-heated imagination, accused him of personal attachment and affection to the enemies of the kingdom. A charge which was doubled by attacks on his aggregated animosity, and served only to invalidate the other articles of impeachment that were much better founded. His objections were overruled; and the address, as at first proposed, was presented to his majesty. of preventing riots, sent for a military force to overawe the election. A petition presented by the electors of Westminster was taken into consideration by the House; and the vote was declared void by a majority of four voices. The high bailiffs of the city were ordered to march, and the three justices who signed the letter, in consequence of which they acted, were reprimanded on their knees at the bar of the House.

§ XV. The country party maintained the advantage they had gained in deciding upon several other contested elections; and Sir Robert Walpole tottered on the brink of ruin. He knew that the majority of a single vote would put him out of the contest. He knew that the young Monmouth was determined to try ever the motion be made; and he saw that his safety could be effected by no other expedient but that of dividing the opposition. Towards the accomplishment of this purpose he employed all his credit and dexterity. His emissaries did not fail to tamper with those members of the opposite party who were the most likely to be converted by their arguments. A message was sent by the Bishop of Oxford to the Prince of Wales, importuning, that if his royal highness would write a letter of condolence to the king, he and all his counsellors should be taken into favour; that fifty thousand pounds should be added to his revenue; four times that sum be disbursed immediately; and the presentment of his éléphant vision be made in due time for all his followers. The prince declined this proposal. He declared that he would accept no such conditions, while Sir Robert Walpole continued to direct the public affairs; that he looked upon his dispute with his majesty as his misfortune and his misfortune of the people; as the author of the national grievances both at home and abroad; and as the sole cause of that contempt which Great Britain had incurred in all the courts of Europe. His royal highness was now chief of this formidable party, revered by the whole nation—a party which had gained the ascendancy in the House of Commons; which professed to act upon the principles of public virtue; which declared an odious ministration a sacriUce due to an injured people; and declared that no temptation could shake their virtue, that no art could dissolve the cement by which they were united. Sir Robert Walpole, though repulsed in this attempt upon the Prince of Wales, was more successful in his other endeavours. He resolved to try his strength once more in the House of Commons, in another disputed election; and had the mortification to see the majority reversed to sixteen voices. He declared he had never more set in that House; and next day, which was the third of February, the king adjourned both Houses of parliament to the eighteenth day of the same month. In this interim, Sir Robert Walpole was created Earl of Orford, and received all his honours.

§ XX. At no time of his life did he acquit himself with such prudential policy as he now displayed. He found means to separate the parts that composed the opposition, and to transfer the popular odium from himself to those who had professed themselves his keenest adversaries. The country party consisted of the Tories, reinforced by discontented whigs, who had either been disappointed in their own ambitious views, or felt for the distresses of their country, occasioned by a weak and worthless administration. The old patriots, and the whigs whom they had joined, acted upon very different, and, indeed, upon opposite principles of government; and therefore they were united only by the tenderness of attachment. A coalition was projected between the discontented whigs and those of the same denomination who acted in the ministry. Some were gratified with titles and offices; and all were assured, that in the management of affairs a new system would be adopted, according to the plan they themselves should propose. The court required nothing of them, but that the Earl of Orford should escape with impunity. His place of chancellor of the exchequer was bestowed upon Mr. Sandys, who was appointed a lord. The Earl of Wilmington succeeded him as first commissioner of that board. Lord Harrington being dignified with the title of earl, was declared president of the council. A committee was appointed to select the new secretary of state. The Duke of Argyile was made master-general of the ordnance, colonell of his majesty's royal regiment of horse guards, field-marshal and commander-in-chief of all the forces in South Britain; but, finding himself disappointed in his expectations of the coalition, he, in less than a month, resigned all these offices. Marquis of Tweedale was appointed secretary of state for Scotland, a post which had been long suppressed; Mr. Pulteney was sworn of the privy council, and afterwards created Earl of Bath. The Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham was preferred to the head of the admiralty, in the room of Sir Charles Wager; and, after the resignation of the Duke of Argyile, the Earl of Stair was appointed field-marshal of all his majesty's forces, as well as ambassador extraordinary to the court of Madrid. The Duke of Newcastle, the Prince of Wales, attended by a numerous retinue of his adherents, waited on his majesty, who received him graciously, and ordered his guards to be restored. Lord Carteret and Mr. Sandys were the first who embraced the offers of the court, without the consent or privy of any other leaders in the opposition, except that of Mr. Pulteney; but they declared to their friends, they would still proceed upon patriot principles; that they would concur in promoting an inquiry into past measures; and in enacting necessary laws to secure the constitution from the practices of corruption. These professions were believed, not only by their old conditors in the House of Commons, but also by those who expected some share of the king and the Prince of Wales, together with the change in the ministry, were celebrated with public rejoicings all over the kingdom; and immediately after the adjournment nothing but concord appeared in the House of Commons. § XXI. Pulteney maintained that the king, instead of a change of men and measures, saw the old ministry strengthened by this coalition. The coalition was now being armed with redoubled influence. They branded the new converts as apostates and betrayers of their country; and in the transport of their indignation, they entirely overlooked the old object of their resentment. That a nobleman of plant principles, narrow fortune, and unabounded ambition, should forsake his party for the blackmail of affluence, power, and authority, will not appear strange to any person acquainted with the human heart; but the sensible part of mankind always reflect with a blush upon the conduct of a man, who seeing himself idolized by his fellow citizens as the first and firmest patriot in the kingdom, as one of the most shining ornaments of his country, could give up his interest and services to the deputation of mankind, for the wretched consideration of an empty title, without office, influence, or the least substantial appendage. One cannot, without an emotion of grief, contemplate such an instance of infatuation—One cannot but lament, that such glory should have been so weakly forestalled; that such talents should have been lost to the cause of liberty and virtue. Doubtless he flavoured himself with the hope of one day directing the councils of his sovereign; but this was never accomplished, and he remained a solitary monument of blasted ambition. Before the change in the ministry, Mr. Pulteney moved that the several papers relating to the conduct of the war, which had been laid before the House, should be communi- cated to a select committee, who should examine strictly into the particular, and make a report to the House of their remarks and objections. The motion introduced a debate; but upon a division, was rejected by a majority of three voices. Petitions having been presented against the conduct of the House of Commons by the Lords of London, Bristol, Liverpool, Glasgow, and almost all the trading towns in the kingdom, complaining of the losses which had sustained by the bad conduct of the war, the House was not called to the treasury; and the whole of these remonstrances. The articles of the London petition were explained by Mr. Glover, an eminent merchant of that city. Six days were spent in perusing papers and examining with the utmost care the several secretaries of the House and the treasurers of the state.
posed to the insults and rapine of the Spaniards, not by impatience or accident, but by one uniform and continued design. This inquiry being resumed after the adjournment, copies of instructions to admirals and captains of crossing ships were laid before the House; the Commons passed two resolutions, upon which a bill was prepared for the better protecting and securing the trade and navigation of the kingdom. It made its way through the lower House; but it had almost reached, and had almost passed, the Senate, when it was referred, and sent up to the Peers, where it was again rejected; Lord Carteret voting against that very measure which he had so lately endeavoured to promote. On the nineteenth day of March, a bill for raising money for appointing a committee to inquire into the conduct of affairs, for the last twenty years; he was seconded by Sir John St.
Aubyn, and supported by Mr. Velters Cornwall, Mr.
Philips, Mr. W. Pinf, and Lord Percival, the new member for Westminster, who had already aggrandized himself by its eloquence and capacity. The motion was opposed by Sir Charles Wager, Mr. Pelham, and Mr. Henry Fox, surveyor-general to his majesty's works, and brother to Lord Ilchester. Though the opposition was faint and fravolus, the proposal was rejected by a majority of two voices. Lord Limerick not yet discouraged, made a motion, on the twenty-third day of March, for an inquiry into the conduct of the Lords during the last year of his administration; and after a sharp debate, it was car-rried in the affirmative, the House resolved to choose a secret committee by ballot; and in the mean time presented their addresses to the king, assuring him of their fidelity, zeal, and affection.
§ XXII. Sir Robert Godschall having moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the act for septennial parliaments, he was seconded by Sir John Barnard; but warmly op-oposed by Mr. Pelham. The resolution passed in the negative.
The committee of secrecy being chosen, began to examine evidence, and Mr. Paxton, sol-citor to the treasury, refusing to answer such questions as were put to him, was committed to the commis-tee, complained to the House of his obscurity. He was first taken into custody; and still persisting in his refusal, committed to Newgate. Then his lordship moved, that leave should be given to bring in a bill for condemning evidence against the Earl of Orford: and it was actually prepared by a decision of the majority. In the House of Lords it was vigorously opposed by Lord Carteret, and as strangely supported by the Duke of Argyle: but fell upon the defeat of the government. Mr. Lord members in the House of Commons who hopefully wished that the inquiry might be prosecuted, were extremely incensed at the fate of this bill. A committee was appointed to inquire into the conduct of the house of Lords during this period being read, Lord Strange, son of the Earl of Derby, moved for a resolution, that the lords refusing to concur with the Commons of Great Britain, in an indemnification necessary to the effectual carrying on of the inquiry, now dis-pending in parliament, is an obstruction to justice, and may prove fatal to the liberties of this nation."—This motion, which was seconded by Lord Quarendon, son of the Earl of Lichfield, gave rise to a warm debate; and Mr.
Sandys declined against it, as a step that would bring on an immediate dissolution of the present form of government. It is really amazing to see what effrontery some men can shift their maxims, and openly contradict the sentiments of their predecessors. Mr. Lord
A. D. 1744.
Sandys did not pass uncensured: he sustained some severe sarcasms on his apostasy, from Sir John Hynde Cotton, who refuted all his objections: nevertheless, the motion passed in the negative. Notwithstanding this great obstruction, purposely thrown in the way of the inquiry, the secret committee discovered many flagrant instances of fraud and corruption in the accounts of the French reparation of the sumswards each other, to many others; it appeared that he had granted fraudulent contracts for paying the troops in the West Indies: that he had employed iniquitous arts to influence elections: that for secret reasons, during the three years, he had touched one million four hundred fifty thousand pounds of the public money: that above fifty thousand pounds of this sum had been paid to authors and printers of newspapers and political tracts written in defence of the ministry: that on the very day which preceded his resignation, he had signed orders on the civil list for ervant above thirty thousand pounds: but as the cash remaining in the exchequer did not much exceed the amount of the pounds, he had raised the remaining part of the thirty thousand by pawning the orders to a banker. The committee proceeded to make further progress in their scrutiny, and appointed a third report; but they were interrupted by the prorogation of parliament.
§ XXIII. The ministry finding it necessary to take some step for concluding the affection of the people, gave up the idea of a formal address of thanks for the pounds, and the session, and voted a hundred thousand to the Queen of Hungary. The expense of the yearamounted to near six millions, raised by the land tax at four shilings in the pound, by the malt tax, by one million from the sinking fund, by annuities granted upon it for eight hundred thousand pounds, and a loan of one million six hundred thousand pounds to the bank. In consequence, John Lord Gower was appointed keeper of his majesty's privy seal; Allen Lord Bathurst was made captain of the land of pensioners; and on the fifteenth day of the month, Mr. Pulteney took the seat in the House of Lords at Bath. The king closed the session in the usual way, after having given them to understand, that a treaty of peace was concluded between the Queen of Hungary and the King of Prussia, under his mediation, and that the late successes of the Austrian nation was great measure owing to the generous assistance afforded by the British nation.
§ XXIV. By this time great changes had happened in the affairs of the continent. The Elector of Bavaria was at length brought to the throne of his ancestors, and, crowned by the name of Charles VII. on the twelfth day of February. Thither the imperial diet was removed from Ratisbon; they confirmed his election, and indulged him with a subsidy of fifty Homan months, amounting to about two hundred thousand pounds sterling. In the meantime, the Austrian General Khevenhuller ravaged his electorate, and made himself master of Munich, the capital of Bavaria; he likewise laid part of the palatinate under subsidies, and subdued the Germans and part of the body of his troops to reinforce the imperial army. In March, Count Sixe, with a detachment of French and Bavarians, reduced Egm; and the Austrians were obliged to retreat, though they attempted this by force. Khevenhuller took post in the neighbourhood of Passau, and detached General Berclau to Dillingen on the Iser, to observe the motions of the enemy, who were now become extremely formidable. In May, a detachment of French and Bavarians advanced to the castle of Hilkerbergh on the Danube, with a view to take possession of a bridge over the river: the Austrian garrison immediately marched out to give them battle, and a severe action ensued, in which the imperialists were defeated.
§ XXV. In the beginning of the year the Queen of Hungary had assembled two considerable armies in Moravia and Bohemia. Prince Charles of Lorraine, at the head of the fifty thousand men under command of his father, Mr.
Prussians, who thought proper to retire with precipitation from Moravia, which they had invaded. Then the prince took the route to Bohemia; and Mareschal Broglie, who commanded the French forces in that country, must have fallen a sacrifice, had not the King of Prussia received a strong reinforcement, and entered that kingdom before his ey could be attacked. The two armies advanced to meet on the third of June, near the town of Stettin, on battle at Czawal, where the Austrians at first gained a manifest advantage, and penetrated as far as the Prussian baggage: then the irregulars began to plunder so eagerly, that they neglected every other consideration. The Prusian infantry too in a great measure to fly; but the battle was renewed, and after a very obstinate contest, the victory was snatched out of the lands of the Austrians, who were obliged to retire, with the loss of five thousand men killed, and twelve hundred taken by the enemy. The Prussians paid dear for the honour of remaining on the field of battle; and it is the opinion of this country, that the King is still to have conceived a disgust to the war. When the Austrian made such progress in the beginning of the engagement, he rode off with great expedition, until he was recalled by a message from his general, the Count de Schrattenbach, who implored that he would not to give a defeat. Immediately after this battle, he discovered an inclusion to accommodate all differences with the Queen of Hungary. The Earl of Harrington, ambassador from the Court of Great Britain, who accompanied the Prussian army, and was vested with full powers by her Hungarian majesty, did not fail to cultivate this favourable disposition; and on the first day of June, a treaty of peace between the two powers was concluded at Breslia. The Queen ceded to his Prussian Majesty the Upper and Lower Silesia, with the country of Glatz in Bohemia; and he charged himself with the payment of the sum lent by the merchants of London to the late emperor, on the Silesian revenues. He likewise engaged to observe a strict neutrality during the war, and to withdraw his forces from Bohemia in fifteen days after the ratification of the treaty, in which were comprehended the King of Great Britain, Elector of Hanover, the Prince of Orange, Prince of the Archduchy of Chassol, the House of Wurtemberg, and the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, on certain conditions, which were accepted.

§ XXVI. The King of Prussia recalled his troops; while M. de Broglie continued at Glatz in command of the Austrian armies in that kingdom, and the Count de Belleisle, abandoned their magazines and baggage, and retired with precipitation under the cannon of Prague. They entrenched their advantages in an advantageous situation: and Prince Charles, having joined by the other body of Austrians, under Prince Lobkowitz, encamped in sight of them, on the hills of Grunawitz. The Grand Duke of Tuscany arrived in the Austrian army, of which he took the command; and the French were at first perplexed, being ignorant of the invasion of all the other places they possessed in Bohemia, provided they might be allowed to march off with their arms, artillery, and baggage. The proposal was rejected, and Prague invaded on all sides about the end of July. Though the operations of the siege were carried on in an awkward and slovenly manner, the place was so effectually blockaded, that famine must have compelled the French to surrender at discretion, had not very extraordinary efforts been made for its relief. The emperor had made advances to the Queen of Hungary. He promised that the French forces should quit Bohemia, and evacuate the empire; and he offered to renounce all pretensions to the kingdom of Bohemia; and further, that the Austrian troops should leave Prague; but these conditions were declined by the court of Vienna. The King of France was no sooner apprized of the condition to which the Generals Broglio and Belleisle were reduced, than he sent orders to Marshal Mariebois, who commanded his army on the Rhine, to march to their relief. His troops were immediately put in motion: and when they reached Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, were joined by the French and imperialists from Bavaria. Prince Charles of Lorraine having received intelligence of their junction and design, left eighteen thousand men to maintain the blockade of Prague, under the command of General Festitics, while he himself, with the rest of his army, entered Austria. The emperor had made disparaging propositions to the Queen of Hungary. Then, he was joined by Count Khevenhuller, who from Bavaria had followed the enemy, now commanded by Count Seek-dorff, and the Count de Saxe. Seekendorff, however, was sent back to Bavaria, while Marshal Mariebois enter-ted Bohemia on the twenty-fifth day of September. But he marched with such precaution, that Prince Charles could not bring him to go engagement. Meanwhile Festitics was reinforced with the Bohemian army, and joined the blockade of Prague; and the French generals being now at liberty, took post at Leutmaritz. Maillebois advanced as far as Kadan: but seeing the Austrians possessed of all the passes of the mountains, he marched back to the palatinate, and was ignominiously harrowed in his retreat by Prince Charles, who had left a strong body with Prince Lobkowitz, to watch the motions of Belleisle and Broglio.

§ XXVII. These generals seeing themselves surrounded on all hands, returned to Prague, from whence Broglio made his escape in the habit of a courier, and was sent to England, for the King did not wish to have him disgraced. Prince Lobkowitz, who now directed the blockade of Prague, had so effectually cut off all communication between that place and the adjacent country, that in a little time the French troops were reduced to great extremities, and they thought it no longer necessary to the want of provision. They were already reduced to the nescessity of eating horse-flesh, and unclean animals: and they had no other prospect but that of perishing by famine or war. The Emperor arranged, in sum in this case, an expedition, which was actually put in execution. Having taken some artful preparations to deceive the enemy, he, in the middle of December, departed from Prague at midnight, with about fourteen thousand men, thirty pieces of artillery, and some of the principal citizens as hostages for the safety of nine hundred soldiers whom he had left in garrison.
Notwithstanding the difficulties he must have encountered at that season of the year, in a broken and unfrequented road, he purposely chose to march with such expedition, that he had gained the passes of the mountains, before he was overtaken by the horse and hussars of Prince Lobkowitz. The fatigue and hardships which the miserable soldiers and officers were put to, were equalled by the perils in the snow, and many hundreds, fainting with weakness, cold, and hunger, were left to the mercy of the Austrian irregulars, consisting of the most barbarous people on the frontier; the French encamped in the night, and were tortured with the lisp-gout, belied with surprising reso-duction and activity. He caused himself to be carried in a litter to every place where he thought his presence was necessary, and made such dispositions, that the pursuers never could make an impression upon the body of his troops: but all his artillery, baggage, and even his own equipage, fell to the bands of the enemy. On the twenty-ninth day of December, he arrived at Erfurt, from whence he proceeded to Alzenau, and, thence to Hanover, where he was presented to Versailles, he met with a very cordial reception, notwithstanding the gallant exploit which he had performed.
After his escape, Prince Lobkowitz returned to Prague, and the small garrison which Belleisle had left in that place surrendered upon honourable terms; so that this capital reverted to the house of Austria.

§ XXVIII. The King of Great Britain resolving to do a powerful division in the Netherlands, laid in the month of January, and ordered all the forces in the province of Brabant to be embarked for that country: but, as this step was taken without any previous concert with the States-general, the Earl of Stair, destined to the command of the forces in Flanders, was to be reinforced by three thousand men, extraordinary and plenipotentiary to his high m might-nesses, in order to persuade them to co-operate vigorously in the plan which his Britannic majesty had formed; a plan, by which Great Britain was engaged as a principal in a foreign dispute, and entailed upon herself the whole burden of an expensive war, with ruin and disgrace.
England, from being the umpire, was now become a party, in all continental quarrels; and instead of trimming the balance of Europe, lavished away her blood and treasure in supporting the interest and allies of a puny electorate in the north of Germany. The King of Prussia had been at variance with the Elector of Hanover. The duchy of Mecklenburg, which he had offered to England, was now annexed to his Prussian majesty is said to have had other more provoking causes of complaint, which, however, he did not think proper to divulge. The King of Great Britain found it convenient to accommodate these differences.
In the course of this summer, the two powers concluded a convention, in consequence of which the troops of Hanover evacuated Mecklenburgh, and three regiments of Brandenburg, which had been quartered at several places, were mortgaged to the King of Prussia. The Elector of Hanover being now secured from danger, sixteen thousand troops of that country, together with the six thousand auxiliary Hessians, began their march for the Netherlands; and about the middle of October arrived in the place of Brussels, where they encamped. The Earl of Stair repaired to Ghent, where the British forces were quartered: a body of Austrians was assembled; and though the season was far advanced, he seemed determined upon, some expedition; but all of a sudden the troops were sent into winter-quarters. The Austrians retired to Luizen- burg and Hanover. The French, with an army placed in Flamborough and the Hanoverians marched into the county of Liege, without paying any regard to the bishop's protestation.

§ XXIX. The States-General had made a considerable augmentation of their forces by the subsidies of the German States, and by offering one to the Poles. The English, and particularly the Duke of York, who was advanced with the Spanish army assembled at Rimini, under the Duke de Montemar: and being joined by the Neapolitan forces, amounted to sixty thousand men, furnished with a large train of artillery. About this period of May, they entered Venetia; and Bolognese: then the King of Sardinia declaring against them, joined the Austrian army commanded by Count Traun; marched into the duchy of Parma; and understanding that the Duke of Modena had engaged in a treaty with the Spaniards, despatched that prince of his dominions. The Duke de Montemar, seeing his army diminished by sickness and desertion, retreated to the kingdom of Naples, and was followed by the King of Sar- dinia, as far as Rimini.

§ XXX. Here he received intelligence, that Don Philip, third son of his catholic majesty, had made an irruption into Savoy with another army of Spaniards, and already taken the fort of Turin. The King de Sardina, forthwith began his march for Piedmont. Don Philip abandoned Savoy at his approach, and retreated into Dauphiné, took post under the cannon of Fort Barresaux. The King pursued him thither, and both armies remained in sight of each other, without their making any movement, as her predecessor to assist the house of Austria. She re- 4 mitted a considerable sum of money to the Queen of Hungary; and at that same time congratulated the Elec- tor of Bavaria on his elevation to the imperial throne. The ceremony of her coronation was performed in May, with great solemnity, at Moscow: and in November she declared her nephew, the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp, her successor, by the title of Grand Prince of all the Russians. The cessation of arms between the two powers, General Lascu- reytted Fredericksmi, and obliged the Swedish army, com- manding by Count Lewenhaupt, to retire before him, from one place to another, until at length they were quite surrounded near Helmuzor. In this emergency, the Swedish general submitted to a capitulation, by which his infantry were transported by sea to Sweden; his cavalry marched by land to Abo; and his artillery and magazines remained upon the banks of the Russian. The King of Sweden being of advanced age, the diet assembled in order to settle the succession; and the Duke of Holstein- Gottorp, as grandson to the eldest sister to Charles XI, was declared next heir to the crown. A courier was im- mediately despatched to Moscow, to inform Peter of this determination of the diet; and this message was fol- lowed by a deputation; but when they understood that he had embraced the religion of the Greek church, and been acknowledged successor to the throne of Russia, they an- nulled his election for Sweden, and resolved that the suc- cession should not be re-established, until a peace should be concluded with the czarina. Conferences were opened at Abo for this purpose. In the meantime, the events of the war had been so long unfortunate for Sweden, that it was absolutely necessary to appease the indignation of the people with some sacrifice. The Generals Lewenhaupt and Bodenbrock were tried by a court-martial for miscon- duct: being found guilty and condemned to death, they applied to the diet, by which the sentence was confirmed. The term of the subsidy treaty between Great Britain and Denmark expiring, his Danish majesty refused to renew it; nor would he accede to the peace of Brentau. On the other hand, he became subsidiary to France, with which also he concluded a new treaty of commerce.

§ XXX. The court of Versailles were now heartily tired of continuing the war in Germany, and had actually made economic terms of peace to the Emperor of Hungry, by whom they were rejected. Thus repulsed, they redoubled their preparations; and endeavoured by advan- tageous offers, to detach the King of Sardinia from the Emperor. By this means the Spanish army was able to march through Lombardy to Mantua, where they had been closed for his winter station. Before this period he had landed some men at St. Remo, in the territories of Genoa, and destroyed the magazines that were erected for the use of the Spanish army. He had likewise ordered two of his squadrons to lie at anchor in the port of Ajacon, in the island of Corsica;

§ XXXII. In the course of this year Admiral Vernon and eighty sail of the line, with considerable forces, in the West Indies. They lay in January received a reinforcement from England, and planned a new expedition, in concert with the governor of Jamaica, who accompanied them in the enterprise. They design to disembark the troops at Porto Bello, and march across the isthmus of Darien, to attack the rich town of Panama. They sailed from Jamaica on the ninth day of March, and on the twenty-eighth arrived at Porto Bello. There they held a council of war to consider the terms on which the English troops were to be landed; and several transports not yet arrived, the intended expedition was become impracticable. In pursuance of this determination the armament immediately returned to Jamaica, exhibiting a ridiculous spectacle of folly and irresolution. In August, a ship of war was sent from thence, with about three hundred soldiers, to the small island of rattan, in the bay of Honduras, of which they took possession. In September, Vernon and Wentworth received orders to return to England with such troops as remained alive: these did not amount to a tenth part of the number which had been sent abroad in that inglorious service. The inferior officers fell ignobly into a great deal of impatience, without any signification of singling their courage, and the commanders lived to feel the scorn and reproach of their country. In the month of June the new colony of Georgia was invaded by an armament of forty sail, commanded by Don Manuel de Monga, governor of that fortress. It consisted of six-and-thirty ships, from which four thousand men were landed at St. Simons'; and began their march for Frederica. General Oglethorpe, with a handful of men, took such wise precautions for opposing their progress, and harassed them in their march with such activity and resolution, that after two of their detachments had been defeated, they retired to their ships, and totally abandoned the enterprise.

§ XXXIII. In England the merchants still complained that their commerce was not properly protected, and the people clamoured against the conduct of the war. They said, their burthens were increased to maintain quarrels with which they had no concern; to defray the enormous expense of inactive fleets and pacific armies. Lord C had by this time intimated himself into the confidence of his sovereign, and engrossed the whole direction of public affairs. The war with Spain was now become a secondary measure of the nation's consideration, and neglected accordingly; while the chief attention of the new minister was turned upon the affairs of the continent. The dispute with Spain concerned Britain only. The interests of Hanover were connected with that of Spain. In order to avoid this evil, he secured the wishes of his master, and opened a more ample field for his own ambition. He had studied the policy of the continent with peculiar eagerness. This was the favourite subject of his reflection, upon which he thought and spoke with a degree of enthusiasm. The intolerable taxes, the poverty, the ruined commerce of his country, the iniquity of standing armies, votes of credit, and foreign connexions, upon which he had so often expatiated, were now forgotten, or overlooked. He saw nothing but glory, conquest, or acquired dominion. He set the power of France at defiance; and as if Great Britain had felt no distress, but deemed with treachery which she could not so easily employ, he proposed for his own gain with a rash and desperate hand, in purchasing beggarly allies, and maintaining mercenary armies. The Earl of Stair had arrived in England towards the end of August, and conferred with his majesty. A privy council was summoned; and in a few days that nobleman returned to Holland.

Lord Carteret was sent with a commission to the Hague in September; and when he returned, the barony of the king of Denmark, which had been sold to the Duke of Cumberland, was ordered to be brought on shore. The parliament met on the sixteenth day of November, when his majesty told them, that he had augmented the British forces in the Low Countries with sixteen thousand Hanoverians and the Hessian auxiliaries, in order to form such a force, in conjunction with the Austrian troops, as might be sufficient for the occasion. He extolled the magnanimity and fortitude of the Queen of Hungary, as well as the resolute conduct of the King of Saxony, and that prince's strict adherence to his engagements, through all his reverses, his conduct during the campaign. He mentioned the requisition made by Sweden, of his good offices for procuring a peace between that nation and Russia; the defensive alliances which he had concluded with the emperor of Germany, the King of Prussia, which could not have been expected, if Great Britain had not manifested a seasonable spirit and vigour, in defence and assistance of her ancient allies, and in maintaining the liberties of Europe. He said, the honour and interest of his crown and kingdoms, the success of the war with Spain, the re-establishment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe, would greatly depend on the prudence and vigour of their resolutions. The Marquis of Tweedale moved for an address of thanks, which was proposed by the Earl of Chesterfield, for the reason so often urged on the same occasion; but supported by Lord C. on his new adopted maxims, with those specious arguments which he had adopted at the commencement of his administration, without suspicion and assurance. The motion was agreed to, and the address presented to his majesty. About this period a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee between his majesty and the King of Prussia was signed at Westminster. In the House of Commons, Mr. Stanhope, supporting the Earl of Northumberland's motion for reviving the place-ball; but it was opposed by a great number of members who had formerly been strenuous advocates for this measure, and rejected upon a division. This was also the fate of a motion made to renew the inquiry into the conduct of Robert Earl of Orford. As many strong presumptions of guilt had appeared against him in the reports of the secret committee, the nation had reason to expect that this proposition would be embraced by a great majority; but several members, who in the preceding session had been loud in their demands of justice, now shamefully contributed their talents and interest in stifling the inquiry.

§ XXXIV. When the House of Lords took into consideration the several estimates of the expense occasioned by the forces in the pay of Great Britain, Earl Stanhope, at the close of an elegant speech, moved for an address, to beseech his majesty to consider that the burthens of his people, loaded already with such numerous and heavy taxes, such large and growing debts, and greater annual expenses than the nation at any time before had ever sustained, he would exonerate his subjects from the charge of oppressing them, if they were taken into the service last year, without the advice or consent of parliament. The motion was supported by the Earl of Sandwich, who took occasion to speak with great contempt of Hanover, and, in mentioning the royal family, seemed to forget that decorum which the subject required. He had, indeed, reason to talk with asperity on the contract by which the Hanoverians had been taken into the pay of Great Britain. Levi-national was charged to the account, though they were engaged for one year only, and though not a single regiment had been raised on this occasion: they had been levied for the security of the electorate; and it could have only advantaged his majesty and nation had he been engaged in the affairs of the continent. The Duke of Bedford enlarged upon the same subject. He said it had been suspected, or was the suspicion without foundation, that the measures of the English ministry had long been regulated by the interest of his majesty's subjects; and that these had been long considered as a gulf into which the treasures of Great Britain had been thrown: that the state of Hanover had been changed, without any visible cause, since the accession of the crown of Hanover to the crown of England: influence had begun to wanton in their towns, and gold to glitter in their cottages, without the discovery of mines, or the increase of their commerce; and new dominions had been purchased, of which the value was never paid from the revenues of Hanover. The motion was hunted down by the new minister, the patriot Lord Bathurst, who, though his principles were declared, that he considered it as an act of cowardice and meanness, to fall passively down the stream of popularity, to suffer his reason and integrity to be overborne by the noise of vulgar clamours, which had been raised against the new minister and government, of sedition, seditious speeches, seditious meetings, seditious resolutions, fallacious reasons, and partial representations.

In the month of September the Tilbury ship of war, of sixty guns, was accidentally set on fire, and destroyed, observed, in which occasion, out of sixteen hundred and twenty-seven men perished, the recollection of Captain Horn, of the Defiance, who happened to be on the same cruise.

This is the very language which Sir Robert Walpole had often used against Mr. Pitt soon after the year 1714. The present minister pleaded the cause of Hanover, and insisted upon the necessity of a land war against France, with all the vehemence of declamation. Their suggestions were answered; their conduct was severely stigmatized by the Earl of Chesterfield, who observed, that the assembling an army in Flanders, without the concurrence of the States-general, or any other power engaged by treaty, or bound by interest, to support the Queen of Hanover, was a rash and ridiculous project: the taking sixteen thousand Hanoverians into British pay, without consulting the parliament, seemed highly derogatory to the rights and dignity of the great council of the nation, and a very dangerous precedent. Their measures granted to the courts of civil and criminal justice employed against the emperor, whom they had already recognised: that the arms and wealth of Britain alone were altogether insufficient to raise the house of Austria to such importance as that the assembling an army in Flanders would engage the nation as principals in an expensive and ruinous war, with a power which it ought not to provoke, and could not pretend to withstand in that manner: that while Great Britain exhaled herself almost to ruin, in pursuance of schemes founded on engagements to the Queen of Hanover, the Electorate of Hanover, though under the same engagements, and governed by the same prince, did not appear to contribute any thing as an ally to her assistance, but was paid by Great Britain for all the forces it had sent into the field, at a very exorbitant price: that nothing could be more absurd and impious than to hire these mercenaries, while a numerous army lay inactive at home, and the nation groaned under such intolerable burthens. "It may be proper (added he) to repeat what may be forgotten in the multitude of other objects, that this nation, after having exalted the Elector of Hanover from a state of obscurity to the highest dignity among its adversaries, had engaged that elector to fight their own cause: to hire them at a rate which was never demanded before; and to pay levy-money for them, though it is known to all Europe that they were not engaged in the war against France, and that the ministry joined in the opposition to Earl Stanhope's rotation, which was rejected by the majority. Then the Earl of Scarborough moved for an address, to approve of the measures which had been taken on the continent; and this was likewise carried by dint of numbers. It was not however a very eligible victory: what they gained in parliament they lost with the people. The new ministers became more odious than their predecessors; and the people began to think public virtue was an empty name.

§ XXXVI. But the most severe opposition they underwent, was in their endeavours to support a bill which they had concerted, and which had passed through the House of Commons with great precipitation: it repealed certain duties on spirituous liquors and licences for retailing the liquors; and imposed others at an easy rate. When those severe duties, amounting almost to a prohibition, were imposed, the populace of London rushed hunk into the most brutal degeneracy, by drinking to excess the pernicious spirit called gin, which was sold so cheap that the lowest class of the people could afford to indulge themselves in one continued state of intoxication, to the destruction of their persons, and to the confusion of the laws. A shameful degree of profugy prevailed, that the retailers of this poisonous compound set up painted boards in public, inviting people to be drunk for the small expense they would be put to, which was the price of a dram of this drunk for two-pence, and have straw for nothing. They accordingly provided cellars and places strewed with straw, to which they converse those wretches, who were overcome with intoxication. In these dismal caverns they lay until they had recovered some use of their faculties, and then were made wretched by theanguish of torture, thus consuming their health, and ruining their families, in hideous receptacles of the most filthy vice, resounding with riot, execration, and blasphemy. Such beauty practices too plainly denoted a total want of all policy and civil regulation, and exercises of government over the greatest community of mankind, and the utmost submission to the will of the most barbarous community. In order to restrain this evil, which was become intolerable, the legislature enacted that law which we have already mentioned. But the populace did not suffer this to be long continued: no licence was obtained, and no duty paid, the liquor continued to be sold in all corners of the streets; informers were intimidated by threats of the people; and the justices of the peace, either from indulgence or corruption, neglected to put the law in execution. The new ministers foresaw that a great revenue would accrue to the crown from a repeal of this act; and this measure they thought might the more decently take, as the law had proved ineffectual: but it appeared that the consumption of gin had considerably increased every year since those heavy duties were imposed. They, therefore, pretended, that should the price of the liquor be moderately raised, and the duty increased, the revenue would be considerably greater. It was well known, that the lowest class of people would be debauched the use of it to excess; their morals would of consequence be mended; and a considerable sum of money might be raised for the support of the war, by increasing the revenue arising from the duty and the licences. Upon these maxim the new bill was founded, and passed through the lower House without opposition; but among the peers it produced the most obstinate dispute which had happened since the beginning of this parliament. The first assault it sustained was from Lord Hervey, who had been invested of his post of privy seal, which was bestowed on Lord Gower; and these two noblemen exchanged principles from that instant. The first was hardened into a sturdy patriot; the other supplied into an obsequious courtier. Lord Hervey on this occasion made a florid harangue upon the pernicious effects of that destructive spirit they were about to let loose upon their fellow-citizens. Several prelates expatiated on the same topics; but the Earl of Chesterfield attacked the bill with the united powers of reason, wit, and ridicule. Lord Carteret, Lord Bathurst, and the Earl of Bath, were numbered among its adherents, yet the bill was advanced on both sides of the question. After very long, warm, and repeated debates, the bill passed without amendments, though the whole bench of bishops voted against it; and the peers for the first time in their memory were attended with those dismal consequences which the lords in the opposition insisted. When the question was put for committing this bill, and the Earl of Chesterfield saw the bishops join in his division, I am in doubt (said he) whether I have not got on the other side of the question; for I have not had the honour to divide with so many law-selves for several years."

§ XXXVII. By the report of the secret committee it appeared that the then minister had commenced prosecutions against the mayors of boroughs who opposed his influence in the elections of members of parliament. These prosecutions were founded on ambiguities in charters, or trivial irregularities in the choice of magistrates. An appeal on such a process was brought into the House of Lords; and this evil falling under consideration, a bill was prepared for securing the independency of corporations, but it tended to disturb the influence of the bishops and the ministry, they argued against it with their usual eagerness and success; and it was rejected on a division. The mutiny bill and several others passed through both Houses. The Commons granted supplies to the amount of six millions of pounds, of which all was to be paid by the imposition of spirituous liquors and licences, and a loan from the sinking fund. In two years the national debt had suffered an increase of two millions four hundred thousand pounds, at an interest of five per cent. A.D. 1744. king in his speech to both Houses, told them that at the requisition of the Queen of Hungary, he had ordered his army, in conjunction with the Austrians, to pass the Rhine for her support and assistance: that he continued one squadron of ships in the Mediterranean, and another in the Baltic, to supply his army for the future; and had sent a number of vessels to aid the Dutch in the Baltic, for the assistance of the United Provinces. The Dutch had been promised supplies by the Duke of Cumberland, Lord Carteret, and other persons of distinction.

§ XXXVIII. At this period the Queen of Hungary secures a large foreign support. The French, who had been driven out of Bohemia and part of the upper Palatinate; and whose forces under Mareschal Broglie were posted on the Danube. Prince Charles of Lorraine, at the head of the Austrian army, entered Bavaria; and in April obtained a victory over a body of Bavarians at Hausnau; at the same time, three bodies of Croatians penetrating through the passes of the Tyrolese, ravaged the whole country to the very gates of Munich. The emperor pressed the French general to hazard a battle; but he refused to run the risk, though he had received a strong reinforcement from France. His imperial majesty, thinking himself unsafe in Munich, retired to Ingolstadt. Charles had opened a communication from Hungary to the Rhine, through the mountains for the third time full into the hands of the Queen of Hungary. Her arms likewise reduced Friedberg and Landsperg, while Prince Charles continued to pursue the French to Donauwörth, where they were joined by twelve thousand men from the Rhine. Broglie still avoided an engagement, and retreated before the enemy to Hallbrun. The emperor being thus abandoned by his allies, and stripped of all his dominions, repaired to Frankfort, where he lived in indignation and obscurity. He now made advances towards an accommodation with the Queen of Hungary. His general, Suckendorf, had an interview with Count Khevenhuller at the convent of Lowerenfeld, where a convention was signed, by which the treaty imported, that the emperor should remain neutral during the continuance of the present war: and, that his troops should be quartered in Franconia: that the Queen of Hungary should keep possession of Bavaria till the peace; and that in the event of the emperor in this situation he made a movement to Aschaffenburg, with a view to secure the navigation of the Upper Main; but he was anticipated by the enemy, who lay on the other side of the river, and had taken possession of the town of Aschaffenburg, and the town of Oppenheim, passed the Rhine in the beginning of June, and posted himself on the east side of that river, above Frankfort. The Earl of Stair advanced towards him, and encamped at Klenzenbach, between the river Main and the forest of Thuringen; and the emperor, in the event of the above, he determined to make a movement to Aschaffenburg, with a view to secure the navigation of the Upper Main; but he was anticipated by the enemy, who lay on the other side of the river, and had taken possession of the town of Aschaffenburg, and the town of Oppenheim, posted on the other side of the river, opposite to the allies, whose camp they overtook; and they found means by their parties and other precautions, to cut off the communication by water between Frankfort and the confederates. The Duke of Cumberland had already come to make his first campaign, and his majesty arrived in the camp on the ninth day of June. He found his army, amounting to above forty thousand men, in danger of starving; he received intelligence, that a reinforcement of twelve thousand Hanoverians and Hessians had reached Hanau; and he resolved to march thither, both with a view to effect a junction, and to procure provision for his forces. With this view he was detained on the twenty-sixth day of June. He had no sooner quitted Aschaffenburg, than it was seized by the French general: he had not marched above three leagues, when he perceived the enemy, to the number of thirty thousand, that had passed the river further down, at Selingenstadt, and were drawn up in order of battle at the village of Dettingen, to dispute his passage. Thus he found himself cooped up in a very dangerous situation. The enemy had possessed themselves of Aschaffenburg behind, so as to prevent his retreat: his troops were confined in a narrow plain, bounded by hills and woods on the right, flanked on the left by the river Main, on the opposite side of which the French had formed their camp. His meditations only produce a peace either with or without the concurrence of France: that in the former case no solid peace could be expected; in the latter, it was easy to foresee, that France would pay no regard to a peace in which she should have no concern. She affirmed, that the aim of the French king was solely to gain time to repair his losses, that he might in the next year besiege the other empire, and suppress the Austrian dominions. The Elector of Mentz, who had favoured the emperor, was now dead, and his successor inclined to the Austrian interest. He allowed this rescript to be entered in the journal of the diet, together with the protest which had been made when the vote of Bohemia was suppressed in the late election. The emperor complained in a circular letter of this transaction, as a stroke levelled at his imperial dignity, and in a successor to his predecessors, the members of the Germanic body. Several princes resented the haughty conduct, and began to be alarmed at the success, of the House of Austria; while others pitied the deplorable situation of the emperor. The Kings of Great Britain and Prussia, as Electors of Hanover and Brandenburg, espoused opposite sides in this contest. His Prussian majesty protested against the investment of the duchy of Saxe Lawenburg, claimed by the King of Great Britain; and he had an interview with Prince Charles of Aschaffwas drawn up, with a narrow pass before them, the village of Dettingen on their right, a wood on their left, and a morass in the centre. Thus enveloped, the confederates must either have fought, which would have been a fatal ploy, or surrender, the prisoners of war, had not the Duke de Gramont, who commanded the enemy, been instigated by the spirit of madness to forego these advantages. He passed the defile, and advancing towards the allies, a battle ensued. The French were in great numbers, and some regiments of British cavalry were put in disorder: but the infantry of the allies behaved with such intrepidity and deliberation, under the eye of their sovereign, and recall to the French what they had obliged to give way, and repass the Mayne with great precipitation, having lost above five thousand men killed, wounded, or taken. Had they been properly pursued before they recolected themselves from their first confusion, in all probability they would have sustained a total overthrow. TheEarl of Stair proposed that a body of cavalry should be detached on this service; but his advice was overruled. The loss of the allies in this action amounted to two thousand men. The Generals Clayton and Monroy were killed: the Duke of Cumberland, who exhibited uncommon proofs of courage, was shot through the calf of the leg; the Earl of Albemarle, General Huske, and several other officers of his troops, were wounded. The young king exposed his person to a severe fire of cannon as well as musketry: he rode between the first and second lines with his sword drawn, and encouraged the troops to fight for their country. He himself returned to the army, and he continued his march to Haanu, where he was joined by the reinforcement. The Earl of Stair sent a trumpeter to Marshal de Noailles, recommending to his protection the sick and wounded that were left on the field of battle: and cause the French general treated with great care and tenderness. Such generosity softens the rigours of war, and does honour to humanity.

§ XLI. The two armies continued on different sides of the Rhine till July, when the French general receiving intelligence that Prince Charles of Lorraine had approached the Neckar, he suddenly retired, and repassed the Rhine between Worms and Oppenheim. The King of Great Britain was visited by Prince Charles and Count Khevenhuller at Hanau, where the future operations of the campaign were regulated. On the twenty-seventh day of August, the allied army crossed the Rhine at Mentz, as the king fixed his head-quarters in the episcopal palace of Worms, and remained there till the last end of September, when they advanced to Spire, where they were joined by twenty thousand Dutch auxiliaries from the Netherlands. Marshal Noailles having retreated, the French encamped on the left of the camp of Mershim, and demolished the entrenchments which the enemy had raised on the Queich; then they returned to Mentz, and in October were distributed into winter-quarters, after an inactive campaign that redounded very little to the honour of those by whom the motions of the army were conducted. In September a treaty had been concluded at Worms between his Britannic Majesty, the King of Sardinia, and the Queen of Hungary. She engaged to maintain thirty thousand men in Italy; the King of Sardinia obliged himself to employ forty thousand infantry and five thousand horse, in consideration of his commanding the combined armies, and receiving an annual subsidy of two hundred thousand crowns, which were payable in Dutch guilders, and being a part of a subsidy of one hundred thousand crowns, which King Louis had promised to pay to the Queen of Hungary, at the time of their engagement. This subsidy was to be paid in cash, and was the principal object of the treaty. But the Sardines, in violation of the terms of the treaty, did not pay the subsidy, and were not satisfied with the satisfaction which the Queen of Hungary granted them. The King of Great Britain, upon his representations, determined to send an ambassado to the Queen of Hungary, to inquire into his conduct, and he was acquiesced, but the Queen was not at all satisfied of his innocence. In February a defensive treaty of alliance was concluded between this princess and King of Great Britain.

§ XLI. By this time France was deprived of her eldest minister in the death of the Cardinal de Fleury, who had for many years managed the affairs of that kingdom. He is said to have possessed a lively genius, and an innamurating address; to have been regular in his deportment, and modest in his pretensions; but at the same time he has been branded as deceitful, dissembling, and vindictive.
His scheme of policies was altogether pacific: he endeauved to accomplish his purposes by raising and fomenting enemies among foreign courts; he did not seem to pay much regard to the military glory of France; and he too much neglected the naval power of that kingdom. Since Broglie was driven out of Germany, the French court afected uncommon moderation. They pretended that their troops had only acted as auxiliaries while they remained in the empire; being, however, apprehensive of an irruption into their own dominions, they declared, that these troops were no longer to be considered in that light, but as subjects acting in the service of France. The campaign in Italy proved unfavourable to the Spaniards. In the be-beginning of February Count Gages, who commanded the Spanish army in the Bolognese, amounting to four and twenty thousand men, passed the Poavo, and advanced to Campe-Santo, where he encountered the imperial and Piemontese forces, commanded by the Counts Tram and Asprimont. The strength of the two armies was renounced, after a heated battle, bloody though indecisive. The Spaniards lost about four thousand men killed, wounded, or taken. The damage sustained by the confederates was not quite so great. Some cannon and enrols were taken on both sides; and each evening they ran to the enemy. Count Gages announced the danger of his situation, after having suffered severely by dezertion. Count Tram remained inactive in the Mo-dese until September, when he resigned his command to Prince Lobkowitz. This general entered the Bolognese in October, and then advanced towards Count Gages, who with his forces, reduced to ten thousand, retreated to Fano; but afterwards took possession of Pesaro, and fortified all the passes of the river Foglia. This season was far advanced before the Spanish troops, commanded by Don Philip, in Savoy, entered upon action. In all probability, the courts of Versailles and Madrid carried on some private negotiation with the King of Sardinia. This expeditious, Don Philip decamped from Chamberii in the latter end of August, and delving through Daup-hine towards Brancion, was joined by the Prince of Corn, at the head of twenty thousand French auxiliaries. Thus reinforced, he attacked the Piedmontese forces at Chateau-Duamane; but was repulsed in several attempts, and obliged to retreat considerable.

The French established their winter-quarters in Dauphine and Provence; and the Spaniards maintained their footing in Savoy.
§ XVI. The British fleet, commanded by Admiral Matthews, oversaw all the states that bordered on the Mediterranean. This officer, about the end of June, understanding that fourteen xebecs, laden with artillery and ammunition for the Spanish army, had arrived at Genoa, rushed thither from the road of Hercul, and demanded of the republic that they would either discharge these vessels with the stores to quit their harbour, or sequester their laden until a general peace should be established. After some dispute it was agreed that the cannon and stores should be deposited in the capitol of Bonfaco, situated on a rock at the south-eastern of Corsica; and that the xebecs should have leave to retire without molestation. The Corsicans had some years before revolted, and shaken off the dominion of the Ge-under, which their island had remained for many centuries. They found themselves oppressed, and resolved to assert their freedom. They conferred the sovereign au-dority on a German adventurer, who was solemnly proclaimed by the name of King Theodore. He had supplied them with some arms and ammunition, which he had brought from Tunis; and amused them with promises of being assisted by foreign powers in retrieving their indepen-dency: but as these promises were not performed, they }treated him so roughly, that he left thought proper to leave the island, and they submitted again to their old masters.

The troubles of Corsica were now revived. Theodore revisited his kingdom, and was recognized by the principal chiefs of the island. He published a manifesto: he granted a general pardon to all his subjects who should return to their obedience: he pretended to be countenanced and supported by the King of Great Britain and the Queen of Hungary. He was certainly thought a proper instrument to perplex and harass the Genoese, and was supplied at this juncture with a sum of money to purchase arms for the Corsicans: but a change soon happened in the British ministry, and then he was suffered to relapse into his original obscurity. Admiral Matthews, though he did not undertake any expedition of importance against the maritime towns of Spain, continued to assert the British empire at sea through the whole extent of the Mediteranean. This was a period of composite war; the British troops were sooner in motion, than the English admiral ordered some troops and cannon to be disembarked for the security of Villa-Franca. Some stores having been landed at Civita-Vecchia, for the use of the Spanish forces under Count Gages, Don Philip sent a corvette to draw a favourable impression of the neutrality which the pope had professed; and sent thither a squadron to bombard the place. The city of Rome was filled with consternation; and the pope had recourse to the good offices of his Sardinian majesty, in consequence of which the English squadron was ordered to withdraw. The captains of single cruising ships, by their activity and vigilance, wholly interrupted the commerce of Spain; conducted and burned some towns on the sea-side; and kept the whole coast in continual alarm.

§ XVI. In the West Indies some unsuccessful efforts were made by an English squadron, commanded by Commodore Knowles. He attacked La Gresin on the coast of Curacao, in the month of February: but met with such a warm reception, that he was obliged to desist, and make the best of his way for the Dutch island Curacao, where he repaired the damage he had sustained. His ships being repaired, he made another attempt upon Porto Cavallo in April, which like the former miscarried. Twelve hundred marines being landed in the neighbourhood of that place, were seized with such a panic that it was found necessary to reembark them without delay. Then the admiral al-doned the enterprise, and proceeded to his station at the Leeward Islands, without having added much to his reputation, either as to conduct or resolution. On the continent of America the operations of the war were very inconsiderable. General Oglethorpe having received intelligence that the Spaniards prepared for another invasion from St. Augustine, assembled a body of Indians, as a reinforcement to part of his own regiment, with the highlanders and rangers, and in the spring began his march, in order to anticipate the enemy. He encamped for some time in the neighbourhood of St. Augustine, by way of defiance; but they did not think proper to hazard an engagement; and when he was in condition to undertake a land expedition, he marched to Georgia. In October the Princess Louisa, youngest daughter of his Britannic majesty, was married by proxy, at Hanover, to the Prince-royal of Denmark, who met her
of the House, interposing, declared, that by their rules a question once rejected could not be revived during the same session. A debate ensued, and the second motion was overruled. Prince derived the capacity, who engaged the House of Commons; nevertheless, the same nobleman moved in the upper House that the continuing sixteen thousand Hanoverians in British pay was prejudicial to his majesty’s true interest, useful to his enemies, and dangerous to the welfare and tranquility of the nation. He was seconded by the Duke of Marlborough, who had resigned his commission in disgust; and the proposal gave birth to another warm dispute: but victory declared, as usual, for the government.

§ II. In the House of Commons they sustained divers attacks. A motion was made for laying a duty of eight shillings in the pound on all places and pensions. Mr. Grenville moved for an address, to beseech his majesty, that he would not engage the British nation any further in the war on the continent, without the concurrence of the States-general on certain stipulated proportions of force and expense, as in the late war. These proposals begat vigorous debates, in which the country party were always foiled by dints of superior numbers. Such was the credit and influence of the ministry in parliament, that although the national debt was increased by about three millions, and the commencement of the war, the Commons indulged them with an enormous sum for the expense of the ensuing year. The grants specified in the votes amounted to six millions and a half; to this sum were added three millions and one hundred thousand pounds, and they were increased that this year’s expense rose to ten millions. The funds established for the annual charge were the land and malt taxes, one million paid by the East India company for the renewal of their charter, twelve thousand pounds by annuities, one million from the sinking fund, six-and-thirty thousand pounds from the coinage, and six hundred thousand pounds by a lottery; an expedient which for some time had been annually repeated; and which, in a great measure, continued by the courtesy of the public, by introducing the spirit of gaming, destructive of all industry and virtue.

§ III. The dissensions of the British parliament were suddenly suspended by an event that seemed to unite both parties in the prosecution of the same measures. This was the intelligence of an intended invasion. By the parliamentary disputes, the loud clamours, and the general dissatisfaction of the people in Great Britain, the French ministry were persuaded that the nation was ripe for a revolt. This belief was corroborated by the assertions of their emissaries in different parts of Great Britain and Ireland. These were papists and Jacobites of strong prejudices and extreme imaginations, sent through the medium of passion and party, and spoke rather from extravagant zeal than from sober conviction. They gave the court of Versailles to understand, that if the Chevalier de St. George, or his eldest son, Charles Edward, should appear at the head of a French army in Great Britain, a revolution would instantly follow in his favour. This intimation was agreeable to Cardinal de Tencin, who, since the death of Fleury, had borne a share in the administration of France. He was of a violent enterprising temper. He had been recommended to the purple by the Chevalier de St. George, and was seemingly attached to the Stuart family. His ambition was satisfied with the prospect of giving a kingdom to Great Britain, of performing such eminent service to his benefactor, and of restoring to the throne of their ancestors a family connected by the ties of blood with all the greatest princes of Europe. The ministry of France foretold, that even if this aim should miscarry, a descent upon Great Britain would make a considerable diversion from the continent on favour of France, and embolden and embarrass his Britannic majesty’s enemies, and supplant Austria and all its allies. Actuated by these motives, he concerted measures with the Chevalier de St. George at Rome, who, being too much advanced in years to engage personally in such an enterprise, assigned the three great pretensions and authority to his sons Charles, a young and promising talent, sage, secret, brave, and enterprising, annealed his person, grave, and even resired in his deportment. He approved himself in the sequel composed and moderate in success, wonderfully firm in adversity: and though tenderly nursed in all the delights of an effec- tual friendship, with a gentle climate, a warm, kindly, and also a benevolent, liberal, of cold, hunger, and fatigue. Such was the adven-turor now destined to fill the hope which the French testation had conceived, from the projected invasion of Great Britain.

§ IV. Count Saxe was appointed by the French king commander of the troops destined for this expedition, which amounted to fifteen thousand men. They began the French enterprise, and a great number of vessels was assembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais, and Boulogne. It was determined that they should be landed at Kent, under convoy of a strong squadron equipped at Brest, and commanded by Monsieur de Roquefeuille, an officer of experience and capacity. The Chevalier de St. George is said to have required the personal service of the Duke of Ormond, who excused himself on account of his advanced age: be as that it will, Prince Charles departed from Rome about the end of December, in the disguise of a Spanish courier, attended by one servant only, and furnished with passports by Cardinal Aquaviva. He travelled through Tuscany to Genoa, from both the Suits to Turin, where he embarked for Angiers, and prosecuting his journey to Paris, was indulged with a private audience of the French king: then he set out incognito for the coast of Picardy. The British ministry being apprised of his arrival in France, at once concerted with the French cabinet, and the arrangements prepared at Brest and Boulogne. Mr. Thomson, the English resident at Paris, received orders to make a remonstrance to the French ministry, on the violation of those treaties by which the pretender to the crown of Great Britain was excluded from the territories of France. But he was given to understand, that his most christian majesty would not explain himself on that subject, until the King of England should have given satisfaction on the repeated complaints of the French minister, and to the rest of the fractions of those very treaties, which had been so often violated by his orders. In the month of January, M. de Roquefeuille sailed from Brest, directing his course up the English channel with twenty ships of war. They were immediately discovered by an English cruiser, which ran into Plymouth; and the intelligence was conveyed by land to the Board of Admiralty. Sir John Norris was forthwith ordered to take the command of the squadron at Spitehead, with which he sailed round to the Downs, where he was joined by some ships of the line from Clatham, and then be found himself at the head of a squadron considerably stronger than that of the enemy.

When the preparations marched on the southern coast of England; all governors and commanders were ordered to repair immediately to their respective ports: the forts at the mouth of the Thames and Medway were put in a fortitude of defence; and directions were issued to assemble the Kentish militia, to defend the coast in case of an invasion. On the fifteenth day of February, the king sent a message to both Houses of Parliament, intimating the arrival of the pretender's son in France, the preparations at Dunkirk, and the appearance of a French fleet in the English channel. They joined in an address, declaring their indignation and abhorrence of the design formed in favour of a papish pretender; and assuring his majesty, that they would, with the warmest zeal and unreservedly, take such measures as would enable him to frustrate and defeat so desperate and insolent an attempt. Addresses of the same kind were presented by the city of London, both universities, the principal towns of Great Britain, the clergy, the dissenting ministers, the quakers, and almost all the corporations and communities of the kingdom. A requisition was made of the six thousand auxiliaries, which were due for the general were by treaty obliged to furnish on such occasions; and these were forthwith issued with great alacrity and expedition. The Earl of Stair, forgetting his wrongs, took this opportunity of offering his services to government, and was invested with the chief command of the town of Dunkirk. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was folled by several noblemen of the first rank. The Duke of Montague was permitted to raise a regiment of horse; and orders were sent to bring over six thousand of the British troops from Flanders, in case the invasion should actually take place. His majesty was, in another address from parliament, exhorting his subjects to preserve the land; the habesacs corpus act was suspended for six months, and several persons of distinction were apprehended on suspicion of treasonable practices: a proclamation was issued for putting the laws in execution against papists and nonjurors, who were commanded to retire ten miles from London; and every precaution was taken which seemed necessary for the preservation of the public transport.

§ VI. Meanwhile the French court proceeded with their preparations at Boulogne and Dunkirk, under the eye of the young pretender; and seven thousand men were actually embarked. M. de Roquefeuille sailed up the channel as far as Dunkesness, a promontory on the coast of Kent, after having detached M. de Barreil, with five ships, to hasten the embarkation at Dunkirk. While the French admiral anchored off Dungeness, he perceived, on the twenty-fourth day of February, the British fleet under Sir John Norris, doubling the South Foreland from the Downs; and though the wind was against him, taking the opportunity of the tide to come up and engage the French admiral, he resolved, without waiting for a visit, could not be altogether composed, considering the great superiority of his enemies: but the tide failing, the English admiral was obliged to anchor two leagues short of the enemy. In this interval, M. de Roquefeuille called together the council of war, and the French negotiators engagement, weigh anchor at sunset, and make the best of their way to the place from whence they had set sail. This resolution was favoured by a very hard gale of wind, which began to blow from the north-east, and carried them down the channel with incredible expedition. But the same storm which, in all probability, saved their fleet from destruction, utterly disconcerted the design of invading England. A great number of their transports came on shore, and were lost in the attempt, and the rest damaged that they could not be speedily repaired. The English were now masters at sea, and their coast was so well guarded, that the enterprise could not be prosecuted with any probability of success. The French generals nominated to serve in this expedition returned to Paris, and the young pretender resolved to wait a more favourable opportunity. In the meantime he remained in Paris, or that neighborhood, incognito, and almost totally neglected by the court of France. Finding himself in this disas-sorable situation, and being visited by John Murray of Broughton, who magnified the power of his friends in Great Britain, he resolved to make some bold effort, even though it should be attended with some hazard. He renewed his thoughts of visiting England, and the pretender, who had no fear, and forthwith took proper measures to obtain exact information touching the number, inclinations, and influence of his father's adherents in England and Scotland. The French king no longer preserved any secrets with the court of London: the British resident at Paris was given to understand, that a declaration of war must ensue; and this was actually published on the twentith day of March. The King of Great Britain was taxing with having dissolved the court of Venice from entertaining any thoughts of an accommodation; with having infringed the convention of Hanover; with having exercised pravity upon the subjects of France, and with having blockaded the harbour of Toulon. The French king no longer preserved any

2 The opposition had sustained a heavy blow in the death of the Duke of Argy, a moderate of strong qualifications for the senate and the field, whose character would have been still more illustrious, had not some parts that he might be joined by the ships a-star. They were perceived again on the thirteenth at a considerable distance, and pursued till the evening. In the morning of the fourteenth, twenty sail of them were seen distinctly, and Lestock with his division had gained ground of them and got the better of them. Admiral Matthews, not without the signal for leaving off chase, and bore away for Portsmouth, to repair the damage he had sustained. Meanwhile the combined squadrons continued their course together; and on the 20th M. de Court, with his division, anchored in the road of Alcident; and Don Navarro sailed into the harbour of Cartagena. Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, accused Lestock of having misbehaved on the day of action; suspended him from his office, and sent him prisoner to England, where, in his turn, he accused his accuser. Long before the engagement, these two officers had expressed the most virulent resentment against each other. Matthews was brave, open, and undignified; but proud, imperious, and precipitate. Lestock had signalized his courage on many occasions, and perfectly understood the whole discipline of the navy; but he was cool, running, and vindictive. He had been treated superciliously by Matthews, and in revenge took advantage of his erreur to explain this passion he betrayed the interest and glory of his country; for it is not to be doubted, but that he might have come up in time to engage; and, in that case, the fleets of France and England would have had a much better chance of success. He had been unwillingly engaged, but he entrenched himself within the punichments of discipline, and saw with pleasure his antagonist expose himself to the hazard of death, ruin, and disgrace. Matthews himself, in the sequel, sacrificed his duty to his resentment, in restraining Lestock from pursuing and attacking the combined squadrons on the third day after the engagement, when they appeared disabled, and in manifest disorder, and would have fallen an easy prey, had they been handled, without the assistance of the nation, reflect upon these instances, in which a community has so severely suffered from the personal animosity of individuals. The miscarriage off Toulon became the subject of a parliamentary inquiry in England. The Commons, in an address to the throne, desired that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents. By this time Lestock had accused Matthews, and all the captains of his division who misbehaved on the day of battle. The court-martial was constituted, and proceeded to trial. Several commanders of ships were cashiered: Vice-Admiral Lestock was honourably acquitted; and Admiral Matthews rendered incapable of serving for the future in his majesty's navy. It was the first time that public opinion was so loudly phalmed; and Matthews sent a fire-ship to destroy her; but the expedient did not take effect. The ship ordered to cover this machine did not obey the signal; so that the captain of the fire-ship was exposed to the whole fire of the enemy. Nevertheless he continued to advance until he found the vessel sinking; and being within a few yards of the Real, he set fire to the fuses. The ship was immediately in flames, in the midst of which he and his lieutenant, with twenty men, perished. This was likewise the fate of the Spanish launch, which had been wa,ved with fifty sailors, to prevent the fire-ship from running on board the Real. One ship of the line belonging to a Spanish squadron struck to Captain Hawke, who sent a lieutenant to take possession of her: she was afterwards taken by the French squadron; but was found so disabled, that they left her deserted, and she was next day burned by order of Admiral Matthews. At night the action ceased; and the admiral having observed the enemy's line of battle, moved his flag into another. Captain Cornwall fell in the engagement, after having exhibited a remarkable proof of courage and intrepidity; but the loss of men was very considerable, and the admiral gave chase till night, when he brought to crowned, and to interpose his good offices with the Queen of Hungary, that his electoral dominions should be favourably treated. These preliminaries, though settled, were not signed. The court of Vienna was unwilling to part with their dominions on Bavaria and the Lower Bavarian. The Queen trusted too much to the valor of her troops, and the wealth of her allies, to listen to such terms of accommodation; and whatever arguments were used with the King of England, that certain it was that negotiation would be dropped, on pretence that the articles were disapproved by the ministry of England. The emperor, environed with distress, renewed his application to the King of Great Britain, and declared that he must refer to the determination of the maritime powers; but all his advances were disconcerted: and the treaty of Worms dispelled all hope of accommodation. In this manner did the British ministry reject the fairest opportunity that could possibly occur of terminating the war in Germany with honour and advantage, and of freeing their country from that insufferable burthen of expense under which she groaned.

§ X. The inflexibility of the house of Austria and its chief ally proved servileable to the emperor. The forlorn situation of this unfortunate prince excited the composition of divers princes: they presented the insolence with which the head of the empire had been treated by the court of Vienna; and they were alarmed at the increasing power of a faction of ragged, tyrannical, and intractable wavering ministers. These considerations gave rise to the treaty of Frankfort, concluded in May between the emperor, the King of Prussia, the King of Sweden and Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, and the Burgundian Confederation. They engaged to preserve the constitution of the empire, according to the treaty of Westphalia, and to support the emperor in his rank and dignity. They agreed to employ their good offices with the Queen of Hungary, that she might be induced to acknowledge the emperor, to restore his hereditary dominions, and give up the archives of the empire that were in her possession. They guaranteed to each other their respective territories: the disputes about the succession of the late emperor they referred to the decision of the states of the empire: they promised to assist one another in case of being attacked; and they invited the King of Poland, the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Liege, to accede to this treaty. Such was the confederacy that broke all the measures which had been concerted between the King of Great Britain and her Hungarian majesty, for the operations of the campaign. In the meantime, the French king declared war against this prince, on pretence that she was obstinately deaf to all terms of accommodation, and determined to carry the war into the territories of France. In her counter-declarations the taxed Louis with having infringed the most solemn engagement, with respect to the pragmatic sanction; with having violated the different promises to lay claim to the succession of the late emperor; with having endeavoured to invigorate the common enemy of Christianity against her: and with having acted the incendiary in the north of Europe, that the czarina might be prevented from assisting the House of Austria, while his numerous armies overspread the empire and desolated her hereditary countries. These recriminations were literally true. The houses of Bourbon and Austria have, for many centuries, been the common disturbers and plagues of Europe.

§ XI. The King of France, though in himself pacific and enterprising, was stimulated by his ministry to taste the glory of conquest in the Netherlands, where he had assembled an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men, provided with a very formidable train of artillery. The chief command was vested in the Marquis Count de Saxe, who possessed great military talents, and proved to be one of the most fortunate generals of the age in which he lived. The allied forces, consisting of English, Hanoverians, Dutch, and Austrians, to the number of seventy thousand effective men, were in the month of May assembled in the neighbourhood of Brussels, from whence they marched towards the north-west, and penetrated the Scheldt, being unable to retard the progress of the enemy. The French monarch, attended by his favourite ladies, with all the pomp of eastern luxury, arrived at Luton on the 22d of July, and prepared to review his army. The States-general, alarmed at his preparations, had, in a conference with his ambassador at the Hague, expressed their apprehensions, and entertained his most Christian majesty with the design of attacking their barrier. Their remonstrances were answered with threats and the declaration of war upon that monarch, to enforce their former representations, and repeat their entreaties: but no regard was paid to his request. The French king told him, he was determined to pursue his conquest in the Netherlands, and having served to had served to no other purpose but that of rendering his enemies more intractable. Accordingly, his troops invested Menin, which was in seven days surrendered upon capitulation, there being six thousand men of the same nation of their dominions had been signed between those two powers in December; and now Prince Charles of Lorraine was reinforced by twenty thousand Saxon troops, under the conduct of the Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels. The combined army was superior to that of his Prussian majesty; but he thought fit to disunite them, and having evacuated all the places he had garrisoned in Bohemia, retreated with precipitation into Silesia. There his troops were put into winter-quarters; and he hurried his army to Berlin, extremely mortified at the issue of the campaign.

§ XIV. During these transactions, Count Seckendorf marched into Bavaria, at the head of a strong army, drove the allies from the Rhine, and regained possession of Munch, his capital, on the twenty-third of October. In August, the French army passed the Rhine at Fort Louis, and invested the strong and important city of Fribourg, defended by General Demanitz, at the head of nine thousand veterans. The King of France arrived in the camp on the eleventh day of October; and the siege was carried on with uncommon vigour. The Austrian governor made incredible efforts in the defence of the place, which he maintained until it was reduced to a heap of ruins, and one half of the garrison destroyed. At length, however, they were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war, after the truces had been concluded during which they had killed above fifteen thousand of the besiegers. With this conquest the French king closed the campaign, and his army was cantonized along the Rhine, under the inspection of the Count de Mailhebons. By the detachments drawn from their armies, the French army was himself considerably weaker than the confederates: he threw up strong entrenchments behind the Lys, where he remained on the defensive, until he was reinforced by the Count de Clermont, who commanded a separate body on the side of Newport. The allies, to the number of seventy thousand, passed the Schelde, and advanced towards Hel- dans; but the enemy being so advantageously posted, that they could not attack him with any prospect of advantage, they filed on in sight of Tourna; and on the eighth day of August encamped in the plains of Lisle, in hope of drawing Count Saxe from the situation in which he was so strongly fortiued. Here they foraged for several days, and laid the open country under contribution; however, they made no attempt on the place itself, which in all probability would have fallen into their hands, had they invested it at their first approach; for then there was no other communication with the battles of military but Count Saxe soon threw in a considerable reinforcement. The allies were unprovided with a trum of battering cannon: and their commandants would not debar from the usual form of war. Besides, they were divided in their opinions as to the advantage of advancing. The Duke of Saxe, who commanded the English and Hanoverians, was a vain, weak man, without confidence, weight, or authority; and the Austrian general, the Duke d'Armenberg, was a proud, rapacious glutton, devoted of talents and sentiment. After having remained for some time in sight of Lisle, and made a general forage without molestation, they retired to their former camp on the Schelde, from whence they soon marched into winter-quarters. Count Saxe at length quitted his lines; and by way of retaliation sent out detachments to ravage the Low Countries to the very gates of Ghent and Bruges. The conduct of the allied generals was severely censured in England, and reeded in France, not only in private conversations, but also on their public theatres, where it became the subject of farces and pantomimes.

§ XV. The campaign in Italy produced divers vicissitudes of fortune. The King of Naples having assembled an army joined Count Gages, and published a manifesto in vindication of his conduct, which was a direct violation of the neutrality he had promised to observe. He main- tained his stance, his cause having been undervalued by the courts of Lorraine and Vienna. He was as� sociated with the calamities of war; and that the Queen of Hungary made no secret of her intention to invade his dominions. This charge was not without foundation. The Austrian government had not only attempted to excite a rebellion in Naples, which Prince Lobkowitz had men, the place was taken: the garrison of Demont surrendered at discretion, and the whole country of Piedmont was laid under contribution. His Sardinian majesty was now disposed more and more to hazard a siege of the city: and, therefore, posted himself at Saluzzes, in order to cover his capital. The combined army advanced to the strong and important town of Cooi, which was invested in the beginning of September. Baron Leutrum the governor made an obstinate defence, and the situation of the place was such as rendered the siege difficult, tedious, and bloody. The King of Sardinia being reinforced by ten thousand Austrians and fifteen thousand French, Palavicino, advancing to its relief, was engaged in a battle action. The action was maintained with great vigour on both sides, till night, when his majesty finding it impracticable to force the enemy's entrenchments, retired in good order to his camp at Marussi. He afterwards found means to throw a reinforcement and supply of provisions into Cooi; and the heavy rains that fell at this period not only retarded, but even dispirited, the besiegers. Nevertheless, the princes persisted in their design, notwithstanding a dearth of provisions, and the approach of winter, till the latter end of November, when the Chevalier de Soto entered the place with six hundred fresh men. This incident was no sooner known than the princes and the army repaired to the assistance of their sick and wounded to the mercy of the Piedmontese, marched back to Demont. Having dismantled the fortifications of this place, they retreated with great precipitation to Dauphiné, and were dreadfully harassed by the Vaudois and light troops of the dauphin. His Sardinian majesty, who had again saw himself in possession of Piedmont. The French troops were quartered in Dauphiné, but Don Philip still maintained his footing in Savoy, the inhabitants of which he passed without mercy.

§ XVII. After the action at Toulon, nothing of consequence was achieved by the British squadron in the Mediterranean; and indeed the naval power of Great Britain was during the summer, quite inactive. In the month of June, Commodore Anson returned from his voyage of three years and nine months, in which he had surrounded the terraqueous globe. We have formerly observed, that he sailed with a small squadron to the South Sea, in order to annoy the Spanish settlements of Chili and Peru. Two of his large ships having been separated from him in a storm before he weathered Cape Horn, had put in at Rio de Janeiro, on the coast of Brazil, from whence they returned to Europe. A frigate commanded by Captain Cheap, was shipwrecked on a desolate island in the South Sea. Mr. Anson having undergone a dreadful tempest, which dispersed his fleet, argued at the island of Juan Fernandez. There he was joined by another ship, belonging to the line, a sloop, and a ship laden with provisions. These were the remains of his squadron. He made prize of several vessels; took and burned the little town of Pavia; set sail from the coast of Mexico, for the Philippine Isles: and in this passage the Gloucester was abandoned and sunk: the other vessels had been destroyed for want of means to navigate them, so that nothing now remained but the commodore's own ship, the Centurion, and that but very indifferently manned; for the crews had been horribly thinned by sickness. Incredible were the hardships and misery they sustained from the shattered condition of the ship and the scrofulous disorder, when they reached the plentiful island of Timor, where they were supplied with the necessary refreshments. Thence they prosecuted their voyage to the river of Canton in China, where the commodore ordered the ship to be sheathed, and found means to procure a reinforcement of sailors. The chief object of his attention was the rich annual ship that sails between Acapulco in Mexico, and Manilla one of the Philippine islands. In hopes of intercepting her, he set sail from Canton, and steered her course the strait of Magdalen, when she actioned herself, fell into his hands, after a short but vigorous engagement. The prize was called Neustria Signora de Cabodonga, mounted with forty guns, manned with six hundred men, worth, with naval stores, to the value of three hundred and thirteen thousand pounds sterling:1 1 Mr. Pepys, the celebrated post, died in the month of June, in October, the old Duchess of Marlborough resigned her breath, in the eighty-with this windfall he returned to Canton, from whence he proceeded to the Cape of Good Hope, and prosecuted his voyage to England, where he arrived safely. Though his voyage was so dangerous, and, considering the expense and the services that may be termed almost accidental, the British nation was not indemnified for the expense of the expedition: and the original design was entirely defeated. Had the Manilla ship escaped the vigilance of the British, Commodore, he might have been, at his return to England, laid aside as a superannuated captain, and died in obscurity: but his great wealth invested him with considerable consideration. He was now, at the time he was lord, became the oracle which was consulted in all naval deliberations; and the king raised him to the dignity of a peerage. In July, Sir John Balchen, an admiral of approved valour and great experiences, sailed from Synthep with a strong squadron, in quest of an opportunity to attack the French fleet at Brest, under the command of M. de Rohanchat. In the bay of Biscay he was over-broken by a violent storm, that dispersed the ships, and drove them up the English Channel. Admiral Stewar, with the greater part of them, arrived at Plymouth; but Sir John Balchen's own ship, the Victory, which was counted the most beautiful first-rate in the world, founded and stranded at Ushant, where, after the loss of his officers, volunteers, and crew, amounting to eleven hundred choice seamen. On the fourth day of October, after the siege of Fribourg, the Marshal Duke de Belleisie and his brother, happened, in their way to Berlin, to halt at Dusseldorf, a large town in the principality of his Hertorite of Hanover. There they were apprehended by the bulif of the place, and conducted as prisoners to Osterode; from whence they were removed to Stade on the Elbe, where they embarked for England. They resided in Windsor till the following year, when they were allowed the benefit of the cartel which had been established between Great Britain and France at France, and released from confinement. After this, he was appointed to the command of the Hanoverian, with that respect and hospitality which was due to their rank and merit.2

§ XVIII. The dissensions in the British cabinet were now ripened into another revolution in the ministry. Lord Carteret, who was by this time Earl Granville in consequence of his mother's death, had engaged the royal favour so much, that the Duke of Newcastle and his brother are said to have taken umbrage at his influence and greatness. He had incurred the resentment of those who were distinguished by the appellation of patriots, and entirely forfeited his popularity. The two brothers were very powerful by their parliamentary interest: they knew their influence on the Duke of Newcastle, and the leading men in the opposition, against the prime minister and his measures. This coalition was dignified with the epithet of "The Broad Bottom," as if it had been established on a true constitutional foundation, composed of individuals of every class, without distinction of party. The appellation, however, which they assumed was afterward converted into a term of derision. The Earl of Granville perceiving the gathering storm, and foreseeing the impossibility of withstanding such an opposition in parliament, wisely avoided the impending danger and disgrace, by a voluntary resignation of his employments. The Earl of Harrington succeeded him as secretary of state. The Duke of Bedford was appointed first Lord of the Admiralty, and the Earl of Chesterfield declared Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The Lords Gower and Cobham were re-established in the offices they had resigned: Mr. Lyttelton was admitted a commissioner of the treasury; even Sir John Huyse Cotton received a place at court; and Sir John Philips sat at the board of trade and plantations, though he soon renounced this employment. This was rather a change of men than of measures, and the men of the time and place, where she actioned herself, fell into his hands, after a short but vigorous engagement. The prize was called Neustria Signora de Cabodonga, mounted with forty guns, manned with six hundred men, worth, with naval stores, to the value of three hundred and thirteen thousand pounds sterling:1 by the land, the malt, and the salt taxes, the sinking fund, and the additional duty on wines. In January, the Earl of Chesterfield set out for the Hague, with the character of ambassador extraordinary, to persuade, if possible, the States-General of Holland to join him, but at the same time, a treaty of quadruple alliance was signed at Warsaw, by the Queen of Hungary, the King of Poland, and the maritime powers. This was a mutual guarantee of the possessions belonging to the contracting parties, but his Polish majesty was paid for his concurrence with an annual subsidy of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, two-thirds of which were delayed by England, and the remaining one-third by France.

§ XIX. The business of the British parliam­ent being discussed, the session was closed in the beginning of May; and, immediately after the prorogation, the king set out for Hanover. The death of the Emperor Charles VII. which happened in the month of January, had entirely changed the face of affairs in the empire, and all the princes of Germany were in commotion. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, consort to her Hungarian majesty, was immediately declared a candidate for the imperial crown; while his pretensions were warmly opposed by the French king and his allies. The court of Vienna, taking advantage of the late emperor’s death, sent an army under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, and the elector was obliged to abandon his capital, and retire to Augsburg, where he found himself in danger of losing all his dominions. In this emergency he yielded to the earnest solicitation of the empress his mother, enforced by the advice of his uncle, the Elector of Cologne, and of his general, Count Seckendorf, who exhorted him to be reconciled to the court of Vienna. A negotiation was immediately entered into, by which, April 23, the treaty was concluded. The queen consented to recognise the imperial dignity, as having been vested in the person of his father; to acknowledge his mother as empress dowager; to restore his dominions, with all the territories, artillery, stores, and ammunition which she had taken; on the other hand, he renounced all claim to the succession of his father, and became guarantee of the pragmatic sanction: he acknowledged the validity of the electoral vote of Bavaria; and in return, the emperor had given his voice for the grand duke, at the ensuing election of the King of the Romans. Until that should be determined, both parties agreed that Ingolstadt should be garrisoned by Austrian troops; and that Brunswick and Schardingen, with all the castle and fortress in the same, and the Saltza, should remain in the queen’s possession, though without prejudice to the civil government, or the elector’s revenue. In the mean time he dismissed the auxiliaries that were in his pay, and they were permitted to retire without molestation.

§ XX. The court of Vienna had now secured the votes of all the electors, except those of Brandenburgh and the palatinate. Nevertheless, France assembled a powerful army in the neighbourhood of Frankfort, in order to influence the election. But the Austrian army, commanded by the grand duke in person, marched thither from the Danube; and the Prince of Conti was obliged to repass the Rhine at Nordlingen. Then the grand duke repaired to Frankfort, where, on the second day of September, he was by a majority of voices declared King of the Romans, and Emperor of Germany. Meanwhile the King of Prussia made great progress in the conquest of Silesia. The campaign began in January, when the Hungarian insurgents were obliged to retire into Moravia. In the following month the Prussian General Lewald defeated a body of troops, which was commanded by General Helscher; the town of Ratibor was taken by assault; and the king entered Silesia, in May, at the head of seventy thousand men. Prince Charles of Lor­raine, being joined by the Duke of Saxe Wessenfel and twenty thousand Saxons, penetrated into Silesia by the defiles of Landshut, and were attacked by the Prussian majesty in the vicinity of Strehlau, near Friedberg. The battle was maintained from morning till noon, when the Saxons giving way, Prince Charles was obliged to retire with the loss of twelve thousand men, and a great number of colours, standards and artillery. This victory, gained on the fourth day of June, complete as it was, did not prove decisive; for though the victor transferred the seat of the war into Bohemia, and maintained his army by raising contributions in that country, the Austrians were resolved to hazard another engagement. Their aim was to surprise him in his camp at Soh; which they attacked on the thirtieth of September, at day-break, but they met with such a warm reception, that notwithstanding their repeated efforts during the space of four hours, they were repulsed with considerable damage, and retreated to Jaro­nitz, leaving five thousand killed upon the spot, besides two thousand that were taken, with many standards, and twenty pieces of cannon. The loss of this battle was in a great measure owing to the avarice of the irregulars, who having penetrated into the Prussian camp, began to pillage with great eagerness, giving the king an opportunity to rally and restore his forces. Nevertheless, they retired with the plunder of his baggage, including his military chest, the officers of his chancery, his own secretary, and all the papers of his cabinet.

§ XXI. After this action, his Prussian majesty returned to Berlin, and breathed nothing but peace and moderation. In August he had signed a convention with the King of Great Britain, who became guarantee of his possessions in Silesia, as yielded by the treaty of Breslau; and he promised to vote for the Grand Duke of Tuscany at the election of an emperor. This was intended as the basis of a more general accommodation. But he now pretended to have received undoubted intelligence, that the King of Poland and the Elector of Saxony were assembled to invade Brandenburgh with three different armies; and that, for this purpose, his Polish majesty had demanded of the czarina the succours stipulated by treaty between the two crowns. Alarmed, or seemingly alarmed, at this informa­tion, he solicited the maritime powers to full their en­gagements, and interpose their good offices with the court of Petersburgh. Yet, far from waiting for the result of these remonstrances, he made a sudden irruption in Lus­tia, took possession of Gortitz, and advanced Prince Charles of Lorraine to retire before him into Bohemia. Then he entered Leipzic, and laid Saxony under contribution. The King of Poland, unable to resist the torrent, quitted his capital, and took refuge in Prague. His troops, reinforced by a multitude of Saxons and Poles, on the fifteenth day of December; and his Prussian majesty became master of Dresden without further opposition. The King of Poland, thus deprived of his heredi­tary dominions, was fan to acquiesce in such terms as the conqueror thought proper to impose; and the treaty of Dresden was concluded under the mediation of his Britannic majesty. By this convention the King of Prus­sia retained all the contributions he had levied in Saxony; and was entitled to a million of German crowns, to be paid to his Polish majesty at the next fair of Leipzic. He and the Elector Palatine consented to acknowledge the grand duke as Emperor of Germany; and this last confirmed to his Prussian majesty certain privileges de non evocando, which had been granted by the late emperor with regard to some territories possessed by the King of Prussia, though not belonging to the electorate of Bran­denburgh. Immediately after the ratification of said treaty, the Prussian troops evacuated Saxony; and the peace of Germany was restored.

§ XXII. Though the French king could not prevent the elevation of the King of Poland, he was resolved to humble his house of Austria, by making a conquest of the Netherlands. A prodigious army was

Robert Earl of Orford, late prime minister, died in March, after having for a very short time enjoyed a pension of four thousand pounds granted by the king in consideration of his past services. Though he had for such a length of time directed the application of the public treasury, his conduct was not unfavourable: he was liberal in his dispossession, and had such a number of vigorous dependants to gratify, that little was left for his own private occasions.
there assembled, under the auspices of Mareschal Count de Saxe; and his most exalted majesty, with the dauphin, arriving in the camp, they invested the strong town of Tournay, which, on the thirtieth day of April, the garrison consisted of eight thousand men, commanded by the old Baron Dorth, who made a vigorous defense. The Duke of Cumberland assumed the chief command of the allied army assembled at Soignies; he was assisted with the advice of the Count Konigseck, an Austrian general, and the Prince of Waldeck, commander of the Dutch forces. Their army was greatly inferior in number to that of the French, but they were determined to match their enemy, in the hope of relief from Tournay. They accordingly advanced to Leuze; and on the twenty-eighth days of April took post at Mauldre in sight of the French army, which was encamped on an eminence, about seven miles beyond Vezen, having Fontenoy in their front. The next day was employs by the allies in driving the enemy from some outposts, and clearing the defiles through which they were obliged to advance to the attack; while the French completed their batteries, and made the most formidable preparations for their reception. On the thirtieth day of April, the Duke of Cumberland, having made the proper dispositions, began his march to the enemy at two o'clock in the afternoon; and in front came a detachment under sale; and at that hour both armies were engaged. The British infantry drove the French beyond their lines; but the left wing, falling in the attack on the village of Fontenoy, and the cavalry forbearing to advance on the flanks, they measured battle, and at last the French were driven from the field in front and to a dreadful fire, which did great execution. The duke was obliged to make the necessary disposition for a retreat about three o'clock in the afternoon; and was succeeded in this operation by the French. The battle was continued with great obstinacy, and the carnage on both sides was very considerable. The allies lost about twelve thousand men, including a good number of officers; among these were Lieutenant-General Campbell, and Major-General Powney. The victory cost the French almost an equal number of lives; and no honour was lost by the vanquished. Had the allies given battle on the preceding day, before the enemy had taken their measures, and received all their reinforcements, they might have succeeded in their endeavours to relieve Tournay. Although the attack was generally judged rash and precipitate, the British and Hanoverian troops fought with such integrity and spirit that it had been properly sustained by the Dutch forces, and their flag was not covered by the cavalry, the French, in all likelihood, would have been obliged to abandon their enterprise. The Duke of Cumberland left his sick and wounded to the humanity of the victors, and to the care of Mr. Phipps, whom had been appointed the Hessians were not suffered to pass beyond the river. The enemy, therefore, was not able to form an advantageous situation at Lesnes. The garrison of Tournay, though now deprived of all hope of succour, maintained the place to the twenty-first day of June, when the governor obtained an honourable capitulation. After the conquest of this frontier, which was dismanted, the Duke of Cumberland, apprehending the enemy had a design upon Ghent, sent a detachment of four thousand men to reinforce the garrison of that city; but they fell into an ambuscade at Pass-dumelle; and were killed or taken, except a few deviators that escaped to Ostend; on that very night, which was the tenth of June, Ghent was surprised by a detachment of the French army. Then they invested Ostend, which, though defended by an English garrison, and open to the sea, was, after a short siege, surrendered by capitulation on the fourteenth day of August. Dendermonde, Oudearde, Newport, and Aeth, underwent the same fate; while the city of Ghent, as it was evacuated by the French, was captured by the Antwerp. The French king having subdued the greatest part of the Austrian Netherlands, returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph.
